JEFFERY v. JOHNSON.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), February 11, 1952.]

Bastardy—Evidence—Corroboration—Proof by complainant of handwriting of letter alleged to be written by putative father—Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872 (c. 65), s. 4.

At the hearing of a summons in bastardy proceedings the complainant, having given evidence that the respondent was the father of the child, sought to rely, as the corroboration of her evidence required by the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, s. 4, on a letter which she swore was in the handwriting of the respondent and which, if it had been written by him, constituted an admission by him of his paternity. A

Held: the complainant was a competent witness to prove that the letter was in the handwriting of the respondent, and, if her evidence were accepted, the statements contained in it became corroboration in a material particular, within s. 4, of her evidence that the respondent was the father of the child. APPEAL of the complainant from an order of the Divisional Court dated Oct. 11, 1951.

Before the justices the complainant, having given evidence alleging that the respondent was the father of her child, sought to rely as corroboration of her evidence, on a letter which she swore was in his handwriting. The justices held that the letter did not constitute corroborative evidence within s. 4 of the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872. On appeal the Divisional Court upheld their decision, and the complainant appealed to the Court of Appeal. E

Hemming for the complainant.

F. L. Clark for the respondent. F

SOMERVELL, L.J.: On Aug. 21, 1950, the complainant, Christine Mary Jeffery, gave birth to a child the father of which, she alleged, was the respondent, James Johnson. On Apr. 23, 1951, she took out a summons under the Bastardy Laws Amendment Act, 1872, s. 3 of which provides that the mother of a bastard child may apply to a justice of the peace for a summons to be served on the putative father. Section 4 provides: G

"After the birth of such bastard child, on the appearance of the person so summoned, or on proof that the summons was duly served on such person, or left at his last place of abode . . . the justices . . . shall hear the evidence of such woman and such other evidence as she may produce, and shall also hear any evidence tendered by or on behalf of the person alleged to be the father, and if the evidence of the mother be corroborated in some material particular by other evidence to the satisfaction of the said justices, they may adjudge the man to be the putative father of such bastard child . . . " H

In the present proceedings the complainant gave evidence that for some six months covering the material dates she and the respondent lived at Bodmin as man and wife, that she became pregnant in December, 1949, that the respondent left her in March, 1950, and went to live at Tenby from where, she said, he sent her various sums of money. She put in, and sought to rely on, a letter which she swore was in his handwriting. She had been asking for money during her pregnancy, and in the letter it was stated:

A "By your letter you think I have to send you money. No, I haven't got to yet. This is done just to help you out. As soon as you get the kid you will work and I will send maintenance."

B That letter, if it is accepted as coming from the respondent, to my mind, plainly indicates that he was recognising himself as the father of the child. The question is whether the letter can be relied on as corroboration of the complainant's evidence in some material particular. Before the justices the respondent was represented by a solicitor who submitted that he had no case to answer. The justices dismissed the summons, but, at the complainant's request agreed to state a Case.

In STONE'S JUSTICES' MANUAL, 65th ed., which was the edition current in 1933, there appeared at p. 409 this note:

C "While, as a matter of prudence, it is desirable that the handwriting should be proved by other testimony than that of the woman, we are of opinion that her evidence alone, if credible, is sufficient for the purpose, and that letters, when thus proved may furnish the corroboration required by the statute."

D In 1933 Johnson v. Pritchard (1) came before the justices and there was an appeal to the Divisional Court. That case was similar to the present in that there was no evidence other than that of the complainant and letters alleged to be written by the respondent, were relied on by her as corroboration. The justices accepted the letters as corroboration, but the Divisional Court held, disapproving of the passage in STONE'S JUSTICES' MANUAL which I have read, that a complainant in bastardy proceedings cannot corroborate herself by saying that a letter produced by her was written to her by the alleged father.

E In Moore v. Hewitt (2) the same point emerged, and LORD GODDARD, C.J., after citing the passage from STONE'S JUSTICES' MANUAL, said ([1947] 2 All E.R. 273):

F "I hope that Johnson v. Pritchard (1) may be considered in a higher court. Sitting in this court, I think I am bound by it, although the court has not got the advantage of any report which shows the reasoning leading to the decision. The difficulty which I feel in accepting the case is that the statute does not require the whole of the complainant's evidence to be corroborated. If the whole of the complainant's evidence had to be corroborated, it would mean that in a great many cases the case could be proved without calling the complainant herself. The complainant's evidence in G Johnson v. Pritchard (1) seems to have been, first, that the respondent was the father of the child, and, secondly, that two letters which she had received were in the respondent's handwriting. If those letters were admissible on her evidence, the statements in the letters, being written by the respondent himself, were at once evidence against him. While the production of those letters did not corroborate the evidence of the complainant that he wrote them, they corroborated the complainant's evidence that he was the father of the child. That was a material particular, and, therefore, it seems to me H that the production of the letters afforded corroboration of the complainant's story in a material particular."

I find the same difficulty about Johnson v. Pritchard (1), as was found by LORD GODDARD, C.J. As he says, it is the statements in letters written by the man which are evidence against him and the only question is: Can the mother herself be a competent witness as to his handwriting? I cannot see why she should not be. In the present case it appeared clearly from her primary evidence that she was alleging that the respondent was the father of her child. Then she produces a letter and swears that it is in his handwriting. If that evidence is accepted, the statements in the letter become the material corroboration. In my opinion, I think she should be regarded as a competent witness as to the handwriting and that Johnson v. Pritchard (1) was wrongly decided. I would add that I agree with what was suggested in the note in STONE'S JUSTICES' MANUAL, 65th ed., that such evidence should be carefully scrutinised. There may be cases where the justices should not be satisfied, in the absence of some independent evidence, or, as is suggested, the calling of the alleged father, who is a compellable witness, but, as a matter of law, it seems to me open to them to accept the mother's identification of the handwriting and there may be many cases where they may be satisfied beyond any reasonable doubt by her evidence. It is a matter which is within their discretion, and they should consider in every case whether it is right to accept the complainant's evidence or whether independent evidence of the handwriting should be required.

Counsel for the respondent raised a subsidiary and different point. He pointed out that the provisions of s. 6 of the Bastardy Act, 1845, which is still operative with regard to appeals to quarter sessions, uses the words

" . . . corroborated in some material particular by other testimony to the satisfaction of the said justices . . . "

He said that "testimony" primarily means oral evidence, and referred us to LUSHINGTON'S LAW OF AFFILIATION AND BASTARDY, 7th ed., p. 97, where the learned editor expresses this view and cites a case in the Privy Council, Forget v. Baxter (3), in support. But in that case in which an article of the Civil Code of Quebec was being construed, it is plain that the word "testimony" meant oral testimony. If the word "evidence" had been used in that article it equally plainly would have meant oral evidence. Counsel said that in s. 3 of the Poor Law Amendment Act, 1844, which has now been replaced by s. 4 of the Act of 1872, the word now changed to "evidence" was "testimony". I think the words in their context in those two sections mean the same thing and what, as LORD GODDARD, C.J., said, is plainly evidence, namely, the statements in the letter, once proof of the handwriting had been accepted, would equally be testimony if the matter came on appeal before quarter sessions. For those reasons I think this appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: The evidence of the mother can be divided into two parts. First, the part in which she proves orally that the man was the father. Secondly, the part in which she proves the handwriting of the letter. It is the first part, her evidence as to paternity, which needs corroboration. That corroboration is afforded by the contents of the letter. She does not prove the contents of the letter. She only proves the handwriting to be that of the man. Once the handwriting is proved, the contents prove themselves, rather in the nature of evidence like an exhibit which, once it is properly identified, proves itself. Her evidence as to paternity is, therefore, corroborated by other evidence, namely, the contents of the letter. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree for the reasons given by SOMERVELL. L.J.

CASEY v. CASEY.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Karminski, J.), January 23, 1952.]

Divorce—Desertion—Termination—Offer by deserting husband to resume cohabitation—Wife asked to return to look after children.

On Sept. 20, 1951, the husband constructively deserted the wife by refusing, without any reasonable cause, to allow her to enter the house. A fortnight later he asked her to return to him as he wanted her to look after the children, but he said that he would not sleep with her and would not take her out. The parties were both in early middle age and there was no physical or moral impediment why they should not live together as man and wife in the full sense of the words.

HELD: in the circumstances the offer was not a genuine offer to resume cohabitation which the wife was bound to accept.

AS TO WHAT CONSTITUTES DESERTION, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 10, p. 835, para. 1338; and FOR CASES, see DIGEST, Vol. 27, pp. 307-309, Nos. 2840-2867, and pp. 312, 313, Nos. 2901-2910.

APPEAL by the wife against the dismissal, on Oct. 26, 1951, by Preston justices of a summons taken out by her alleging desertion and wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance by her husband. The justices held that the husband had made an offer to resume cohabitation which the wife had unjustifiably refused.

A. C. Goodall (E. L. Gardner with him) for the wife.

E. Rawdon Smith for the husband.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a wife's appeal from the dismissal by justices of charges of desertion and wilful neglect to provide reasonable maintenance as from Sept. 20, 1951, brought by her against her husband.

It is clear that this has been an uneasy marriage for some time, the separation which occurred on Sept. 20, 1951, being the fourth since 1948. On Sept. 20, 1951, the wife went to a neighbour's house. The husband objected to her friendship with this neighbour, so, when the wife came back after a few minutes, he shut her out of the house and said: "You stay there until I get your bag", or words to that effect. The wife returned to the neighbour's house and stayed there. The justices have found, in effect, that the husband's conduct on this occasion may have amounted to desertion. They do not find positively that it did, but they assume that it may have. They say: "However that may be, there has been an offer by the husband to take the wife back which ought to have been accepted, and, therefore, the wife has no case, either for desertion or wilful neglect to maintain." I am bound to say that I think that a matter of comparatively minor importance has been treated as the most decisive factor, and a matter of considerable importance has been dealt with as one of very little weight. It is, of course, impossible to object to the use of words such as "making a genuine offer", and "being bound to accept a genuine offer", or "not being bound to accept an offer because it is not genuine", because these phrases have been hallowed by the highest authority over and over again. Nevertheless, it is often appropriate to test these words by what is, I think, a simpler phrase which touches more nearly the essence of the matter: "Was the one spouse or the other ready and willing to resume cohabitation, whatever, in the circumstances of the particular case, may be the appropriate meaning of 'cohabitation'?" It is that aspect of the matter which has been pushed into the background, and the only thing which has been put in the foreground is whether or not the husband was entitled to insist, as unquestionably he did insist, that, if his wife came back to live with him, she should cease the association with this neighbour to which he objected.

The matter comes to a head when one reads the first three paragraphs of the justices' reasons. They say that they were of opinion that "while the husband, in turning the wife from home on Sept. 20, may have been guilty of conduct amounting to desertion, his subsequent request for her to return, made prior to the proceedings and repeated again in court, terminated any desertion there might be. We considered the husband's attitude towards his wife, and, while this left much to be desired, having regard to the past history of the case, it was unquestionably his insistence that the wife should give up an association which had been a constant source of friction which led to the present trouble, and, in our view, this was not unreasonable. We think that the offer that the husband made, taking all things into consideration, ought to have been accepted."

The occasion to which they refer was when the husband met the wife in the street on Oct. 5, 1951, and made some suggestion about her coming back. She said: "On what terms?" and the matter on which he principally insisted was that he would be "the boss" in future. The wife's evidence about it is this:

"I met him in the street and he asked me if I would come home. I asked him the terms. He said: 'What terms?' I said: 'Do you take me out, as [the probation officer] suggested?' He said: 'No'. I said: 'What are the conditions?' He said: 'I am the boss'. I said: 'You take me out?' He said: 'No. I do not want you. I only want you to come and look after the children'."

He made it plain that among the things in which he was insisting on being the boss was forbidding her to go to the neighbour's house, and the magistrates say that his insistence about that was not unreasonable. I will assume that that is so, but the far larger question is whether he ever offered to resume cohabitation at all.

The husband was subjected to a severe cross-examination, in the course of which it was made plain beyond the slightest doubt that what he was saying was: "I neither meant, nor do I intend now, that she should come back and live with me as my wife. I will not sleep with her. I will not take her out. All I really want her for is to come back because it is her place to look after the children". The care of the children was, of course, a very important thing, but to be a nurse to the children is not the whole of married life, and, in pushing into the background and dismissing as of secondary importance what is the fundamental question in the case, the justices have seriously misdirected themselves. It is clear that that has been the husband's attitude throughout, and I think the justices are right in assuming that he deserted the wife on Sept. 20. But neither then, nor when they met to talk it over, nor in his attitude in court, nor by the things he said over and over again in the witness-box, did he exhibit any intention whatever to resume cohabitation in the only sense in which that word can be used in this case, namely, treating the woman as his wife in the full sense of the word. This is not a case where there is any sort of physical impediment or any moral reason for refusing to live with her as man and wife. He is in the forties and she in the thirties, and they have a young family. It would need very strong evidence of some overriding reason or obstacle to persuade me that in those circumstances a reconciliation which did not involve readiness and willingness to cohabit in the ordinary sense of the word is a reconciliation which this wife is bound to accept. I think the justices have been misled, by exaggerating the importance of the very minor matter of the wife's association with the neighbour, into ignoring the fundamental point. That being so, I think this appeal must be allowed. I do not think that anything is to be gained by a fresh hearing, because I think the facts are perfectly plain and that the wife's summons should be merely remitted to the magistrates on the question of the appropriate amount, with which we are not able to deal unless we can do so by consent.

med. C.A. [1952] 2 All E.R. 9. LENS AND AREA RENT TRIBUNAL.

Ex parte PICKAVANCE.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.),
February 12, 1952.]

Rent Control—Security of tenure—Power to extend period—Notice to quit given more than three months after decision of tribunal—Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946 (c. 34), s. 5—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 11 (1).

On Sept. 8, 1950, a rent tribunal gave a decision, making no reduction of rent and giving no direction as to security of tenure, on a tenant's reference of his contract of tenancy of a furnished house to the tribunal, under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, and the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. On Dec. 9 the landlady served a notice to quit on the tenant who applied to the tribunal for an extension of the period of security of tenure. The tribunal made an order under s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1949 extending the security and made further orders granting extensions thereafter.

HELD: section 11 (1) of the Act of 1949, being required by s. 11 (5) to be construed as one with the Act of 1946, applied only where s. 5 of the Act of 1946 applied, i.e., where "a notice to quit . . . [was] served by the lessor on the lessee . . . before the decision of the tribunal . . . or within three months thereafter", and, therefore, the notice to quit having been served more than three months after the decision of the tribunal, the tribunal had no power to grant any extension of security of tenure under s. 11 (1).

FOR THE FURNISHED HOUSES (RENT CONTROL) ACT, 1946, s. 5, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 13, p. 1089; and FOR THE LANDLORD AND TENANT (RENT CONTROL) ACT, 1949, s. 11 (1), see ibid., p. 1107.

MOTIONS for certiorari and mandamus.

The applicant, Miss Pickavance, was the landlord of a furnished house, the tenancy of which had been referred by the tenant, William John Leyland, to a rent tribunal, which refused to reduce the rent and initially gave no direction as to security of tenure. She contended that, a notice to quit having been given by her to the tenant more than three months after the decision of the tribunal, the tribunal had no power thereafter to give any direction granting the tenant security of tenure, and a decision deferring the date on which the notice to quit should take effect should be quashed.

J. C. D. Harington for the applicant.

J. P. Ashworth for the rent tribunal.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicant moves for an order of certiorari directed to the St. Helens Rent Tribunal to bring up and quash a decision dated Oct. 16, 1951, whereby it directed that a certain notice to quit served by the applicant on her tenant "shall not take effect until Dec. 11, 1951, being the end of a period not exceeding three months from the date at which the notice to quit would have effect apart from this direction."

This case raises yet another point under the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, and the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, which, for this purpose, have to be read together. On Aug. 1, 1950, the tenant referred the contract of tenancy, which had lasted a considerable time, to the tribunal. The tribunal made no reduction in rent and gave no direction about security of tenure, and no notice to quit had been served by the landlord on the tenant. The decision of the tribunal was given on Sept. 8, 1950. On Dec. 9, 1950, a notice to quit was served for Dec. 18. The tenant then applied to the tribunal for an extension of security of tenure, and an order was made, which has been followed by a succession of such orders. It is now said, rightly, in the opinion of this court, that the tribunal never had any jurisdiction to grant this extension.

Section 5 of the Furnished Houses (Rent Control) Act, 1946, provides:

"If, after a contract to which this Act applies has been referred to a tribunal by the lessee or by the local authority (either originally or for re-consideration), a notice to quit the premises to which the contract relates is served by the lessor on the lessee at any time before the decision of the tribunal is given or within three months thereafter, the notice shall not take effect before the expiration of the said three months."

So far, especially in the light of the decision in a case to which I shall refer in a few moments, there is not much difficulty. To get this extension of three months the contract must have been referred to the tribunal and a notice to quit must have been given after the reference by the tenant and before the decision of the tribunal or within three months of the decision. If that has been done, the notice will not take effect before the expiration of the said three months, i.e., before the expiration of three months from the decision of the tribunal. Section 11 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, provides:

"Where a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies has been referred to a tribunal under that Act, and the reference has not been withdrawn, the lessee may, at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired, apply to the tribunal for the extension of that period."

In R. v. Folkestone and Area Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Sharkey (1) this court pointed out that the object of that provision was to prevent retaliation by the landlord on his tenant because the tenant had referred the tenancy to a tribunal. We also decided that s. 11 (1) did not give a new power to the tribunal, but only extended the power given by s. 5 of the Act of 1946. Section 5 only applies where a notice to quit has been served after a reference and before a decision or within three months after it. Otherwise it does not give the tenant a right to apply for an extension of the tenancy. Therefore, before s. 11 (1) can take effect exactly the same circumstances must be shown to exist as are specified in s. 5, because the two sections have to be read together. As pointed out in the course of the argument by PARKER, J., the words were not intended, or, at any rate, are not apt, to give a tenant of a furnished house the protection given by the Rent Restrictions Acts to a tenant of an unfurnished house. They give him only this limited protection in certain circumstances dominated by the fact that they are designed to prevent retaliation by a landlord by serving a notice to quit in consequence of the tenant having referred the matter to the tribunal.

The opening words of s. 11 (1): "Where a contract to which the Act of 1946 applies has been referred to a tribunal . . ." mean where the circumstances have arisen which were contemplated by s. 5. Then,

". . . the lessee may, at any time when a notice to quit has been served and the period at the end of which the notice takes effect (whether by virtue of the contract, of the Act of 1946 or of this section) has not expired, apply to the tribunal for the extension of that period."

In this case the tribunal not having, on Sept. 8, given any security of tenure, the landlord waited, and, on Dec. 9, the day after the three months had expired, she served a notice to quit. It does not seem to me that that notice to quit is caught by s. 5 of the Act of 1946 on any reading of it, because, although served after a reference to a tribunal, it was not served within three months of the decision of the tribunal. That state of affairs is not dealt with by the Act of 1946, and it seems that s. 11 (1) can have no application either. If s. 5 and s. 11 (1) have to be read together and if the conditions precedent giving the tribunal power do not exist under s. 5, I cannot see where they arise under s. 11 (1). Moreover, if the tenancy had been for a fixed period of, e.g., six months or so many weeks, at the end of which the tenancy was to determine, although during the currency of that agreement the tenant might have gone to the tribunal and asked for a reduction of rent, there would have been no necessity to give a notice to quit by the landlord. The tenancy would have terminated at the end of the fixed period and the tenant could not then have asked for an extension. Parliament has not provided that the tenant can go to a tribunal and ask for an extension of time in every case. We have to decide whether the conditions precedent which are laid down by the combined reading of s. 5 and s. 11 (1) have been fulfilled, and, as they have not been fulfilled, the order was made without jurisdiction and certiorari must go.

JONES, J.: I am of the same opinion.

PARKER, J.: I agree. By s. 5 of the Act of 1946, before security of tenure is granted to a tenant, a notice to quit has to be served after the contract has been referred to the tribunal and either before the decision was given or within three months thereafter. In the present case the reference to the tribunal was on Aug. 1, 1950. Its decision was given on Sept. 8, 1950, and the notice to quit was not served until Dec. 9, 1950, i.e., just outside the three months from the time when the tribunal gave its decision. Were it not, therefore, for s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1949 the landlord was perfectly within her rights in giving a notice to quit after the expiry of that three months when the parties were relegated to their ordinary common law rights.

It is said, however, that by reason of s. 11 (1) of the Act of 1949 the tribunal has jurisdiction to grant an extension of security of tenure whenever a notice to quit has been served, provided only that it has been served after the contract has been referred to the tribunal. The words in s. 11 (1) cited in support of this contention are as follows:

It is urged before us on behalf of the tribunal that the notice to quit there referred to, provided it has been served after the contract has been referred to the tribunal, may afford jurisdiction, and reliance is placed on the words “at any time when a notice to quit has been served”. I do not feel that one can get very much help from the words “at any time”. The section does not provide, “when at any time a notice is served and application has been made”. The words “at any time” refer only to the period during which the application can be made, viz., the period between the service of a notice and its expiry. Therefore, the question comes to a very short point—whether the words “when a notice to quit has been served” are perfectly general, referring to any point of time in the future, or whether they refer to a notice to quit served within the limits of time specified in s. 5 of the Act of 1946. In deciding which is the true construction of those words it is relevant to bear in mind s. 11 (5), which provides that s. 11 is to be construed as one with the Act of 1946. As was said by this court in R. v. Folkestone and Area Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Sharkey (1), the object of s. 5 of the Act of 1946 was to prevent retaliation by the landlord, and the power in s. 11 (1) is a power to extend security of tenure, i.e., as I read it, to extend the security of tenure afforded by s. 5 of the Act of 1946. If, therefore, in the circumstances of a case, the Act of 1946 provides no security of tenure, there is nothing for s. 11 (1) to operate on and to extend. It seems to me that within its context, bearing those considerations in mind, the words "when a notice to quit has been served" in s. 11 (1) must mean when a notice to quit has been served within the three months of time specified by s. 5 of the Act of 1946. For these reasons I agree with the judgment my Lord has delivered.

Re KNAPP'S SETTLEMENT. COWAN AND OTHERS v. KNAPP AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), February 13, 1952.]

Settlement—Lost settlement—Implication of provisions.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for an order that the plaintiffs or other persons for the time being appointed to act as trustees of a settlement affecting certain funds might be at liberty to hold and deal with such funds, or the property from time to time representing the same, on the footing that: (i) the said funds were held on trust to pay the income thereof to the defendant, Lilian Wingate Knapp, during her life; (ii) subject thereto, the said funds were held on trust for the defendants, Rachel Elizabeth Grylls and Sylvia Lilian Wingate Knapp, absolutely in equal shares; and (iii) the statutory power of appointing new or additional trustees applied to the said settlement and no person was nominated thereby for the purpose of appointing new or additional trustees.

On the marriage on July 21, 1906, of Kempster Kenmure Knapp (hereafter called "General Knapp") and Lilian Wingate Cowan a settlement was executed. The settlement was lost, and no copy or memorandum of its provisions existed or could be found save a brief note in the handwriting of General Knapp in the following terms:

"The marriage settlement was in possession of one of the trustees, H. F. Eve, Esq. (of Messrs. Howse & Eve, 2 Howard Street, London, W.C.2), the other being E. G. Cowan, Esq. (now living at 52 Eresby House, Rutland Gate, London, S.W.7). I understand that during the period of blitz in London during the war of 1939-45, this document was destroyed by enemy action. It provided for the equal division of the amount (£1,200 ?) between surviving children of the marriage, or their offspring in this case (1) Rachel Elizabeth Grylls, daughter, (2) Daughter of John Knapp, son, killed in Burma 13.3.45, viz. Sylvia L. W. Knapp."

The amount, "£1,200", and the mark of interrogation were written in pencil.

There were three children of the marriage—a son who died in infancy, a daughter (Rachel Elizabeth), and a son (John), who attained the age of twenty-one years and married, but was killed in action on Mar. 13, 1945. The daughter, Rachel, married and had two children. John Knapp was survived by his one child, Sylvia Lilian Wingate Knapp. On Apr. 12, 1948, General Knapp died.

Case referred to:

- (1) Re Trusts Affecting Scheduled Investments, (1943), 87 Sol. Jo. 66; 2nd Digest Supp.

E. I. Goulding for the plaintiffs, personal representatives of the last surviving trustee of the settlement.

M. J. Fox for the first and second defendants, Lilian Wingate Knapp, the surviving spouse, and Rachel Elizabeth Grylls.

G. C. D. S. Dunbar for the third, fourth and fifth defendants, the administrators of the estate of the deceased son, John Knapp.

J. H. A. Sparrow for the sixth, seventh and eighth defendants, grandchildren.

DANCKWERTS, J., said that among the ordinary trusts in an English marriage settlement one would expect there to be a trust for the husband and wife during their joint lives and for the survivor during his or her life, and, subject thereto, the trust fund would usually be held on trust for the issue of the marriage, including issue more remote than children, as the surviving spouse should appoint, and, in default of appointment, on trust for such of the children who attained the age of twenty-one years (or married in the case of females) in equal shares. There was in this case, however, no evidence that there was any power of appointment. It was possible, therefore, that there was some other provision made for the event of the death of children during their parents' lifetime, and for the issue of children. HIS LORDSHIP was at first attracted by the idea that he should conclude that the settlement contained the ordinary trusts of an English marriage settlement. There was some support for the alternative view which HIS LORDSHIP had mentioned in the terms of General Knapp's memorandum. General Knapp there referred to "surviving children of the marriage, or their offspring", and named a daughter and granddaughter. That could be taken to indicate that the class to take the capital were children of the marriage who survived the survivor of General and Mrs. Knapp, and there might have been a provision that if any child of the marriage died in the lifetime of the parents, or the survivor, their offspring should be substituted for them. Normally the condition of attaining twenty-one or marrying would not be applied to a substitutionary class. HIS LORDSHIP, therefore, concluded that the trusts of the marriage settlement were for the husband and wife for life as respects the funds which they each provided, and to the survivor for life, and after the death of the surviving spouse, for such of the children of the marriage who should survive that event, with a substitutionary gift in favour of the children of any child who predeceased the survivor of the parents. That would give to the defendant, Sylvia Lilian Wingate Knapp, a vested interest, as she was the only surviving child of the son, John Knapp, who was killed in 1945.

HIS LORDSHIP had been referred to Re Trusts Affecting Scheduled Investments (1) where UTHWATT, J., made an order permitting trustees to act on the footing that the trusts of a missing settlement were in a certain form. He proposed to follow that decision and to make an order in the present case declaring that the trustees were at liberty to hold and deal with the trust funds which were in their names, on the footing that the said funds were held on trust to pay the income thereof to the defendant, Lilian Wingate Knapp, during her life and that, subject to that life interest, the funds were held on trust for the defendant, Rachel Elizabeth Grylls, if she should survive Mrs. Knapp, and the defendant, Sylvia Lilian Wingate Knapp, in equal shares, and that, in the event of Mrs. Rachel Elizabeth Grylls not surviving Mrs. Knapp, the half share to which she would have otherwise attained would be held on trust for Mrs. Grylls' children in equal shares. The statutory power of appointing new trustees would apply.

Order accordingly.

SIDNEY TRADING CO., LTD. v. FINSBURY BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.), February 13, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—Rent—Total of rent and rates paid by tenant—Agreement under Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, s. 3, by landlords with rating authority to be liable for rates—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (7)—Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949 (c. 40), s. 2 (1).

On Dec. 22, 1950, the landlords, as a condition of the grant of the tenancy of a flat, required the payment of a premium of £41. The rateable value of the flat was £8, and the rent payable under the tenancy agreement was £5 4s. for a year. By cl. 3 of the agreement the tenant agreed to pay to the landlord for transmission to the appropriate authorities all existing or future general and water rates. The general rate was 19s. 6d. in the £ at all material times. On Jan. 18, 1951, the landlords entered into an agreement with the rating authority under s. 3 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, whereby they made themselves liable for the general rates assessed on the flat as from Oct. 1, 1950. The landlords having been convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction under the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 2 (1), of having required the payment of a premium as a condition of the grant of a tenancy to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, HELD: "rent" for the purpose of s. 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, was the total monetary consideration which the tenant had agreed to pay to the landlords for the grant of the tenancy; the total monetary consideration which the tenant in the present case had agreed to pay for the tenancy was £5 4s. plus an amount for rates which brought the total amount payable in respect of the tenancy to more than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof; the effect of the agreement of Jan. 18, 1951, was not that the landlords received the amount of the rates from the tenant merely for transmission to the appropriate authority; and, therefore, the "rent" payable in respect of the tenancy was not less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof, the Rent Acts applied to the tenancy, and the landlords were rightly convicted.

CASE STATED by a metropolitan magistrate.

On Sept. 3, 1951, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Old Street magistrate's court, on an information preferred by the respondent council, the appellants, the landlords, were convicted of having required a premium on the grant of the tenancy of a flat No. 112, Bartholomew Buildings, Seward Street, Finsbury, which, it was alleged, was subject to the control of the Rent Acts, contrary to s. 2 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949. For the landlords it was contended that the rent of £5 4s. per annum was less than two-thirds of the rateable value of the flat, and so, by s. 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, the Rent Acts did not apply to the tenancy, and, therefore, it was not an offence under s. 2 (1) of the Act of 1949 to require a premium. For the council it was contended that the amount of rates payable by the tenant to the landlords under the terms of the tenancy agreement must be added to the rent of £5 4s. and that the true rent so ascertained exceeded two-thirds of the rateable value.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: This is a Case stated by the learned metropolitan magistrate sitting at Old Street, before whom the landlords, Sidney Trading Co., Ltd., were summoned for a breach of the Landlord and Tenant (Rent Control) Act, 1949, s. 2 (1), in that they required the payment of a premium as a condition of the grant of a tenancy of a flat which was alleged to be subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts. The learned magistrate held that the offence had been committed and the question for determination is whether the flat was within the Rent Acts.

Section 12 (7) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, provides:

"Where the rent payable in respect of any tenancy of any dwelling-house is less than two-thirds of the rateable value thereof, this Act shall not apply to that rent or tenancy . . ."

That provision was, no doubt, meant to deal with the case where a person let a house at a purely nominal rent. In the present case, on Dec. 22, 1950, an agreement was entered into by which the flat was let for a year at a rent of £5 4s., payment being required of a premium of £41. If there had been nothing more than that, it may be that the flat would have been outside the Rent Acts, because the rateable value was £8 and £5 4s. is less than two-thirds of £8. Clause 3 of the agreement, however, contained the following provision:

"The tenant agrees to pay to the landlord for transmission to the appropriate authorities all existing or future general and water rates."

The question is whether or not the money that has to be paid to the landlords for rates is part of the "rent" for the purposes of s. 12 (7). On Jan. 18, 1951, the landlords entered into an agreement with the local authority, under the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, s. 3, whereby they made themselves liable to the authority for the rates in respect of the flat and were to be allowed a commission of ten per cent. for doing so. That agreement was retrospective in the sense that they agreed to pay the rates from Oct. 1, 1950. After that agreement was entered into any money paid by the tenant to the landlords which represented rates would be paid by the landlords to the local authority, not as agents for the tenant, but on their own behalf under the agreement.

Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Clark (1), and Alliance Property Co., Ltd. v. Shaffer (2), seem to me to lay down clearly that the test for deciding what is "rent" for the purpose of the Rent Restrictions Acts, is to ask: What is the total monetary payment to be made by the tenant to the landlord? One has not to regard the rent from the common law point of view of something issuing out of the land for which a distress could issue. To quote from the words of EVERSHED, L.J., in Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Clark (1) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 173):

"... the question in each case is to determine what in substance is the subject-matter of the tenancy granted to the tenant by the contract. Prima facie the rent is the monetary compensation payable by the tenant in consideration for the grant, however it be described or allocated."

If a flat is let at a rent of, say, £100 a year inclusive of rates, that £100 is "rent" although some part of it represents what the landlord has to pay to the local authority for rates. So, here, in substance the monetary consideration which the tenant agreed to pay for this tenancy—leaving the premium out of the question—is the £5 4s. plus a certain sum for rates. It seems to me on the authority of the two cases which I have mentioned that it matters not whether the payment is for rates, for service, or for the use of furniture. If there is a sum of money which the tenant agrees to pay as a consideration for the tenancy, it is for this purpose a rent. Therefore, in my opinion, the landlords are receiving here a rent of more than two-thirds of the rateable value. A

It has been strongly urged that, as the agreement between the landlords and the local authority was made after the date of the agreement with the tenant, the court should ignore the former agreement and only have regard to cl. 3 of the tenant's agreement. Whatever weight might have attached to that argument if the agreement had not been made retrospective, I do not stop to consider, because any sums of money which the landlords received from the tenant after they had made this retrospective agreement could not be transmitted to the local authority. The tenant was not the rated person. His obligation to pay rates could only have arisen if the landlords had failed to pay, when he could have been made to pay under s. 12 of the Poor Rate Assessment and Collection Act, 1869, and then would have had a right to recover the amount of the rates from his landlords. The position the landlords created by their own action was that, as from Oct. 1, they were paying the rates as principals and not as agents for their tenant, and they could not be heard to say that they were in any way receiving the money from the tenant for transmission to the local authority. They were receiving a sum of money which the tenant had agreed to pay them. What they did with that money thereafter was a matter for themselves. They were not to transmit any sum of money the tenant paid them for rates, because they had to pay the rates themselves out of their own pocket. B C D

For these reasons I think that the reasoning in Property Holding Co., Ltd. v. Clark (1) and Alliance Property Co., Ltd. v. Shaffer (2) applies. Consequently, this was a rent-controlled flat, an offence was committed in taking a premium, and the decision of the learned magistrate was right. E

A Landlord and Tenant—Repair—Breach of covenant—Measure of damages—Determination of lease—Repairs borne by new tenant—Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927 (c. 36), s. 18 (1).

By a lease, dated Oct. 1, 1929, the landlords let premises for a term of eighteen years from Mar. 25, 1931, the tenant covenanting to maintain and deliver up the premises in good and tenantable repair. On Jan. 14, 1949, the landlords granted a new lease commencing on the date of the expiry of the old lease. The new tenants agreed to pay a full economic rent and covenanted, if the premises were not left in repair, to put them in repair, the landlords agreeing to pay to the new tenants any money received for dilapidations under the covenant in the lease of 1929. On a claim by the landlords against the tenant under the lease of 1929 for damages for breach of the covenant to repair,

C HELD: the fact that the landlords and their new tenants had agreed on the manner of meeting the cost of repair did not go in diminution of the damage to the reversion at the end of the lease of 1929 under s. 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, for which the tenant under that lease remained responsible under the covenant.

APPEAL by the tenants from an order of LLOYD-JACOB, J., dated Oct. 16, 1951, in a claim by the landlords for damages for breach of a covenant to repair.

The tenants, who were trustees of the original tenant, contended that, as, at the date of the expiration of the lease, the landlords had entered into an agreement with new tenants that they (the new tenants) should carry out the repairs, the landlords had lost their right to recover under the covenant. LLOYD-JACOB, J., held that the landlords' rights against the tenants under the original lease were unaffected by the agreement with the new tenants, and awarded the landlords £1,170 damages.

G Salmon, Q.C., and Salkeld-Green for the tenants under the first lease.
C. H. Duveen for the third parties (sub-tenants).
Sachs, Q.C., and D. C. Bain for the landlords.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of LLOYD-JACOB, J. The landlords' claim was under a lease which was made on Oct. 1, 1929, to begin on Mar. 25, 1931, for eighteen years and, therefore, expired on Mar. 25, 1949. H It was a full repairing lease, and when it expired the tenants were in breach of the covenant to repair. The cost of putting the premises into the condition which the covenant required was agreed between the parties to be £1,170. On Jan. 14, 1949, some two months before the lease came to an end, the landlords granted a lease to Messrs. Wyser & Bryant, Ltd., for a period of fourteen years beginning on the day of the expiry of the old lease. The rent under the new lease was £1,900 a year and represented the rent properly payable for the premises on the basis that they were in good condition, i.e., that the repairs as required by the covenant had been carried out.

Clause 4 (5) (a) of the new lease provides that, assuming that when the new lease started the house would not be in good repair, the new tenants were to put the premises into repair within a certain period. The clause goes on to provide that

" . . . the tenants shall on the completion of such works as aforesaid be entitled to claim payment from the landlords of any money recovered by the landlords from the trustees of the late Sydney Herbert Long [the original lessee] for dilapidations as mentioned in cl. 6 hereof less the fees of the landlords' surveyors."

Clause 6 provides:

" The landlords hereby agree to pay to the tenants on the completion to the satisfaction of the surveyors of the decorative and other repairs referred to in cl. 4 (5) (a) hereof any money received by them by way of dilapidations from the trustees of the will of the late Sydney Herbert Long who are the present tenants less the amount of the surveyors' fees for preparing the specification of dilapidations and settling the amount payable in respect thereof and the landlords will take all necessary steps to recover such money and will notify the tenants of the amount proposed to be accepted in settlement of the claim before releasing the said trustees from their liability in respect thereof."

Section 18 (1) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, provides:

" Damages for a breach of a covenant . . . to leave . . . premises in repair at the termination of a lease . . . shall in no case exceed the amount (if any) by which the value of the reversion (whether immediate or not) in the premises is diminished owing to the breach of such covenant or agreement as aforesaid . . . "

The present is not the type of case for the purpose of which the law was altered by that enactment. This building is still required for use in substantially the same form, and the repairs which the tenant failed to do have to be done to put it in the state in which it is now required for use. Section 18 (1) was introduced to meet, primarily, a case where a building was going to be pulled down or turned to some different purpose so that the repairs were not required and the sum which the landlords would recover under the covenant would not be expended in whole or in part on the repairs covered by the covenant.

Section 18 (1), however, may have produced a result which was not intended. The learned judge decided that the tenants were liable on their covenant and gave judgment for the landlords for £1,170. It is from that decision that the tenants appeal. Counsel for the tenants contend that by Mar. 25, 1949, when the lease had come to an end, it mattered not financially to the landlords whether the repairs were done or not. It was the new tenants who had to do them, and, although the landlords had undertaken to take all necessary steps to recover the cost of repairs by this method of dealing with their rights, which existed contingently or conditionally on Jan. 14 when the new agreement was made, they had lost their rights, and, therefore, the cost of repairs would fall, not on the old tenants, but on the new tenants who would be unable to obtain any advantage under cl. 4 (5) (a).

I find that argument difficult to follow. When the landlords entered into the new lease, they had, conditionally, their rights. If the old tenants had put the whole building in repair, cadit quaestio. The rent of £1,900 would then have been the agreed rent without the new tenants having to spend any money on repairs. But if it was not put in repair, the landlords plainly had conditionally a right to recover. The damage to the reversion would be measured by the cost of the repairs, because it was everybody's intention to go on using the building as it was before and it was economic to do so. I cannot see why that right should be lost because it is made a term in a bargain. It is obvious that, if the landlords had not had this right—suppose, for example the landlords had abandoned their right to enforce the repairing covenant—the terms of the new lease would have been different. The new tenants would never have agreed to pay the economic rent for a repaired building and do the repairs themselves unless they had been satisfied that, quoad those repairs which were covered by the old lease, they would get, through the landlords, a sum, however it was quantified, representing the old tenants' liability. I cannot understand how it could be said that because a man has bargained with a right he loses it. The position is summarised in a paragraph in the learned judge's judgment, in which he says:

B “In my judgment, it is the fact that [the repairs] require to be done and not the circumstances in which the landlord and his new tenant agree on the manner of meeting the charge which is the governing consideration.”

That sentence, I think, is the answer to the appeal here, which, for the reasons given by the learned judge—with all of which I agree—must be dismissed.

- C DENNING, L.J.: I agree with all that my Lord has said. The measure of damage is the amount by which the market value of the reversion at the end of the lease was diminished by the want of repair. That depends on whether the repairs are going to be done or not. In cases where they have been or are going to be done the cost of repair is usually the measure of damage. The fact that the landlord has an undertaking from a new tenant to do the repairs does not go in diminution of damages. It is res inter alios acta. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree. The argument for the tenants is in defiance of the passage from the judgment of LAWRENCE, L.J. ([1934] Ch. 305) in Hanson v. Newman (1), cited by the learned judge, where the learned lord justice said:

- E “A reversion may not be a reversion in possession (i.e., it may not be immediate) by reason of the freeholder having granted a reversionary lease, and in that case the reversionary lease is to be disregarded in assessing the damages [under s. 18 (1)].”

- F In the present case the argument can only stand on the footing that the court does look at the reversionary lease and consider the arrangements which have been made in it with regard to the benefit of the covenant, and that is just what Hanson v. Newman (1) shows must not be done. I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Quarter Sessions—Appeal to—Jurisdiction to entertain question of what plea should have been entered at trial—Plea of Guilty accompanied by statement indicating innocence—Remission of case to court of summary jurisdiction—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (c. 49), s. 31 (1) (as substituted by Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act, 1933 (c. 38), s. 1). A

Charged before a court of summary jurisdiction with having stolen a motor cycle and electing to be dealt with summarily, a defendant pleaded Guilty. After a statement by the solicitor for the prosecution of facts which he did not dispute, the defendant said: "It was a mistake, I thought it was my mate's cycle. My mate said, 'Take it home'. My mate's bike is identical." He did not, however, ask the court to alter his plea, and he was convicted and sentenced. He appealed against the conviction to quarter sessions, who sent the case back to the court of summary jurisdiction under s. 31 (1) (vii) of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (as substituted by s. 1 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act, 1933), with an expression of opinion that a plea of Not Guilty should have been entered. B

HELD: quarter sessions were entitled to entertain the question whether or not the defendant's plea amounted to a plea of Guilty or Not Guilty: dictum of LORD GODDARD, C.J., in *R. v. MOTIONS for orders of certiorari and prohibition.

On July 30, 1951, the defendant, one Bruce, was convicted by a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at South Shields of having stolen a motor cycle. He appealed against conviction to quarter sessions for the county palatine of Durham, who heard the appeal on Sept. 24, 1951. For the prosecutor, a police constable, it was contended that, as the defendant had pleaded Guilty before the court of summary jurisdiction, quarter sessions had no jurisdiction to entertain the appeal in so far as it purported to be an appeal against conviction. The defendant contended that his plea, when considered with a statement he made to the court of summary jurisdiction, did not amount to a plea of Guilty. Quarter sessions remitted the case to the court of summary jurisdiction with an expression of their opinion that the statement made by the defendant should have been interpreted and accepted as a plea of Not Guilty. The prosecutor now moved for orders of certiorari to quash the decision and of prohibition to prohibit quarter sessions from entertaining an appeal against conviction. G

Michael Hughes for the applicant (the prosecutor).

Vernon Gattie for quarter sessions.

J. R. Johnson for the defendant.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: Counsel for the applicant has moved for an order of certiorari to bring up and quash an order made by the appeal committee of Durham Quarter Sessions whereby, on an appeal by a man named Bruce against a conviction before a court of summary jurisdiction, the committee directed that

“the matter of the said conviction be and is hereby remitted to a court of summary jurisdiction acting for the said county borough of South Shields, this court being of opinion that the statement made by [Bruce] to the said court of summary jurisdiction on July 30, 1951, should have been interpreted and accepted as a plea of ‘Not Guilty’.”

What happened was this. Bruce was charged with having stolen a motor bicycle. Before the court of summary jurisdiction he elected to be dealt with summarily, and, on being asked, he pleaded Guilty. No evidence was called, but a solicitor who appeared for the prosecution made a statement of the facts to the bench, none of which was disputed by the defendant, who was not represented. At the end of that statement, when asked whether he had anything to say, the defendant said:

“It was a mistake, I thought it was my mate’s cycle. My mate said, ‘Take it home’. My mate’s bike is identical.”

That was really a plea of Not Guilty, because, if his mate had asked him to take his bicycle home and he had taken the other bicycle by mistake, he was not guilty of larceny. However, he did not ask the justices to alter the plea and they did not do so. After hearing the defendant’s somewhat unfortunate record, they sentenced him to six months’ imprisonment. Bruce then asked if he could see a solicitor, and he was granted legal aid. Afterwards he was granted bail and appealed to quarter sessions. At quarter sessions the prosecution took the objection that, as he had pleaded Guilty, he had no right of appeal. It was said on the authority of R. v. West Kent Quarter Sessions. Ex p. Files (1) that quarter sessions could not entertain the appeal. Having, however, heard what the defendant said before the justices before he was sentenced, quarter sessions decided that the justices ought to have entered a plea of Not Guilty, and, accordingly, they sent the case back to the justices under the powers which they have under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 31 (1) (vii), as substituted by the Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act, 1933, s. 1.

The case depends on whether R. v. West Kent Quarter Sessions. Ex p. Files (1) applies or can be distinguished. Many cases have come before the court on the question whether or not a plea of Guilty has properly been entered. In R. v. Graham Campbell. Ex p. Ahmed Hamid Moussa (2) a man was charged with a breach of the Aliens Order, 1920, because he had not registered as an alien. He was an Egyptian, and when he was brought before the magistrate on the charge of having failed to register, he was not asked whether he pleaded Guilty or Not Guilty in the ordinary way, according to the practice which at that time obtained in the metropolitan police courts. Instead the clerk said to him: “Are you an Egyptian?”, and he answered: “Yes, I am”. That was construed as an admission that he was an alien. He was then asked whether he had failed to notify the registration officer of a change of address and he said he had, and thereupon he was convicted. He desired to appeal to quarter sessions and it was objected that, as he had pleaded Guilty, he had no right of appeal, but this court decided that he had not pleaded Guilty and granted mandamus to the London Sessions to hear the appeal.

That case is not quite in pari materia with the present matter because there the defendant had never been directly asked the question: “Are you guilty or not guilty". He had been asked whether he was an Egyptian, and he said that he was. The view of AVORY, J., who dissented, was that that was an admission that he was an alien, and that, having admitted that he had not notified the change of address, he had then admitted the truth of the information. The other two judges, however, thought he had not made that admission because, although he said he was an Egyptian, he might have contended that, nevertheless, he was a British subject. They held that that did not amount to a plea of Guilty, and ordered quarter sessions to hear the case. A

R. v. Ingleson (3), which came before the Court of Criminal Appeal, is singularly like this case. The appellant was charged with receiving and without any doubt at his trial he pleaded Guilty. At the same time he handed up a statement to the learned recorder which, if believed, as LORD COLERIDGE, J., said, giving the judgment of the court, was a complete exculpation, concluding, as it did, with the words: "I am guilty of taking the horses not knowing them to be stolen". B The court held that that amounted to a plea of Not Guilty, because the appellant said he did not know the horses were stolen, and ordered that a plea of Not Guilty be entered and that the case go back for re-hearing. That is exactly what quarter sessions did in this case. They treated the proceedings before the justices as a nullity because the trial had proceeded on the footing that Bruce had pleaded Guilty when quarter sessions thought that the plea ought to have been C Not Guilty. Therefore, they said that the proceedings consequent on the plea were bad, a plea of Not Guilty must be entered, and the case must go back for re-hearing.

In R. v. West Kent Quarter Sessions. Ex p. Files (1) the facts were altogether different. A man of considerable education was charged with dangerous driving. D He had been served with the summons, and I said, in giving judgment ([1951] 2 All E.R. 729):

"Unless the applicant is blind, cannot read, or is mentally defective—none of which is suggested—there can be no doubt whatsoever that he must have understood that with which he was being charged. That goes to merits, perhaps, and not to jurisdiction. The evidence shows that the clerk of the court read out verbatim the full particulars of the charge as shown in the information." E

The charge was:

"Driving a motor vehicle on a road at a speed which was dangerous to the public, contrary to s. 11 (1) of the Road Traffic Act, 1930", F and the particulars were,

"... on Feb. 3, 1951, at the parish of Northfleet . . . unlawfully did drive a motor vehicle, to wit, a motor car, on a road there called Watling Street, at a speed which was dangerous to the public, having regard to all the circumstances of the case, including the nature, condition and use of the road, and the amount of traffic which was actually at the time, or which might reasonably have been expected to be, on the road." G

The clerk read the summons to him verbatim, asked him if he was legally represented, and, when he said he was not, said that it was a serious charge. As I said in my judgment: H

"He then informed the applicant in formal language of his right to be tried by a jury at quarter sessions. Before he took his reply, he explained to him in simple language exactly what that meant, and the applicant answered: 'I want to be dealt with this morning'. 'I then said', says the clerk in his affidavit, 'In that case do you plead Guilty or Not Guilty?'. Neill replied: "Guilty". I spoke again to Neill in these terms: "You are quite certain about that? You admit the offence, do you?", and Neill replied: "Yes".

A In those circumstances there was no question that the man not only pleaded Guilty, but also intended to plead Guilty. He persuaded quarter sessions, however, to hold an inquiry whether he had pleaded Guilty under a mistake. Quarter sessions, for reasons which, no doubt, appeared good to them, but which this court entirely failed to understand, said they had come to the conclusion that the man had made a mistake, and entertained an appeal. We said: "You cannot do a thing like that. Here is a man who in court deliberately and intentionally, after being warned, pleads Guilty. If everybody who pleads Guilty and finds that the sentence is one he does not like can appeal to quarter sessions, there will be no end to the proceedings". The present case, however, is, I think, distinguishable. It is true that in the West Kent case (1) I concluded my judgment by saying ([1951] 2 All E.R. 732):

B "It is not the case of a court inquiring into matters to find out whether they had jurisdiction or not. On the face of the proceedings before the court was a statement by the appellant that he pleaded Guilty. In those circumstances, quarter sessions had no right to hear the appeal, and they must be prohibited from entertaining it."

C I think the concluding words of my judgment go too far. Where the question in the case is whether or not the plea which was put in by the prisoner at the hearing before the justices amounted to a plea of Guilty or Not Guilty, that is a matter which the court can entertain. It would be putting it too high against an unrepresented prisoner who, when first charged, had said that he pleaded Guilty, but, before being sentenced, had made to the court a statement which showed that he meant to deny that he had acted feloniously or criminally, to say: "You said you were Guilty, and, therefore, there is an end of it". It must not be taken that the concluding words of my judgment in the West Kent case (1) preclude courts of quarter sessions from considering whether the plea which was made before the court of summary jurisdiction, taking all that the prisoner said together, was a plea of Guilty or Not Guilty.

E This is not a case of a defendant who unequivocally pleaded Guilty and then said: "I made a mistake". It is a case in which at the trial the defendant said: "Guilty, but . . ." and added a statement which showed that he was really pleading Not Guilty. Every judge and most magistrates know that it is quite a common thing for a prisoner arraigned at assizes or quarter sessions, when the charge is put to him, to say he is Guilty, but so-and-so and so-and-so, and the clerk of assize always says: "That is a plea of Not Guilty. Enter a plea of Not Guilty".

F The court of summary jurisdiction in this case ought to have entered a plea of Not Guilty, and then the case could have been tried. If convicted, the defendant would have had a right to appeal to quarter sessions. He appealed to quarter sessions against his conviction and his ground of appeal really amounted to this: "I did not plead Guilty. I pleaded Not Guilty and the plea of Guilty is wrongly recorded". Quarter sessions came to the conclusion that the plea of Guilty was wrongly recorded, not because the defendant did not understand or did not intend to plead otherwise than he did, but because, taking the whole of his plea together, they were satisfied that in law it amounted to a plea of Not Guilty. I think they were right in entertaining the appeal to that extent, and that, as the defendant had never been tried on a plea of Not Guilty, they were entitled to treat the conviction as a nullity, as the court did in R. v. Ingleson (3). Therefore, they were right to exercise the powers which they had under s. 31 (1) (vii) of the Act of 1879 (as substituted by the Summary Jurisdiction (Appeals) Act, 1933), of sending back the case to petty sessions with an expression of their opinion. This application for certiorari must, therefore, be refused.

WATES v. ROWLAND AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), February 5, 6, 7, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—Permitted increase—"Improvement" of house—Structural alteration—Repairs—Replacement of defective floor—Laying of additional concrete bed—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 2 (1) (a), s. 2 (5).

The wooden floor of a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied became rotten owing to the rise in the water level in the land. It constituted a statutory nuisance, to abate which the landlord raised the foundation of the house by adding a layer of concrete and replaced the wooden floor with a tiled one. He claimed, under s. 2 (1) (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, to be permitted to charge an increase in the rent of eight per cent. of the amount expended on the raising of the foundation.

HELD: the replacement of the floor was within the description of repairs, but the laying of the additional concrete bed provided the house with a better substratum than it had had before and amounted to an improvement or a structural alteration of the house within s. 2 (1) (a), and, therefore, the landlord was entitled to increase the rent by an amount equal to the statutory percentage of the sum expended thereon.

APPEAL by the landlord against an order made by His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., at Croydon County Court on Oct. 10, 1951, in an action brought by the landlord against the tenants of premises owned by him.

The premises were a dwelling-house to which the Rent Restrictions Acts applied, and the landlord's claim was in respect of what he alleged to be a permitted increase in the rent of the premises on the ground that he had incurred expenditure on their "improvement" (consisting of a reconstruction of the flooring on the ground floor), within s. 2 (1) (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920. The tenants denied that the work had resulted in an "improvement" within para. (a), and said that it was done merely to abate a statutory nuisance. The learned judge held that, in view of the exclusion from the operation of para. (a) of expenditure on repairs, work which could be described as "repairs" could not constitute "improvement" within the paragraph, that the work in question could be described as "repairs", and, therefore, that the landlord could not recover the increased rent. The landlord appealed.

I. C. Baillieu for the landlord.

D. C. Humphreys for the tenants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I will ask JENKINS, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from the judgment of JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., at Croydon County Court, dismissing a claim by a landlord to be entitled to add to the standard rent of premises the statutory eight per cent. increase based on the amount of his (the landlord's) expenditure on improvements to the premises. The sole issue is whether, on the true construction of the relevant provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts, this expenditure, having regard to the nature of the work done, was an expenditure qualifying for the statutory increase.

The relevant provisions are to be found in the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 2 (1), as amended by the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, s. 3 (1) and sched. I, which provides:

"The amount by which the increased rent of a dwelling-house to which this Act applies may exceed the standard rent shall . . . be as follows, that is to say:—(a) Where the landlord has since [Sept. 2, 1939] incurred, or hereafter incurs, expenditure on the improvement or structural alteration of the dwelling-house (not including expenditure on decoration or repairs), an amount calculated at a rate per annum not exceeding eight per cent. of the amount so expended: Provided that the tenant may apply to the county court for an order suspending or reducing such increase on the ground that such expenditure is or was unnecessary in whole or in part, and the court may make an order accordingly."

Reference should also be made to the definition of "repairs" contained in s. 2 (5) of the Act of 1920, which is in these terms:

"For the purposes of this section, the expression 'repairs' means any repairs required for the purpose of keeping premises in good and tenantable repair . . ."

Reading s. 2 (1) (a) in its amended form in the light of that definition, it provides that where the landlord has, since the date mentioned, incurred, or hereafter incurs, expenditure on the improvement or structural alteration of the dwelling-house, not including expenditure on decorations or on any repairs required for the purpose of keeping the premises in good and tenantable repair, then the statutory percentage may be added to the rent, with the proviso already referred to under which the tenant may object to the increase on the ground that the expenditure in question on improvements or structural alterations is or was unnecessary.

The tenancy in the present case comprises the ground floor of No. 210 Rowan Road, Mitcham. The system of construction of the floor of that part of the house appears to have been this. There was a layer of concrete on which wooden joists were laid, and the floor was laid over and secured to those joists in the usual way. The result of that method of construction was that there was a cavity between the surface of the concrete and the under-side of the floor. That method was, apparently, considered adequate in view of the condition of the ground obtaining at the time when the house was built, but, for reasons not satisfactorily explained, it appears that the land in this vicinity has of comparatively recent years tended to become waterlogged through, it is suggested, a rise, for some reason or other, in the water level, or water table (as I believe it is usually called), in the land. The effect of that has been that water has seeped through the lower part of the walls of the house, found its way into the cavity between the concrete substratum and the under-side of the wooden floor, and resulted in rotting of the floor. This condition of the floor and the cavity beneath it was considered by the sanitary authority as amounting to a nuisance within the meaning of the relevant public health legislation, and the landlord was anxious to do what was necessary to put the matter right. A formal notice to abate the nuisance was served, but it seems that there was a certain amount of co-operation between the local authority and the landlord inasmuch as the service of such a notice would facilitate the obtaining of the necessary licence.

The work required by the notice, which was dated Nov. 3, 1950, was described in concert with the landlord in the sense that the work it required was the work that he himself regarded, or his technical advisers regarded, as the proper way of getting rid of the trouble. The relevant part of the work, as shortly described in the notice, was this: "Lay concrete over existing site to raise site by approximately nine inches. Re-build sleeper walls, re-fix joists and plates, re-lay flooring and re-fix skirtings, door frames, etc." The necessary licence having been duly obtained, the work was done. It involved the laying of a further layer of concrete over the existing concrete, raising the surface of the concrete bed by a matter of nine inches. The surface so raised having been appropriately treated, a tiled floor was laid directly on it in the place of the original wooden floor. The question now is whether any part of the expenditure incurred on this work, and, if so, how much, ranks for the statutory percentage. The matter has been dealt with before us as a question of principle, and I understand it is, in effect, agreed between the parties that, in the event of the appeal succeeding, the appropriate calculation should be made so as to allow the statutory percentage on the cost of laying the addition to the concrete bed under the house, with a proper allowance for the cost of providing the tiled flooring, which for this purpose can be regarded as a replacement of, or as a substitute for, the old wooden flooring.

The judge in his judgment, after stating the facts, said:

"Speaking in the popular sense, I should have no hesitation in saying that the expenditure had been incurred in relation to 'improvements' . . . but that is not the issue I have got to decide. I have to decide whether such improvements are distinct from 'repairs', and in order to arrive at a true view whether such distinction can be made I am governed by authority . . . In the present case, I think it was implicit in the service of the sanitary inspector's notice that the existing dampness of the floor prevented these premises from being described as being in good and tenantable repair . . . In my view, I am governed by the decision in Rabbitt v. Grant (1). In that case a sanitary notice had been served and as a result the inadequate earth privy was superseded by a modern water-closet. In the present case I think a defective flooring has been superseded by an efficient floor, and although it is obviously a very great 'improvement' in the premises, the fact that it is also aptly describable as a repair of a bad system of flooring in order to make a defective flooring usable and the premises habitable prevents the plaintiff, in my view, from claiming the benefit of the eight per cent. increased rent. Against this I have been referred to the case of Strood Estates Co., Ltd. v. Gregory (2) in the Court of Appeal, a decision in which the works related, according to SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., to the substitution of modern drainage to the satisfaction of the local authority, and that seems very similar to what has happened in the present case."

Then the judge referred to the circumstance that there had been no sanitary notice served in Strood Estates Co., Ltd. v. Gregory (2) and to the absence from the report of any details about the work done in that case, and he continued:

"I feel however that the case before the Irish courts is one which is so closely analogous to the present that it would be dangerous for this court to go behind it to the earlier decision in the Court of Appeal."

A It was suggested on behalf of the tenants that the judge should be understood to have found as a fact that, although the expenditure had been incurred in relation to "improvement" in the popular sense of that expression, nevertheless the work in question also answered the description of "repairs", and, that that being so, on the facts the expenditure was not within the section. I cannot read the judgment as involving a finding of fact to that effect. Looked at as a whole I think it comes to this, that, if the matter had been free from authority, B the judge would have been disposed himself to find on the facts that the work here done did amount to an "improvement" in the ordinary, popular, sense of that expression, but he felt himself constrained by the authority of Rabbitt v. Grant (1) to hold that the expenditure in question was also an expenditure on repairs, and that, therefore, the landlord was excluded from the benefit of the statute. Accordingly, I think the question raised before us can properly be C described as a question of law—that is to say, whether, on the facts of this case and the true construction of the relevant statutory provisions, this expenditure or some part of it was expenditure on the improvement or structural alteration of the dwelling-house as distinct from expenditure on repairs, within the meaning of the exception contained in s. 2 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920 as amended by the Act of 1939.

D Counsel for the landlord put his case on the construction of the section in this way. He said that he had got to show an expenditure on an improvement or structural alteration, and that he claimed to have shown for there is no doubt that the floor, as it stands at present, with its solid foundation, is a much better floor than the house ever had before. He then pointed out that, if the phrase "not including expenditure on decoration or repairs" is read in conjunction with the definition of "repairs", it is found that what is excepted is expenditure E on any repairs—not, he it observed, on any work of any kind—required for the purpose of keeping the premises in good and tenantable repair. He thus meets the judge's decision so far as it is based on the view that with the floor as it was before the work was done the premises could not be described as being in good and tenantable repair. He says that the mere fact that work is necessary F to put premises into good and tenantable repair does not conclude the matter against him, for "repairs", by definition, means repairs required for the purpose of keeping the premises in good and tenantable repair, and there may well be work required for that purpose which, however, does not fairly answer the description of "repairs", as, for instance, where, for the purpose of making a structure, originally defectively designed, a structure in good and tenantable G repair, it is necessary to make structural alterations and improvements, in the sense of making an addition or alteration to the premises which does not merely restore the premises to a condition approximating to the condition that they were in when new, but does make the premises in some way better in kind than they ever were before. The other point of construction taken on the landlord's side is to be found in the proviso to s. 2 (1) (a) of the Act of 1920:

H "Provided that the tenant may apply to the county court for an order . . . on the ground that such expenditure is or was unnecessary . . ."

That implies that there must be some improvements or structural alterations which can be made to a dwelling-house which are necessary, and thus supports the view that an improvement or structural alteration is not necessarily ruled out from ranking for the statutory percentage merely because it can be described as a necessary improvement or structural alteration, e.g., as being required for keeping the premises in good and tenantable repair or making them fit for human habitation. To hold otherwise, it is pointed out, might lead to the result that no improvement or alteration could ever rank for the percentage, because, if it was required for the purpose of keeping the premises in good and tenable repair, it would be a repair, and, therefore, would be excluded from the benefit of the section, whereas, if it did something more than that, the tenant might raise an objection on the ground that the work was "unnecessary". In Strood Estates Co., Ltd. v. Gregory (2) the landlord had incurred expenditure in substituting a modern system of drainage for an old and antiquated system, and the question was whether that expenditure ranked for the statutory percentage by way of increase of rent, and it was held by SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., who delivered the judgment of the court, that the expenditure in question did so rank. There had been no sanitary notice served in that case, but it does seem that evidence had been given by the chief sanitary inspector that the houses before the work was done were not in all respects fit for habitation in accordance with the Housing Act, 1925, s. 1. The argument took a different course from the argument before us, but it does to some extent assist the present landlord's contention. The argument in Strood Estates Co., Ltd. v. Gregory (2) was that under s. 1 of the Housing Act, 1925, there was to be implied in the contract of letting an undertaking that the house would be kept by the landlord during the tenancy in all respects reasonably fit for human habitation. That being an undertaking to be implied in the contract for the letting of houses of a class to which the house in question belonged, it was argued that, inasmuch as, in substituting the new system of drainage, the landlord had done no more than he was obliged to do by this statutory term of the tenancy, he could not claim any right to the increase. SIR BOYD MERRIMAN, P., dealt with that argument mainly by reference to the proviso as to expenditure on unnecessary matters, and he said this ([1936] 2 All E.R. 366):

"As the subject-matter is a dwelling-house, it may, I think, fairly be assumed that in using the word 'unnecessary' the legislature meant that the work in respect of which the expenditure was incurred must be necessary for the purpose for which a dwelling-house is used—namely, for human habitation", and it was pointed out, in effect, that, if the argument based on s. 1 of the Housing Act was accepted, then no improvement or alteration in circumstances such as those in that case could rank for the statutory percentage of increased rent unless it was necessary in order to make the premises fit for human habitation, and then the claim would be defeated by the Housing Act, 1925, s. 1.

I think that that case does assist the landlord, as showing that, at all events, the necessity or otherwise of work from the point of view of making premises fit for habitation does not necessarily govern the question whether the expenditure is expenditure on an improvement or structural alteration ranking for the increase. In Rabbitt v. Grant (1), followed by the judge, the expenditure was on work consisting of removing an earth privy and substituting for it a modern water-closet, pursuant to a sanitary notice, and the court came to the (to my mind) somewhat surprising conclusion that this was not an improvement in respect of which the increase could be claimed, because it was a repair, inasmuch as it had to be installed in order to put the premises into good and tenable repair, that expression being treated as extending to making the premises fit for human habitation according to modern sanitary standards by the installation of an entirely new and different type of convenience. I need only read a passage from the end of the judgment of SULLIVAN, C.J., where he said ([1940] I.R. 333):

"When this case was first heard we were not satisfied on two points, first, whether or not the earth privy had constituted a nuisance, and, secondly, whether the provision of a water closet in lieu of the privy was necessary for the purpose of putting the premises into good and tenable repair. Those questions have now been answered by the learned judge. He has found that the earth privy was a nuisance and that the provision of a water closet was necessary for the purpose of putting the premises into good and tenantable repair. Notwithstanding these findings, Mr. Kingsmill Moore on behalf of the appellant asks us to hold that the work done was not repairs but an 'improvement'. But to do so would be, in my opinion, to misinterpret the provisions of s. 8 (1) (a) of the Act. Although the work done may have been an 'improvement' and a 'structural alteration', it was also a 'repair'. To entitle the landlord to an increase in rent it must be established that he has incurred expenditure which was not expenditure on repairs. On the facts as found in this case, the expenditure was on repairs. The question submitted for our decision should therefore be answered in the negative."

Then MURNAGHAN, J., said (ibid., 334):

"The tenant is entitled to have the house maintained in a tenantable condition, and GEOGHEGAN, J., has found that the only way of putting the premises into a tenantable condition was by installing a water closet. This, although a 'structural alteration', is in the circumstances clearly a repair within the meaning of s. 8 of the Act."

I should mention that the statutory provisions referred to in these passages were in all material respects similar to those applicable in the present case. With respect to the learned judges who decided the Irish case, it seems to me that they proceeded on the fallacy that all work required to put the premises into a condition fit for human habitation was necessarily "repairs" within the meaning of the section. That, I think, overlooks the fact that the definition of "repairs" in s. 2 (5) of the Act of 1920 defines that expression as meaning as distinct from work of any kind, whether in the nature of repairs or not, required to put the premises into a condition fit for human habitation, and I cannot regard the circumstances that before any work was done the premises were not in tenantable repair or not fit for human habitation and that after the work was done they were in such repair and were so fit as necessarily concluding against a landlord the question whether under this section his expenditure, or at all events some part of it, has been expenditure on improvements or structural alterations. The question is one, I think, which must turn very much on the facts of each particular case, and it would, in my view, be wrong for the court to regard the Irish case, itself hardly reconcilable with Strood Estates Co., Ltd. v. Gregory (2), as laying down any general principle which ought to be followed here.

Turning again to the facts of the present case in their relation to the relevant statutory provisions, there is no doubt that the landlord has incurred expenditure, and I think he has certainly incurred expenditure on a structural alteration, that is to say, the addition of the further nine inches of concrete. He has also incurred expenditure on what is prima facie, according to the ordinary meaning of the word, an "improvement", for on the evidence he has made the house, as regards its substratum and the system of construction of the floor and its foundations, very much better than they ever were before. Is there, then, any sufficient reason for holding that this expenditure is to be excluded from consideration on the ground that it was expenditure on repairs? In my judgment, the answer to that question is that up to a point the totality of the work done was work of repair. The tenant had a floor in the house when he went in, and clearly the house could not be said to be in good tenantable repair after the floor had become rotten. The replacement of a floor of some kind would, I think, therefore, fairly come within the description of "repairs". It would be making good a defect arising from the action of the water underneath the floor which had caused the floor to rot, and to that extent the expenditure, in my view, could not properly rank for the eight per cent. increase, and it is not contended that it should so rank. The landlord, however, did substantially more than merely provide a new floor. He made a structural alteration and an improvement, consisting of the laying of the additional concrete bed over the existing concrete, and that provided the house with a better substratum than it had ever had before in the shape of a solid concrete bed on which the new floor could be laid direct, thus getting rid of the disadvantage under which the house had laboured from the time it was built, consisting of the cavity beneath the floor into which, under the changed conditions brought about by the rise in water level, water could find its way.

Accordingly, although this is not an easy case, in my view, the appeal should be allowed to the extent that the expenditure on the concrete work should be considered as expenditure on an improvement or structural alteration and not an expenditure on repairs. I assume that the parties will be able to agree the appropriate figure on that principle.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: I am of the same opinion, and I only add some observations of my own because we are differing from the view of the judge and because of the part that Rabbitt v. Grant (1) played in his arriving at his conclusion. I have found the case difficult, and certainly it is on its facts unusual, for the question is whether the landlord can claim the benefit of s. 2 (1) (a) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, in respect of the cost incurred by him in making what is, undoubtedly, a structural alteration, and is, undoubtedly, in any ordinary sense an improvement, namely, the making of a new concrete sub-structure capable of meeting a new physical condition. I say "a new physical condition" because it seems clear that at some stage since the house was built, and probably since the tenancy started, a change took place in the water level, and it was in order to meet that change that this alteration was made. The judge clearly regarded himself as bound by the authority of Rabbitt v. Grant (1), that is to say, bound in the sense that (though the case was an Irish decision) it had an authority from which he should not depart. The basis of the decision of Rabbitt v. Grant (1), as I follow it, was that the substitution of a modern water-closet for an earth privy was merely a repair within the meaning of the section, because only by that substitution could the sanitary notice that had been served be satisfied. On that basis the judge felt bound to hold in this case that the building of the new concrete bed and the putting of the new floor on top of it was the only satisfactory way of complying with the notice that had been served. The judge in the circumstances did not go into the question, and there is no finding whether the restoration of the floor alone could have been done without doing this much more substantial work. The difficulties that I feel in accepting the authority of Rabbitt v. Grant (1) are, first, that the second finding of fact made by GEOGHEGAN, J., in that case seems to me to be open to objection, for I cannot regard it as a finding of fact, strictly, at all. It involved a decision, which is not a matter of fact, on the effect of the words of the Act "for the purpose of keeping premises in good and tenantable repair". I also feel difficulty in accepting the test which was applied in Rabbitt v. Grant (1), namely, that if the work done was the only way, or the only satisfactory way, of satisfying the sanitary notice, notwithstanding any changes in social conditions or in the standards of human habitation, it must be a "repair" only.

The decision in Strood Estates Co., Ltd. v. Gregory (2) clearly involves the proposition that the substitution of a modern drainage system for a more antique character of drainage could be an improvement within the section, although in the sense of Rabbitt v. Grant (1) it might be the only way of complying with the required standard of habitability; but the particular problem discussed before us was not, so far as I can see, debated in Strood Estates Co., Ltd. v. Gregory (2), and so we have to deal with the matter, I think, as res integra. In the course of the argument examples were given showing that what was undoubtedly repair might yet involve some degree of improvement, in the sense of the modern substitute being better than that which had gone before. At the other end of the scale it was also clear that work done to satisfy modern standards, although it might involve restoration, and might be said to be restoration in the Rabbitt v. Grant (1) sense, yet clearly would be an improvement. Between the two extremes it seems to me to be largely a matter of degree, which in the ordinary case the county court judge could decide as a matter of fact, applying a common-sense man-of-the-world view. The judge in this case did not do that because he thought he should follow the case of Rabbitt v. Grant (1).

I think that the argument of counsel for the tenants, though it has been attractive, comes near to involving the proposition that, if an improvement is not a repair, it must be unnecessary. I am not suggesting that he so argued, still less conceded that that was so, but, as JENKINS, L.J., has pointed out, I think that clearly there must be improvements, in the way of structural alterations or otherwise, which are necessary, but which cannot satisfactorily be regarded as merely "repairs" within the meaning of the definition. I think, on the whole, that this is such a case, and I, therefore, agree that this appeal should be allowed.

HODSON, L.J.: Although we are differing from the judge, I agree so fully with the conclusion at which JENKINS, L.J., has arrived, and with the reasons that he has given, that I will add nothing except that I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

MASLIN v. MASLIN.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Havers, J.), February 4, 6, 1952.]

Divorce—Condonation—Sexual intercourse—No intention by petitioner to effect reconciliation.

In 1947 the wife deserted the husband, and thereafter, whenever he visited her, she received him with rudeness and abuse and affirmed her refusal to return to him. On Mar. 26, 1951, however, she invited him to visit her and received him cordially. On this and subsequent occasions she asked him to live with her again, but he replied that he needed time to think it over. On Apr. 3, 1951, at the wife's invitation the husband stayed the night with her and "reluctantly gave in" to her and had sexual intercourse. On the following day he told her that he would not agree to live with her again. On the husband's petition for divorce on the ground of desertion, HELD: the fact that the husband had sexual intercourse with the wife with full knowledge of her offence of desertion constituted condonation of that offence, it being immaterial that the husband did not have the intercourse with the express object of effecting a reconciliation.

UNDEFENDED PETITION by the husband for divorce on the ground of desertion.

During the desertion there had been one act of sexual intercourse between the parties, but it was contended for the husband that this did not amount to condonation since (i) he did not have intercourse with the express object of effecting a reconciliation, and (ii) the intercourse had been induced by a false and fraudulent misrepresentation of fact by the wife.

Victor Russell for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 6. HAVERS, J.: This was a husband's petition for divorce on the ground of desertion. The suit was undefended, but in the course of the evidence a question arose to which counsel for the husband thought the attention of the court should be directed. Therefore, I reserved my judgment so that I might analyse the evidence in the light of the authorities.

The parties were married on July 29, 1939, and lived together at various places. The marriage was reasonably happy until the husband was demobilised in December, 1945. Shortly after that date, his wife's attitude changed entirely. She became very quarrelsome and hysterical, and her temper was very bad. She used to throw things at her husband and lock food away from him. In July, 1947, she left him and never returned. I am satisfied that she then deserted her husband and that that desertion continued until an occasion in April, 1951, when he had sexual intercourse with her.

[HIS LORDSHIP said that the husband called to see his wife on a number of occasions, but she was rude and abusive, and when he asked her to return to him she said she would never do so. After the husband had filed his petition, on several occasions the wife asked him to go and see her, and, when he did so, she asked him to stop the night, which he refused to do. On Apr. 3, 1951, however, which was the wife's birthday, at her request he took her out. He saw her home and she asked him to stay the night. He did so. When the parties went to bed the wife started to make love to him and he reluctantly gave in and had connexion with her. He said in evidence that he had not then made up his mind whether he would go back to her.]

HIS LORDSHIP continued: Therefore, it is beyond dispute that on that occasion the husband, who had full knowledge of the matrimonial offence of desertion which his wife had committed, did have sexual intercourse with her. The next morning when they were sitting down to breakfast, the wife said: "I do not need your answer now, I have got it." The husband said he did not see how she had got his answer. Later that day, when he had finished his work, he went to see her again, and he said that, on thinking things over, he did not think that they would be happy together. The wife flew into a temper and said they could both go their own ways and have separate beds. She called him a "dirty rat" and wanted him to stay the night. He refused, and she then cried and became hysterical. He said his wife's crying upset him and he did stay the night. He got into bed with her. She started to make love to him again, but he refused to have anything to do with her. On Apr. 6 he wrote a letter to her saying that he could not agree to live with her again, even if they went their own ways as she had suggested.

It has been laid down in Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (1), that sexual intercourse is a condonation of the wife's adultery unless she induced it by a fraudulent mis-statement of fact. VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., who delivered the leading opinion, said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 45):

"The essence of the matter is (taking the case where it is the wife who has been guilty of the matrimonial offence) that the husband with knowledge of the wife's offence should forgive her and should confirm his forgiveness by reinstating her as his wife. Whether this further reinstatement goes to the length of connubial intercourse depends on circumstances, for there may be cases where it is enough to say that the wife has been received back into the position of wife in the home, though further intercourse has not taken place. But where it has taken place, this will, subject to one exception, amount to clear proof that the husband has carried his forgiveness into effect. The exception is that, if the intercourse was induced by a fraudulent mis-statement of fact by the wife, that circumstance will prevent the husband's actions from having the effect of condonation, for example, in Roberts v. Roberts & Temple (2), where the husband petitioned for a dissolution of his marriage on the ground of the wife's adultery and it appeared that she had confessed the adultery but had denied, in answer to his question, that she was pregnant in consequence of it, whereupon the husband forgave her and had marital relations with her. It was held by HILL, J., that, since the wife knew she was pregnant and had induced the acts of her husband by false and fraudulent statements, he had not condoned her adultery and was entitled to his decree. I think this decision was right and the view subsequently expressed by McCARDIE, J., in Cramp v. Cramp & Freeman (3), should not be understood to cover the exceptional case where the guilty party has made a deliberately false statement and has thereby brought about a situation which would otherwise have been proof of condonation."

Towards the end of his speech where VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., is dealing with the nature of condonation, he said (ibid., 46):

"Condonation is not a contract at all; it is the overlooking of past wrongs accompanied by action on the part of the aggrieved spouse which shows that they are really forgiven, and the circumstance that the guilty party, before or at the time of condonation, makes promises as to future conduct cannot lead to the consequence that previous offences are no longer condoned, if and when the promises are afterwards repudiated. The result might be different if it could be shown that the husband's forgiveness and taking back of his wife was procured by the wife deliberately misrepresenting her true state of mind, for, as BOWEN, L.J., said in a well-known passage, the state of a person's mind, when it can be definitely ascertained, may be as much a fact as the state of his digestion (Edgington v. Fitzmaurice (4), 29 Ch.D. 483)."

Counsel for the husband particularly relied on that passage.

The application of this principle was further considered by the Divisional Court in Viney v. Viney (5), where the learned President, dealing with Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (1), said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 208):

"LORD SIMON said . . . there may be a reinstatement without sexual intercourse, but, as against the husband, if there is sexual intercourse and no fraud, that is conclusive of the fact that the husband has confirmed his forgiveness by reinstating his wife as his wife."

I happened to be a member of that court and I expressed complete concurrence in the judgment of LORD MERRIMAN, P., on that issue.

The first point taken by counsel for the husband in the present case was that the husband did not have sexual intercourse with his wife with the express object of trying to effect a reconciliation, and it was contended that that fact distinguished this case from Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (1) and Viney v. Viney (5). It seems to me that the intent which the husband has at the time he has sexual intercourse with his wife, he having full knowledge of her matrimonial offence, is completely immaterial. It is the fact that he has sexual intercourse with the wife which, in my view, constitutes condonation, he having full knowledge of her matrimonial offence.

The main contention put forward by counsel for the husband was that, accepting the principle laid down in Henderson v. Henderson & Crellin (1), on the facts of this case I ought to hold that the wife had induced the husband to have sexual intercourse with her by a false and fraudulent misrepresentation of fact. I invited counsel to point to any specific representation made by the wife which was false and fraudulent and he was unable to do so, but he contended that, looking at the whole of the statements made by the wife and her conduct prior to the act of sexual intercourse taking place, the wife was representing that she had a genuine desire and intention to live again with her husband as his wife. He contended that that intention was not genuine, that she never had any such intention, and that the only intention she had in her mind was to try to procure some more money from him and possibly also to frustrate the divorce proceedings which he was contemplating. Even assuming that the wife did make such a representation, I am unable to hold that it was false and fraudulent. Counsel relied on the statement which the wife made to the husband the morning after they had slept together: "I do not need your answer now. I have got it". He urged that that showed that the wife's intention was not a genuine intention to live with her husband again as his wife. I find myself unable to accept that as satisfactory evidence of the falseness of the wife's representation. I have to be satisfied not only that the wife made a false and fraudulent statement, but that the husband was thereby induced to have sexual intercourse with his wife. I am quite unable to come to any such conclusion. In my view, the wife was not appealing to the mind of the husband, trying to convince him in that way by means of a representation which was false. Her appeal was to his senses. On the evidence I am unable to find that the husband was induced by any false representation to have sexual intercourse with his wife.

Petition dismissed.

R. v. MANCHESTER LEGAL AID COMMITTEE.

Ex parte R. A. BRAND & CO., LTD.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Jones and Parker, JJ.), February 4, 5, 14, 1952.]

Certiorari—Legal aid—Decision of local committee granting certificate—Excess of jurisdiction.

Legal Aid—Assisted person—Trustee in bankruptcy—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), s. 2 (1)—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 4 (1) (3).

A local committee under the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, granted a civil aid certificate to a trustee in bankruptcy in order that he might appear as and for the plaintiff in a High Court action which had been commenced by the bankrupt against the applicants, a previous certificate granted to the bankrupt having been revoked by the committee on his bankruptcy. The National Assistance Board and the committee considered only the financial circumstances of the bankrupt and took no account of the fact that the trustee was an accountant with a disposable income in excess of £420 per year, the statutory limit imposed by the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, s. 2 (1). On an application by the applicants for an order of certiorari to quash the legal aid certificate on the ground that the committee had exceeded their jurisdiction,

HELD: (i) under the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 4 (1), it was a condition precedent to the grant of a certificate that there should have been a determination by the National Assistance Board of the disposable income and capital of the person applying for the certificate; a trustee in bankruptcy, vis-à-vis his opponent, was personally liable for costs; no determination under reg. 4 (1) had been made in regard to the trustee's disposable income or capital, but only in regard to that of the bankrupt; the provisions of reg. 4 (3) were not in substitution for those of reg. 4 (1), but, in the case of a trustee or other person mentioned in the paragraph, they imposed a further condition precedent to the grant of a certificate; and, therefore, the committee had exceeded their jurisdiction.

(ii) the local committee, a body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects, had a duty to act judicially; the applicants, as persons who had incurred the risks inherent in having to defend an action brought by a person who had been granted legal aid, were "persons aggrieved"; and, therefore, an order for certiorari would be granted.

MOTION for certiorari to bring up and quash a civil aid certificate dated Mar. 22, 1951, entitling a trustee in bankruptcy to legal aid in connection with proceedings in the Queen's Bench Division instituted by the bankrupt and continued by the trustee in that capacity against the applicants. It was contended for the applicants that the local legal aid committee had no power to grant the certificate because there had not been any determination of the financial position of the trustee but only of the means of the bankrupt. The committee contended that their proceedings were not subject to certiorari because they acted in an administrative and not a judicial capacity, and also that the applicants were not aggrieved persons. Cur. adv. vult. D

Feb. 14. PARKER, J., read the following judgment of the court. In this case counsel moves on behalf of the applicants, R. A. Brand & Co., Ltd., for an order of certiorari to remove into this court and to quash a civil aid certificate dated Mar. 22, 1951, entitling one Frank Higginson Walsh to legal aid under Part I of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, in connection with proceedings in the Queen's Bench Division continued by him as trustee in bankruptcy of one Leonard Brooks, carrying on business as L. Brooks & Company, against the said applicants. E

The facts leading up to the granting of this certificate can be stated shortly as follows. Brooks was in business as a photographic and film processor, and in 1948 he agreed to purchase from the applicants large quantities of paper for backing films. On Nov. 17, 1948, a balance of some £343 was due to the applicants in respect of paper delivered and the applicants issued a writ claiming that amount. On Dec. 20, 1948, Brooks delivered a defence, and on Nov. 24, 1949, he delivered an amended defence and counterclaimed some £6,000 as damages on the ground that the paper delivered from time to time had proved unfit. On Mar. 8, 1950, the case came on for trial, by consent the counterclaim was withdrawn without prejudice to the bringing of a fresh action, and judgment was given on the claim. That judgment was not satisfied, and, on Apr. 11, 1950, a bankruptcy notice was served. On Apr. 13, 1950, Brooks issued a writ claiming damages for breach of contract and warranty in connection with the paper delivered, and by the statement of claim, delivered on June 30, 1950, he formulated a claim to damages in a sum of £9,233. On July 31, 1950, the Divisional Court in Bankruptcy stayed proceedings on the bankruptcy notice on the debtor undertaking to prosecute the action and paying the sum of £300 to a stake holder by Oct. 3, 1950. This was not done and, on Nov. 22, 1950, Leonard Brooks was adjudicated bankrupt and the trustee became his trustee in bankruptcy. F

The position with regard to the estate was that, apart from the bankrupt's claim against the applicants and sundry small book debts amounting in the aggregate to about £9,260, there were assets of about £274 as against liabilities G H of about £3,340. The main creditors were South London Press Pictures (£1,200), in respect of the processing of the paper; the applicants (£354), in respect of the judgment; Edwin Brooks (£300), a relative, in respect of a loan; Williams Deacons Bank, Ltd. (£504), in respect of a loan against security; and Alec Barker (£673), a solicitor, in respect of costs. Assuming, therefore, as we do for the purposes of this motion, that the bankrupt's claim against the applicants was worth some £9,000, that sum, if recovered, would enure as to £3,340 for the benefit of the creditors and as to about £6,000 for the benefit of the bankrupt. About the time of the bankruptcy Brooks had applied for legal aid, and, on Nov. 24, 1950—two days after the adjudication—he was granted a certificate of legal aid. On Dec. 18, 1950, this certificate was discharged at the instance of the bankrupt, his claim being then vested in his trustee in bankruptcy. Thereafter the trustee consulted the creditors with a view to getting an indemnity against costs in the event of his continuing the action against the applicants. The creditors were, however, not willing to give him an indemnity, and he conceived the idea of seeking to obtain legal aid himself.

The relevant provisions with regard to the obtaining of legal aid are as follows. By s. 1 (6) of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, it is provided:

“A person shall not be given legal aid in connection with any proceedings unless he shows that he has reasonable grounds for taking, defending or being a party thereto, and may also be refused legal aid if it appears unreasonable that he should receive it in the particular circumstances of the case.”

By s. 2 (1) it is provided:

“Subject to this Part of this Act, legal aid shall be available for any person whose disposable income does not exceed £420 a year: Provided that a person may be refused legal aid if he has a disposable capital of more than £500 and it appears that he can afford to proceed without legal aid.”

By s. 4 (6) it is provided:

“Subject to the provisions of this section, a person's disposable income and disposable capital, and the maximum amount of his contribution to the legal aid fund in respect of any proceedings, shall be determined by the National Assistance Board, and the board may call attention to any special circumstances affecting the maximum amount of the lump sum and periodical payments which he could reasonably make on account of any contributions.”

By s. 8 (1), (3), (8) and (9), it is provided:

“(1) Subject to this Part of this Act, it shall be the responsibility of the Law Society to make arrangements, in accordance with a scheme made by them with the approval of the Lord Chancellor and with the concurrence of the Treasury, for securing that legal aid and legal advice are available as required by this Part of this Act and generally to administer this Part of this Act. (3) The functions of the Law Society under this Part of this Act may be performed by the Council of the Law Society in general consultation with the General Council of the Bar on matters of policy or by any committee of the Council of the Law Society or by any committee set up by a scheme under this section. (8) Subject to this Part of this Act, a scheme under this section may include provisions as to the persons by whom and manner in which questions arising in the administration of this Part of this Act are to be determined and as to any other matters incidental to the administration thereof. (9) The Law Society shall exercise their functions under this Part of this Act under the general guidance of the Lord Chancellor, and as soon as possible after the end of any financial year shall make an annual report to him on the operation and finance of this Part of this Act during that year.”

In pursuance of the Act, a scheme known as the "Legal Aid Scheme, 1950", was duly prepared and approved, and under that scheme the country was divided into areas and an area committee was set up in respect of each area, and each such committee appointed local committees within that area. By the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 3, made under the said Act, it was provided:

"(1) Any person desiring legal aid may apply for a certificate—(a) if resident in England or Wales, to any local committee; and (b) if resident elsewhere, to the local committee for London. (2) Every application shall be made in writing, on a form approved by the Law Society, or in such other manner, being in writing, as the secretary of the local committee may accept as sufficient in the circumstances of the case and shall be lodged with the secretary of the local committee. (3) Every application shall contain such information and shall be accompanied by such documents as may be requisite to enable—(a) a local committee to determine—(i) the nature of the proceedings in relation to which legal aid is sought and the circumstances in which legal aid is required; and (ii) the question whether it is reasonable that a certificate should be granted; and (b) the [National Assistance Board] to determine the disposable income and disposable capital of the applicant, for which purpose the applicant shall undertake to furnish the board with such further information as they may require in the circumstances of the case".

By reg. 4 (1) it is provided:

"Subject to the provisions of reg. 10, an application for a certificate shall not be approved, except after consideration by a local committee of the general circumstances in which it is made, including questions of fact or law arising out of any proceedings to which the application relates, nor, except as is provided by para. (3) of reg. 5, shall any application be approved except after determination by the board of the disposable income and disposable capital . . ."

The trustee in bankruptcy, accordingly, completed the approved form of application for a civil aid certificate to take proceedings (Form A.1) and sent it to the local committee. The whole form was not produced before us, but, as we understand the matter, the statement formed, or was intended to form, Part III of the form. Part IV of the form, the part to be sent on by the local committee to the National Assistance Board, was produced at the hearing. It is headed: "Statement of financial circumstances of an applicant for a civil aid certificate". Then there is set out the name and address of the trustee in bankruptcy and his occupation as chartered accountant, and then, in answer to the question: "Have you any persons dependent upon you?", he says: "I am trustee in bankruptcy of the estate of Leonard Brooks". Thereafter, in answer to the questions as to the persons living with him, the rent that he pays, whether he or his wife owns the house, as to his annual income, and as to his savings, he answers with the initials "N.A." (not applicable). Finally, in answer to the question whether there is any additional information affecting his financial circumstances, he says: "The only material financial circumstances are those of the bankrupt, to whom a civil aid certificate was granted prior to adjudication."

A study of this statement and Part IV shows, and, indeed, it is admitted, that both the trustee in bankruptcy and the local committee took the view, perfectly bona fide no doubt, that in the case of a trustee in bankruptcy his own disposable income was quite irrelevant and that it was the disposable income of the bankrupt which alone was relevant, if, indeed, in the case of a trustee the limit of disposable income applied. What the local committee appear to have overlooked was that a trustee in bankruptcy is, vis-à-vis his opponent, personally liable for costs like any other litigant. Accordingly, the local committee passed on Part IV of the form to the board, who, in turn, took the same view and determined the disposable income of the trustee in bankruptcy as trustee and his maximum contribution to the Legal Aid Fund as "nil". Thereupon, the local committee, having considered the application and the board's determination, on Mar. 22, 1951, issued a certificate. This certificate reads as follows:

"This is to certify that Frank Higginson Walsh, hereinafter called 'the assisted person', is entitled, in accordance with the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, and the regulations and scheme made thereunder, to legal aid as plaintiff in connection with the following proceedings, . . . This is further to certify that (1) the assisted person's solicitor is Alec Barker, Esq; (2) the National Assistance Board have determined the assisted person's disposable income as nil, his disposable capital as nil, and his maximum contribution as nil; (3) the local committee have assessed the assisted person's contribution at nil."

As a result, on June 16, 1951, notice was given to the applicants' solicitors that a civil aid certificate dated Mar. 22, 1951, had been issued to the trustee in bankruptcy in connection with the proceedings against the applicants. They were not unnaturally somewhat surprised that legal aid had been granted to an eminent accountant whose disposable income was clearly in excess of £420 a year, and these proceedings were instituted alleging that in granting the certificate the local committee had exceeded its jurisdiction, that they (the applicants) were persons aggrieved, and praying that the certificate should be quashed.

Accordingly, the first question which arises is whether the local committee exceeded their jurisdiction. Prima facie they did, since it is, under reg. 4 (1) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, a condition precedent to the grant of a certificate that there shall have been a "determination by the board of the disposable income and disposable capital of the applicant", and it is conceded that the board have not made any such determination in regard to the applicant's disposable income or capital, but have made a determination in regard to disposable income and capital of the bankrupt. It was faintly argued that the board were entitled to do this by reason of the Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1358), sched. I, Part I, para. 9, and sched. II, Part I, para. 16, which enable the board in special circumstances to adjust the amount of income or capital calculated in accordance with the schedule in such way as may be appropriate in those circumstances. In our view, however, those paragraphs cannot enable the board in effect to substitute the bankrupt's income and capital for that of the applicant.

It was further faintly argued that by reason of reg. 4 (3) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations there was in the case of a trustee in bankruptcy no limitation of income above which legal aid could not be granted. That regulation provides:

"Where an application for a certificate is made by a trustee, executor, administrator or other person in circumstances in which, in the opinion of a local committee, a court would order the taxed costs of the proceedings to be paid out of a property, estate or fund, the committee shall not grant the application unless it appears that the property, estate or fund would be so diminished or exhausted by that order as to cause hardship to any person beneficially interested."

It seems to us, however, clear that this provision is not in substitution of an income limit, but is, in the case of a trustee, executor, or administrator, a further condition precedent to the granting of a certificate. Nor can it be validly contended that, since the determination of the board, except in certain events, is final (see reg. 9 (2) of the Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) Regulations), the local committee were in this case acting within their jurisdiction in granting the certificate. In fact, there has been no valid determination by the board and the local committee have been privy to the invalidity in themselves passing on Part IV of the application to the board.

The truth of the matter is that at the moment there are no specific provisions dealing with the position of a trustee in bankruptcy in relation to the income test. That a special provision could be made is clear from s. 12 (3) of the Act, where it is provided:

"Regulations may also modify any provision of this Part of this Act so far as appears to the Lord Chancellor necessary to meet the special circumstances where—(a) a person seeking or receiving legal aid or advice . . . (ii) is concerned in a representative, fiduciary or official capacity."

It may be, but this is not a matter for this court, that some special provisions should be made, but at the moment there are none. It follows, therefore, that in the present case the local committee, acting perfectly bona fide and in an attempt to do what seemed right in the peculiar circumstances of this case, have exceeded their jurisdiction.

The next, and, perhaps, the more important question, is whether the local committee is a body against whom the remedy by way of certiorari will lie. It has been urged on us that, if it does not, here is a body (who, in effect, now recognise their mistake) who cannot be controlled by anyone. There is no appeal from them except by an applicant who has been refused a certificate. Further, though reg. 11 of the Legal Aid (Assessment of Resources) Regulations, 1950, enables the board with the consent of the committee to correct a determination by making an amended one, it is by no means clear that any committee can discharge or revoke the existing certificate. Regulation 11 of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations enables an area committee to discharge a certificate, but only in the circumstances there set out, none of which would seem applicable in the present case. While appreciating the force of this contention it does not seem to us that it is a matter which we ought to take into consideration in determining whether certiorari lies against the local committee. Either the remedy is available or it is not, regardless of the odd result which might follow in the latter event. The fact that there is no appeal, other than by an aggrieved applicant, does not of itself make the committee amenable to certiorari.

In considering this question it is sufficient, at any rate in the present case, to start with the principle, so often quoted, of ATKIN, L.J., in R. v. Electricity Comrs. Ex p. London Electricity Joint Committee Co. (1920), Ltd. (1) ([1924] 1 K.B. 204):

"The question now arises whether the persons interested are entitled to the remedy which they now claim in order to put a stop to the unauthorised proceedings of the commissioners. The matter comes before us upon rules for writs of prohibition and certiorari which have been discharged by the Divisional Court. Both writs are of great antiquity, forming part of the process by which the King's Courts restrain courts of inferior jurisdiction from exceeding their powers. Prohibition restrains the tribunal from proceeding further in excess of jurisdiction; certiorari requires the record or the order of the court to be sent up to the King's Bench Division, to have its legality inquired into, and, if necessary, to have the order quashed. It is to be noted that both writs deal with questions of excessive jurisdiction, and doubtless in their origin dealt almost exclusively with the jurisdiction of what is described in ordinary parlance as a court of justice. But the operation of the writs has extended to control the proceedings of bodies which do not claim to be, and would not be recognised as, courts of justice. Wherever any body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects, and having the duty to act judicially, act in excess of their legal authority they are subject to the controlling jurisdiction of the King's Bench Division exercised in these writs."

Whether or not ATKIN, L.J., was there laying down an exhaustive definition of the bodies against whom certiorari lies it is unnecessary for us to determine and for the purposes of this judgment it is sufficient to assume that the definition is exhaustive. That the local committee was a body of persons having legal authority to determine questions affecting the rights of subjects was admitted and, indeed, is clear. The real contest in the present case is whether they also had the duty to act judicially. It was contended on behalf of the committee that there is no duty to act judicially unless the proceedings are judicial or quasi-judicial proceedings in the sense that there is some form of "lis" and there is a duty to hear both sides. This argument is supported by reference to R. v. London County Council. Ex p. Entertainments Protection Asscn., Ltd. (2), where SCRUTTON, L.J., said ([1931] 2 K.B. 233):

"An argument has been addressed to us, supported by a number of dicta in cases where the question was not raised, that this procedure of the Theatres Committee was not in any way a judicial act, but was an administrative act, and that if, in administration, they were doing a thing which they had no power to do, the writ of certiorari was not the proper means of questioning that action of theirs, though it was a usurped jurisdiction. Now in the early days of licensing there have been authorities bearing one way and the other, on the question whether the action of licensing justices is a judicial act, so that certiorari may lie, or is an administrative act, so that certiorari will not lie. The writ of certiorari is a very old and high prerogative writ drawn up for the purpose of enabling the Court of King's Bench to control the action of inferior courts and to make it certain that they shall not exceed their jurisdiction; and therefore the writ of certiorari is intended to bring into the High Court the decision of the inferior tribunal, in order that the High Court may be certified whether the decision is within the jurisdiction of the inferior court. There has been a great deal of discussion and a large number of cases extending the meaning of 'court'. It is not necessary that it should be a court in the sense in which this court is a court; it is enough if it is exercising, after hearing evidence, judicial functions in the sense that it has to decide on evidence between a proposal and an opposition; and it is not necessary to be strictly a court; if it is a tribunal which has to decide rights after hearing evidence and opposition, it is amenable to the writ of certiorari; and I do not discuss further the nature of the writ, because very elaborate discussions of it will be found in the recent cases of R. v. Electricity Comrs. (1) and R. v. Minister of Health. Ex p. Davis (3). As far as licensing is concerned, whatever doubts there were in the early stages of the proceedings—and there were many doubts—since the case of R. v. Woodhouse (4) it is quite clear that every proceeding of magistrates or confirming authorities in granting new or renewing old licences is in the nature of a court, excess of jurisdiction in which can be dealt with by the writ of certiorari; and the procedures in granting licences under the Cinematograph Act, and proceedings consequential thereon, appear to me to stand exactly on the same footing as the proceedings of magistrates or confirming authorities dealing with licences for public houses."

Reference was also made to Errington v. Minister of Health (5), where MAUGHAM, L.J., said ([1935] 1 K.B. 271):

"In determining whether the position of the Minister is that which I have described as being quasi-judicial, I think it is necessary to appreciate that under a clearance area scheme to which objections are made by the owners of the property in the area, there is a true contest as between the owners of the property and the local authority; in other words, there are two sides as between whom the Minister has to come to a determination after consideration. It also has to be borne in mind that the rights of the householders are being very seriously affected by an order that their houses shall be demolished without compensation. That, of course, must not be pressed too far, but it is a consideration which cannot be neglected."

Again, ROCHE, L.J., said (ibid., 280):

"It is sufficient to say that whereas it is sometimes contended that the principles of natural justice are vague and difficult to ascertain, fortunately the principles of British justice have been authoritatively laid down; and they at all events extend to the assertion of this principle, that where judicial functions, or quasi-judicial functions, have to be exercised by a court or by a board, or any body of persons, it is necessary and essential in the words of LORD LOREBURN in Board of Education v. Rice (6), which have already been cited, that they must always give a fair opportunity to those who are parties in the controversy to correct or to contradict any relevant statement prejudicial to their view. In other words those principles of British justice proceed upon the basis that both sides have a right to be heard."

The test contended for on behalf of the committee would, however, appear to be in conflict with a long line of cases. Thus, in R. v. Saunders (7), orders of sessions allowing certain expenses were quashed. CROMPTON, J., said (3 E. & B. 778):

"Passing accounts is a judicial act; those who do so ought to examine, and allow or disallow according to law; and, this being a judicial act, and the certiorari not being taken away, we are bound, if it appears that an illegal item has been passed, to grant a certiorari and to quash the illegal allowance."

Again, in R. v. Woodhouse (4), it was held that certiorari would lie to bring up and quash an order made by licensing justices. VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., said ([1906] 2 K.B. 512):

"I ask myself, therefore, the question whether the licensing justices in granting or refusing a licence do a judicial act. In my opinion the grant or refusal of such a licence is a judicial act, and the judgment of LORD HALSBURY in Sharp v. Wakefield (8) seems to be an authority for this view; for he says, as appears on p. 179 of the report ([1891] A.C. 173) that 'an extensive power is confided to the justices in their capacity as justices to be exercised judicially, and discretion means, when it is said that something is to be done within the discretion of the authorities, that that something has to be done according to the rules of reason and justice, not according to private opinion, according to law, and not humour; it is to be, not arbitrary, vague, and fanciful, but legal and regular'. This view seems to me to be confirmed by old and recent decisions. It is impossible to read under the title 'certiorari' in BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE the list of the cases in which a writ of certiorari has been granted and the grounds for granting it without seeing that in practice a certiorari has issued in cases in which it is impossible to say that there was a court and a 'lis'."

In R. v. Postmaster-General. Ex p. Carmichael (9) the certificate of the chief medical officer of the Post Office certifying that one Carmichael, a clerk, was not suffering from telegraphist's cramp was quashed. Under the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, it was a condition precedent to a clerk obtaining workmen's compensation for telegraphist's cramp that he should obtain the certificate of the certifying surgeon that he was suffering from that condition. It was held that the chief medical officer of the Post Office has not been validly substituted for the certifying surgeon. All the members of the court were clear that such a certificate was a fit subject for certiorari, though it is only right to say that the matter does not appear to have been fully argued. LORD HEWART, C.J., says ([1928] 1 K.B. 296):

"There was a moment in this case when it was argued that the document was of such a kind as not to be proper for the writ of certiorari. But I am satisfied, when I look at the part which a certificate of this nature must play in the making of any claim for compensation by a Post Office worker suffering from telegraphist's cramp, that the certificate of the certifying surgeon is of the nature of a judicial act, and is a fit subject for certiorari."

Finally, in R. v. Boycott. Ex p. Keadley (10), a decision of the Board of Education under the Mental Deficiency Act, 1913, whether a boy was or was not capable of receiving benefit from instruction was quashed. Reference may also be made to R. v. Coles (11) and R. v. White (12). In none of these cases, except possibly in R. v. Woodhouse (4), could it be said that the body in question had before it any form of lis or any duty to hear two sides, and we do not accept that test.

The true view, as it seems to us, is that the duty to act judicially may arise in widely different circumstances which it would be impossible, and, indeed, inadvisable, to attempt to define exhaustively. Where the decision is that of a court then, unless, as in the case, for instance, of justices granting excise licences, it is acting in a purely ministerial capacity, it is clearly under a duty to act judicially. When, on the other hand, the decision is that of an administrative body and is actuated in whole or in part by questions of policy, the duty to act judicially may arise in the course of arriving at that decision. Thus, if, in order to arrive at the decision, the body concerned has to consider proposals and objections and consider evidence, then there is the duty to act judicially in the course of that inquiry. That, as it seems to us, is the true basis of the decision in Errington v. Minister of Health (5). While the Minister's decision to confirm the clearance order was an administrative act for the purpose of which he was entitled and bound to take into consideration questions of policy, yet, before arriving at the decision, he had to consider the objections of the property owners and the views of the local authority. In other words, at one stage of the proceedings leading up to his decision there was something in the nature of a lis before him, and at that stage there was a duty to act judicially, as, for instance, not to hear one side behind the back of the other. Again, in R. v. London County Council (2), all that it seems to us SCRUTTON, L.J., was saying was that in the case of the London County Council it was enough to make them amenable to certiorari that they had to decide on evidence between a proposal and an opposition during which they had a duty to act judicially.

Further, an administrative body in ascertaining facts or law may be under a duty to act judicially notwithstanding that its proceedings have none of the formalities of and are not in accordance with the practice of a court of law. As LORD LOREBURN, L.C., said in Board of Education v. Rice (6) ([1911] A.C. 182):

"Comparatively recent statutes have extended, if they have not originated, the practice of imposing upon departments or officers of State the duty of deciding or determining questions of various kinds. In the present instance, as in many others, what comes for determination is sometimes a matter to be settled by discretion, involving no law. It will, I suppose, usually be of an administrative kind; but sometimes it will involve matter of law as well as matter of fact, or even depend upon matter of law alone. In such cases the Board of Education will have to ascertain the law and also to ascertain the facts. I need not add that in doing either they must act in good faith and fairly listen to both sides, for that is a duty lying upon every one who decides anything. But I do not think they are bound to treat such a question as though it were a trial. They have no power to administer an oath, and need not examine witnesses. They can obtain information in any way they think best, always giving a fair opportunity to those who are parties in the controversy for correcting or contradicting any relevant statement prejudicial to their view."

Again, in Local Government Board v. Arlidge (13), VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C., said ([1915] A.C. 132):

"My Lords, when the duty of deciding an appeal is imposed, those whose duty it is to decide it must act judicially. They must deal with the question referred to them without bias, and they must give to each of the parties the opportunity of adequately presenting the case made. The decision must be come to in the spirit and with the sense of responsibility of a tribunal whose duty it is to mete out justice. But it does not follow that the procedure of every such tribunal must be the same. In the case of a court of law tradition in this country has prescribed certain principles to which in the main the procedure must conform. But what that procedure is to be in detail must depend on the nature of the tribunal. In modern times it has become increasingly common for Parliament to give an appeal in matters which really pertain to administration, rather than to the exercise of the judicial functions of an ordinary court, to authorities whose functions are administrative and not in the ordinary sense judicial. Such a body as the Local Government Board has the duty of enforcing obligations on the individual which are imposed in the interests of the community. Its character is that of an organisation with executive functions. In this it resembles other great departments of the State. When, therefore, Parliament entrusts it with judicial duties, Parliament must be taken, in the absence of any declaration to the contrary, to have intended it to follow the procedure which is its own, and is necessary if it is to be capable of doing its work efficiently."

More recently it has been held by this court on many occasions that certiorari will lie to quash the decision of rent control tribunals, and this notwithstanding that such a tribunal is entitled to act on its own knowledge and information, without evidence, unless submitted, and without a hearing except on notice from a party: see R. v. Brighton & Area Rent Tribunal. Ex p. Marine Parade Estates (1936), Ltd. (14).

If, on the other hand, an administrative body in arriving at its decision at no stage has before it any form of lis and throughout has to consider the question from the point of view of policy and expediency, it cannot be said that it is under a duty at any stage to act judicially: compare Franklin v. Minister of Town & Country Planning (15) ([1947] 2 All E.R. 295). The present case, as it seems to us, is an a fortiori case. Though the local committees may be said to be administrative bodies in the sense that they are responsible for administering the Legal Aid and Advice Act, they are quite unconcerned with questions of policy. They cannot refuse legal aid because the fund is becoming depleted or because they think that certain forms of action should be discouraged. They have to decide the matter solely on the facts of the particular case, solely on the evidence before them and apart from any extraneous considerations. In other words, they must act judicially, not judiciously. It seems to us that the present case is closely akin to the cases of R. v. Postmaster-General. Ex p. Carmichael (9) and R. v. Boycott. Ex p. Keasley (10). The certifying surgeon in the former case and the Board of Education certifying medical officer in the latter case were concerned solely with the facts of the particular case, facts presented to them ex parte, and it was not for them to take into consideration any questions of policy or expediency.

The last question which arises is whether the applicants are persons aggrieved. If so, certiorari will be granted ex debito justitiae. In R. v. Richmond Confirming Authority. Ex p. Howitt (16), EARL OF READING, C.J. ([1921] 1 K.B. 255), quotes with approval R. v. Nicholson (17), where A. L. SMITH, L.J., said ([1899] 2 Q.B. 470):

"But, assuming certiorari to be the fitting remedy, as a matter of discretion the certiorari ought not to go. First, on the ground of delay . . . ; and, second, on the fact that the applicants have not shown, as it appears by R. v. Surrey JJ. (18) they should have shown, that they have a peculiar grievance of their own beyond some inconvenience suffered by them in common with the rest of the public."

That was a case of licensing justices having issued a licence without jurisdiction and in spite of an objection made by the applicants for certiorari, who were rival traders, but the principle is clearly laid down.

In the present case the applicants seem to us to be persons aggrieved within this principle. They are persons who incur the risks inherent in having to fight a party who has legal aid. Indeed, the legislation contemplates that they are persons interested in that reg. 15 (2) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations provides that when a party to proceedings becomes an assisted person, his solicitor shall forthwith serve all other parties with a notice in Form VI in the schedule to those regulations. It is true that, if the action was fought to judgment and the applicants succeeded, they might, before the trial judge, prove the matters proved before us, and persuade him that the certificate should be treated as a nullity, as was done by the Court of Appeal in Greenwood v. Sketcher (19), but it seems to us that they should not be forced to take this course. In the premises an order of certiorari will be granted, and the civil aid certificate will be quashed.

Following the judgment an argument took place on the question of costs.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The trustee in bankruptcy, in opposing this motion for certiorari, obtained a legal aid certificate on the same grounds as he obtained the original legal aid certificate. We have held that the legal aid certificate was granted without jurisdiction and, therefore, we shall treat the legal aid certificate granted to oppose this application in exactly the same way as the Court of Appeal did in the case of Greenwood v. Sketcher (19), as a nullity, and the trustee in bankruptcy as a person not legally aided. Then the question arises as to the costs of this application. In the absence of misconduct we never order a tribunal whose order is quashed to pay the costs, but if the party affected chooses to come and oppose, he is as liable to costs as any other person. Therefore, we make the order here that this order for certiorari is made and the trustee in bankruptcy must pay the costs.

Order for certiorari.

PAVIA & CO., S.P.A. v. THURMANN-NIELSEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), February 18, 1952.]

Sale of Goods—Payment—Confirmed credit—Time for opening credit.

Sellers contracted to sell three thousand tons of Brazilian groundnuts for shipment from Brazil to Genoa of the first fifteen hundred tons in February, March, or April, 1949, and of the second fifteen hundred tons in March, April, or May, at sellers' option, payment to be by the opening of a confirmed, irrevocable, divisible, transmissible, and transferable credit in favour of the sellers and utilisable by them against delivery of shipping documents. The sellers guaranteed the necessary Brazilian export licence and the buyers the necessary Italian import licence. The export licence was obtained on Feb. 9, 1949, and the sellers so advised the buyers on that day by cable, giving them certain particulars which the buyers required for opening the credit and requesting them to open the credit forthwith. The buyers did not make the credit available until Apr. 22.

HELD: in the absence of an express stipulation in the contract, the credit should have been opened, not when the sellers were ready to ship the goods, but at the beginning of the shipment period; on the facts of the present case the credit should have been made available, in the case of the first shipment on Feb. 9, when the particulars were supplied to the buyers, and, in the case of the second shipment, on Mar. 1, or as soon after those dates as it could have been opened by the exercise of reasonable diligence by the buyers; and, therefore, the buyers were liable in damages to the sellers for the delay.

Decision of McNAIR, J. ([1951] 2 All E.R. 866), affirmed.

APPEAL by the buyers from an order of McNAIR, J., dated Oct. 17, 1951, and reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 866, on a Special Case stated for the opinion of the court under the Arbitration Act, 1934, s. 9 (1) (a).

By a contract dated Jan. 20, 1949, the buyers agreed to buy from the sellers three thousand tons of Brazilian groundnuts, the contract providing for shipment from Brazil to Genoa as to the first fifteen hundred tons in February, March, or April, 1949, and as to the second fifteen hundred tons in March, April, or May, at the sellers' option, and for payment by confirmed credit utilisable by the sellers on delivery of shipping documents. The sellers claimed damages for delay in providing the credit which, they said, had taken place between Feb. 9, when the necessary particulars were supplied to the buyers, and Apr. 22, when the credit was made available. They contended that the buyers were under an obligation to make the credit available to the sellers, if they reasonably could, so that the sellers would have the whole of the shipping period prescribed by the contract available to them. The buyers submitted that they were under no obligation to open the credit until the sellers were ready to tender the documents or took steps to ship the goods. The arbitrators held that the buyers were in default in not opening the credit in due time and were liable in damages. McNAIR, J., in upholding the award, held that the credit should have been made available, as to the first shipment, on Feb. 9, and, as to the second shipment, on Mar. 1, or so soon thereafter as it could have been opened by the exercise of reasonable diligence on the part of the buyers.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of McNAIR, J., on a Special Case stated by the board of appeal of the Incorporated Oil Seed Association under s. 9 (1) (a) of the Arbitration Act, 1934. The dispute concerns a contract dated Jan. 20, 1949, which provided for the sale of about fifteen hundred tons of Brazilian groundnuts with an option to the sellers to raise that quantity to three thousand tons. The goods were to be shipped from Brazil to Genoa direct or indirect in February, March or April at the option of the sellers and partial shipments were authorised. The price was payable in United States dollars and there was a provision as to payment on which the present dispute turns:

“Payment: By opening of a confirmed, irrevocable, divisible, transmissible and transferable credit opened in favour of the sellers and utilisable by them against delivery of the following documents.”

The documents are bills of lading, weight note, analysis certificate and a commercial invoice. There is a provision for a weight certificate and then there is a provision to which I will refer although it does not ultimately affect the issue:

“The present contract is subject to the sellers obtaining the Brazilian export licence and to the buyers obtaining the Italian import licence before Jan. 31, 1949. If at that date the import and export licences have not been granted the buyers and the sellers have the right to cancel the present contract. A date later than Jan. 31 may be mutually agreed.”

On Jan. 31, 1949, there was a further contract, which incorporated and varied the first contract, the quantity agreed to be sold being increased to three thousand tons, fifteen hundred tons to be shipped February, March, April, and fifteen hundred tons March, April, May. At that date no export licence had been obtained, and this had to be done before the Italian import licence would be granted. The second contract contained a provision whereby the sellers guaranteed the Brazilian export licence and the buyers guaranteed the Italian import licence. All other conditions were to stand unchanged. On Feb. 9 the export licence was obtained, and the buyers were informed by cable and given further particulars. As from that date the sellers requested the buyers to open the credit throughout February and March. On Mar. 4 the buyers obtained their import licence and they repeatedly told the sellers that the credit would be available in a few days, but it was not made available before Apr. 22, 1949. The question on which the opinion of the court is sought is stated in the Case as follows:

“The question of law for the decision of the court as submitted on behalf of the [buyers] and agreed on behalf of the [sellers] is, when, on the facts found and the true construction of the contract, the credit under the said contract should have been opened by the [buyers] or made available to the [sellers].”

The matter came before McNAIR, J., and, after referring to some statements by SCRUTTON, L.J., in Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Hannay & Co. (1), Equitable Trust Co. of New York v. Dawson Partners Ltd. (2) and Guaranty Trust Co. of New York v. Van den Berghs (3) as to the general working of the credit system, he said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 869):

“Accordingly, the answer which I would give to the question of law submitted in the Case is that the date when the credit under the contract should have been opened by the buyers and made available to the sellers is, as regards the first fifteen hundred tons, at such time as it would have been opened or made available if the buyers had exercised reasonable diligence after Feb. 9 to obtain the opening and making available of the credit, and that, as regards the second fifteen hundred tons, the date on which the credit should have been opened is Mar. 1, 1949, or so soon thereafter as it could have been opened by the exercise of reasonable diligence by the buyers."

McNAIR, J., took Feb. 9 and not Feb. 1, which was the beginning of the shipment period for the first fifteen hundred tons, because, in his judgment, it was accepted as common ground that it was not until Feb. 9, when the export licence was obtained, that certain particulars which were required by the buyers for the opening of the credit were transmitted by the sellers to them. I would have no doubt that under this contract, apart from any question arising with regard to export licences, the obligation of the buyers was, prima facie, to open the credit on Feb. 1 and to have it opened and available as from that date. Naturally, if the original term with regard to licences had stood, either side could have cancelled because no licence was in existence on Jan. 31, but under the supplemental contract under which the sellers guaranteed the Brazilian export licence and the buyers guaranteed the Italian import licence, I should have thought that the sellers passed out of the picture so far as concerned the relevant date when the credit was to be opened, though it might well have been that, if that clause was in the original contract, the buyers should have been allowed a reasonable time after Feb. 1, because until that date it was not clear whether the deal would be on at all. But as the learned judge has taken Feb. 9 and not Feb. 1, that seems to me to be no longer of any importance.

The argument of counsel for the buyers was that normally delivery and payment are concurrent conditions. The sellers did not need the credit until they were ready to deliver and had got the bills of lading and could go to the bank and get their money. Counsel drew our attention to the cases referred to by the learned judge in which SCRUTTON, L.J., pointed out—as, of course, I accept—that the main object of the credit system is that the seller may get his money when he has shipped his goods, and, at any rate, in some forms of credit the buyer gets an interval of time before he has to meet bills. Whether under this particular form of credit there would be any interval between the time of its operation and the time when the buyer had to put his bank in credit I do not know, and, to my mind, it does not matter. I am quite clear that SCRUTTON, L.J., was not addressing himself to the problem which is at present before us. My view is that the suggestion which counsel for the buyers put forward—that the buyers under this form of contract were under no obligation until a date, which they could not possibly know and which there was no machinery for their finding out, namely, when the sellers actually had the goods at the port ready to be put in the ship—is unworkable. There are no words in the contract which would justify us in arriving at that result, and there is no reason why we should imply any such term into the contract. When a seller is given a right to ship over a period and there is machinery for payment, that machinery must be available over the whole of that period. If the buyer is anxious, as he might be if the period of shipment is a long one, not to have to put the credit machinery in motion until shortly before the seller is likely to want to ship, then he must insert some provision in the contract by which the credit shall be provided, e.g., fourteen days after a cable received from the seller. In the absence of any provision of that kind, I think the answer which the learned judge gave to the question posed is plainly right, and the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: The sale of goods across the world is now usually arranged by means of confirmed credits. The buyer requests his banker to open a credit in favour of the seller, and in pursuance of that request the banker or his foreign agent issues a confirmed credit in favour of the seller. This credit is a promise by the banker to pay money to the seller in return for the shipping documents. When the seller presents the documents, he gets paid the contract price. The conditions of the credit must be strictly fulfilled, otherwise the seller is not entitled to draw on it. The question in the present case is this. In a contract which provides for payment by confirmed credit, when must the buyer open the credit? In the absence of express stipulation, the credit must be made available to the seller at the beginning of the shipment period. The reason is because the seller is entitled, before he ships the goods, to be assured that, on shipment, he will get paid. The seller is not bound to tell the buyer the precise date when he is going to ship, and whenever he does ship the goods he must be able to draw on the credit. He may ship on the very first day of the shipment period. If the buyer is to fulfil his obligations, he must, therefore, make the credit available to the seller at the very first date when the goods may be lawfully shipped in compliance with the contract. I agree with the answer given by McNAIR, J., and that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Conflict of Laws—Legitimation—Validity of Austrian marriage—Retrospective effect of Austrian legislation—Determination according to Austrian law—Legitimacy Act, 1926 (c. 60), s. 1 (1)—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 17 (1).

On May 19, 1945, H. went through a ceremony of marriage in Austria with R. according to the rites of the Roman Catholic faith. At that time the German Marriage Law of 1938 was still in force, which required that a marriage, to be valid, must be contracted before the civil authorities. On June 26, 1945, the provisional government of Austria published an order, to take effect on June 30, 1945, whereby: "Marriages which were solemnized during the period from April 1, 1945, to the coming into force of this law before incompetent lay authorities or before ministers of a recognised church or religious community have the effect of a marriage solemnized at a register office in accordance with . . . the Marriage Law of . . . 1938, as from the day of solemnization, as soon as they have been entered in the Family Book kept by the register office". In July, 1945, R. and H. left Austria for a transit camp in Italy, and in the autumn of 1946 they came to England. In the summer of 1947 R. and H. parted, and subsequently H. met M., by whom, on Mar. 27, 1949, she gave birth to C., the petitioner. On July 18, 1949, the ceremony of marriage between R. and H. of May 19, 1945, was registered in accordance with the law of June 26, 1945. On Feb. 11, 1950, H. went through a ceremony of marriage at a register office with M., then a bachelor and domiciled in England. On a petition by C. for a declaration that M. and H. were lawfully married and that he, C., was rendered legitimate by and from the date of such marriage, HELD: the validity of the marriage between R. and H. must be decided according to Austrian law: Berthiaume v. Dastous ([1930] A.C. 79), applied; under the law of June 26, 1945, the ceremony between R. and H., though not originally valid, was constituted a valid marriage by its registration which validated it from the date of the ceremony; that registration occurred before the ceremony of Feb. 11, 1950; and, therefore, even assuming that by Feb. 11, 1950, H. had acquired an English domicile, on that date she was a married woman whose husband was still alive and was not free to marry M., with the result that there was no valid marriage between her and M. and the petitioner was not entitled to the declaration he sought.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 18. BARNARD, J., read the following judgment. This is a case under the Legitimacy Act, 1926, and the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 17, in which Krzysztof Jerzy Mieczyslaw Starkowski, an infant suing by his next friend, Henryka Antonia Starkowski, a married woman, seeks a declaration that Mieczyslaw Starkowski and Henryka Antonia Starkowski were lawfully married on Feb. 11, 1950, at the register office in the district of Croydon in the county borough of Croydon in the county of Surrey, and that, by the said marriage, the petitioner became legitimated as from the date of the said marriage. The petitioner and the parties cited in this case are all of Polish nationality, and, therefore, for the sake of brevity, I propose to refer to them by their English equivalent Christian names.

Both Henrica and Richard, the second party cited, were born at Cracow in Poland and lived there until the autumn of the year 1944, when they moved to Kitzbuehel in Austria. At the time Henrica was pregnant by Richard, and their evidence clearly shows that they were both anxious to marry, and, both being of the Roman Catholic faith, were anxious to be married in a church by a priest. They encountered many obstacles both from the priest and the civil registrar, but eventually, on May 19, 1945, they went through a ceremony of marriage at the parish church at Kitzbuehel according to the rites of the Roman Catholic faith. I am not satisfied on the evidence that there was any insuperable difficulty

A in their being married before a civil registrar in accordance with the law of Austria in force at that time. On June 12, 1945, Barbara, the third party cited, was born, and on June 16, 1945, she was registered as an illegitimate child, but on July 15, 1945, she was baptised as legitimate. Richard and Henrica lived together as man and wife until the summer of 1947, when they separated. In July, 1945, together with Barbara, they left Austria for a transit camp in Italy, and in the autumn of the year 1946 they all left Italy for England, Henrica and Barbara preceding Richard by about a month. Assuming that Henrica was a
B feme sole I have no doubt on the evidence before me that she then acquired an English domicile. Either towards the end of the year 1947 or early in the year 1948 Henrica met Michael, the first party cited, and on Mar. 27, 1949, Henrica gave birth to Christopher, the petitioner, of whom Michael was the father. On Feb. 11, 1950, Henrica married Michael, who was then a bachelor and domiciled in England, at the register office at Croydon.

I have heard the evidence of three expert witnesses on Austrian law, Doctors Bresch, Harpner and Abel, and it is clear from their evidence that on May 19, 1945, when Richard and Henrica went through the religious ceremony of marriage at Kitzbuehel, such ceremony did not constitute a valid marriage according to
C the law then in force in Austria. The German Marriage Law of July, 1938, was still in force and by that law a valid marriage could only be concluded before the civil authorities. On Apr. 27, 1945, Austria was liberated and there was a good deal of confusion in Austria at that time as to what was the law. The provisional government of Austria then published an order, No. 6, on May 1, 1945, repealing some of the German laws in force, but confirming for the time
D being the Marriage Act, 1938. On June 26, 1945, the provisional government of Austria published a further order, No. 31, to come into force on June 30, 1945, the relevant sections of which are as follows:

“Section 3 (1): Marriages which were solemnized during the period from Apr. 1, 1945, to the coming into force of this law before incompetent lay
E authorities or before ministers of a recognised church or religious community have the effect of a marriage solemnized at a register office in accordance with s. 15 et seq. of the Marriage Law of July 6, 1938*, as from the day of solemnization, as soon as they have been registered in the Family Book kept by the register office. (2) The offices in which such marriages have been solemnized shall forward without delay to the register
F office which would have been competent to solemnize the marriage at the time of its solemnization in respect of the bridegroom true copies of the entries made in their marriage register showing exactly the words, figures and letters. . . . Section 5 (1): The register offices are to enter in their register the occurrences affecting personal status communicated to them in accordance with ss. 3 and 4.”

G Section 4 relates to the registration of births and deaths during the period Apr. 1, 1945, to June 30, 1945. The ceremony of the marriage in question was eventually registered in accordance with s. 5 (1) on July 18, 1949.

Counsel on behalf of Richard and Barbara argued that the marriage was a valid marriage on the day that it was solemnized because at that time the parties to the ceremony were of Polish nationality, and, according to the evidence of H Dr. Lipnicki, an expert on Polish law, such a ceremony, even if not valid according to the law of the country where it took place, would be recognised as a valid marriage in the Austrian part of Poland, the form of such marriage being in accordance with the national law, namely, the law applicable to Austrian Poland. There can be no doubt that at that time they were also both domiciled in Poland. Dr. Lipnicki referred me to para. 7 of the Hague Convention, 1902, which was adopted as part of the law of Poland in the year 1939. Paragraph 7 reads as follows:

* German Official Gazette, I, p. 807.

"The marriage, which is not valid as to the form in the country where it was celebrated, could, nevertheless, be recognised as valid in other countries, if the form prescribed by the national law of each of the parties has been observed".

So far as English law is concerned, the answer to this argument is to be found in the judgment of the Privy Council delivered by VISCOUNT DUNEDIN in Berthiaume v. Dastous (1), which reads as follows ([1930] A.C. 83):

"If there is one question better settled than any other in international law, it is that as regards marriage—putting aside the question of capacity—locus regit actum. If a marriage is good by the laws of the country where it is effected, it is good all the world over, no matter whether the proceeding or ceremony which constituted marriage according to the law of the place would or would not constitute marriage in the country of the domicile of one or other of the spouses. If the so-called marriage is no marriage in the place where it is celebrated, there is no marriage anywhere, although the ceremony or proceeding if conducted in the place of the parties' domicile would be considered a good marriage."

I, therefore, reject this argument. Counsel further argued that the object of Law No. 31 was to validate such a ceremony of marriage as took place in this case, and that, therefore, on the passing of the Act the marriage became a valid marriage retrospectively as from the day of solemnization, and that the registration of such marriage was merely a ministerial act. This may or may not have been the intention of Law No. 31, but, in my view, the wording of s. 3 (1) is clear and unambiguous and states that such marriages shall have the effect of marriages solemnized at a register office in accordance with the Marriage Law of July 6, 1938, as from the day of solemnization, as soon as they have been registered in the Family Book kept by the register office, the German word for "as soon as" being "sobald." The three Austrian lawyers agreed that this ceremony of marriage was not validated until it was subsequently registered, although they did suggest that from the date of the passing of the Act up to registration its validity was in some way suspended. I have come to the conclusion that I must construe this Act according to its language. LORD SIMONDS states the importance of this in his opinion in the recent case of Magor & St. Mellons Rural District Council v. Newport Corpn. (2). To construe this law in any other way would necessitate altering the ordinary common sense meaning of the words used in the section.

I now come to what I think is the real point of law to be decided in this case. On behalf of Richard and Barbara it was argued that, in considering the validity of the English marriage, which took place on Feb. 11, 1950, the court must ask itself whether at that time both parties had the capacity to marry. Bearing in mind the religious ceremony of marriage which Henrica had gone through on May 19, 1945, in Austria, was Henrica free to marry on Feb. 11, 1950? Counsel submits that the answer should be "No", because the religious ceremony was made a valid marriage as from the date of the ceremony as soon as it was registered on July 18, 1949. This argument is supported by the Attorney-General. All three Austrian lawyers agree that the ceremony of marriage in Austria became a valid marriage on July 18, 1949, as from the date of solemnization. On the other hand, it was argued by counsel on behalf of the petitioner that Henrica arrived in England with the legal status of a spinster and thereafter acquired a domicile of choice in England, and that any subsequent foreign law could only have territorial effect, and, therefore, could not alter the status of a domiciled English woman. In support of this latter proposition I was referred to various authorities including Lynch v. Paraguay Provisional Government (3). In this case it was held that the government of Paraguay had no interest to question the will of the deceased, but LORD PENZANCE based his decision on the ground that succession to property in England of a deceased foreigner is regulated by the law of his place of domicile as it existed at the time of his death, and, therefore, no changes made in that law, even though having a retrospective operation, could by the law of this country be recognised as affecting the distribution of personal property in England. The basis of LORD PENZANCE's decision was approved by ROMER, J., in Re Aganoor's Trusts (4). The relevant time to consider the foreign law was at the time of death, but in the present case the relevant time is when the second ceremony of marriage took place. This case would have been a strong authority for the petitioner if the second ceremony of marriage had preceded the registration of the first ceremony of marriage.

In Scott v. A.-G. (5) the marriage was dissolved by a foreign court of competent jurisdiction which prohibited the guilty party from re-marrying as long as the innocent party remained unmarried. The guilty party came to England with the intention of living here permanently and re-married. It was held that English law would not have regard to the personal disability imposed by the foreign law. There is no question in the present case of the Austrian law imposing any such penalty. The Austrian lawyers, however, had suggested that there might be a state of suspended validity, which would operate to prevent a re-marriage between the coming into force of Law No. 31 and the actual registration. I might have had to consider this proposition if the registration had been effected after Feb. 11, 1950. I was also referred to a more recent case of Bank Voor Handel en Scheepvaart v. Slatford (6). In that case DEVLIN, J., was concerned with foreign legislation purporting to have effect on property within the territory of the United Kingdom and he held that such legislation would not be recognised by the English courts. In the course of his judgment ([1951] 2 All E.R. 787), DEVLIN, J., referred to a passage in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 5th ed., p. 20, on which counsel for the petitioner relies and which reads as follows:

"A State's authority, in the eyes of other States and the courts that represent them is, speaking very generally, coincident with, and limited by, its power. It is territorial. It may legislate for, and give judgments affecting, things and persons within its territory. It has no authority to legislate for, or adjudicate upon, things or persons (unless they are its subjects) not within its territory."

Law 31, however, became an effective law while Richard and Henrica were still resident in Austria, and it only purported to legislate in regard to something which had taken place in Austria.

I was also referred to Re Luck (7). In that case it was held that, as the father of an illegitimate child, born in California, had not acquired a domicile of choice in California at the date of the child's birth, a declaration of adoption after he had acquired such a domicile, which in Californian law purported to legitimate the child from its birth, could not be accepted by the English courts as having rendered the child legitimate. In the course of the majority judgment of SIR WILFRID GREENE, M.R., and LUXMOORE, L.J., this passage appears ([1940] 3 All E.R. 315):

"Let it also be assumed, as we conceive the law to be, that no provision of the law of a foreign country will be regarded in the English courts as effective to change the status of a person not domiciled in that country at the time, except, perhaps, in the case where the law of the country in which such person is domiciled would itself recognise the effectiveness of the foreign law in question."

In the present case the law of the foreign country was in force, although its effectiveness was delayed, before Henrica ever acquired an English domicile and while she was still resident in Austria. Further, in their judgment (ibid., 316) the following question is posed:

“Will the English courts recognise the power of Californian law retrospectively to affect the status of a person in respect of a period when that status was subject to the law of England and to none other?”

But the learned lords justices stated that they did not think it necessary or desirable to express a concluded opinion upon it. This case seems to me to be merely a refusal to accept the law of California as to legitimacy because it was in conflict with English law.

In the case before me the petitioner was born illegitimate, domiciled in England, and with a potentiality of being legitimated by the subsequent marriage of his parents. But his legitimation finally depends on the subsequent marriage being a valid marriage. There is nothing repugnant to English law in retrospective legislation as such. The English legislature in 1921 passed an Act validating certain decrees granted in India for the dissolution of marriages of persons domiciled in the United Kingdom—the Indian Divorces (Validity) Act, 1921—and they passed a similar Act validating decrees granted in Kenya Colony—the Kenya Divorces (Validity) Act, 1922. I cannot think that any such persons whose divorces and subsequent re-marriages occurred before the passing of such Acts could escape the effect of those Acts by a mere change of domicile.

Counsel for the Attorney-General referred me to two foreign cases for my assistance, one a Canadian case and the other a French case. The Canadian case was Doe d. Breakey v. Breakey (8). There an Irish marriage was at the time of the ceremony invalid, but was subsequently validated by an imperial statute. The Canadian court at that time, 1846, was bound by the imperial statute and so found, but ROBINSON, C.J., in the course of his judgment, stated (2 U.C.R. 357):

“Now, if none of the exceptions in the statute prevent its applying for the purposes of this action, and if the marriage were by that act made valid in Ireland merely, it follows that we must treat it here as having been a valid marriage at the time it was solemnized; for it is the lex loci that must govern. But this imperial statute, which we are bound judicially to notice, and which binds us as well as the courts in England, does, by its direct operation, place it on the footing of a legal marriage here, as much as if it had been solemnized by a clergyman of the church of England.”

I gather that the Chief Justice is saying that, at whatever time you have to consider the validity of a ceremony of marriage, that is the time to ascertain the lex loci celebrationis. In the French case—Re Godin (9)—the French courts had to consider the validity of a ceremony of marriage performed by a priest according to the Roman Catholic rites in Mexico. At the time of the ceremony such a marriage was invalid according to the law of Mexico. After the ceremony, and after the parties to it, who were French, had returned to France, a law was passed in Mexico validating such marriages retrospectively as from the date of solemnization. The French court held the marriage to be valid.

The parties in the present case have been the unfortunate victims of circumstances, and no blame attaches to any of them. Before Henrica went through the ceremony of marriage with Michael at the register office at Croydon she not only disclosed the fact of her former marriage to the registrar, but inquired of the registrar at Kitzbuehel in Austria whether her former marriage was valid or not and received a reply dated June 30, 1949, to the effect that she was not married at all in Kitzbuehel. It was argued on her behalf that she did not consent to the registration of her former marriage. This seems to me to be beside the point, for there can be no question that at the time she and Richard went through the ceremony of marriage on May 19, 1945, they both wanted to get married and were consenting parties to the marriage. Moreover, Law No. 31 merely validated what they had done and the date of registration of their marriage was a duty imposed on officials and something outside their control.

I have come to the conclusion that I must ask myself one simple question: Were both parties free to marry on Feb. 11, 1950? The answer to that question is "No", because at that time Henrica was a married woman. She had gone through a ceremony of marriage with another man, who was still alive, and according to the lex loci celebrationis that was a valid marriage. The validation of marriage has frequently been enacted in England by statute, and marriage ceremonies are clearly within the power of Austria to validate and the effectiveness of Austrian laws so validating a ceremony must be recognised by the comity of nations and by English law. I, therefore, declare that the marriage celebrated between Michael and Henrica on Feb. 11, 1950, at the Croydon register office is invalid, and that the petitioner is, therefore, illegitimate.

KEMSLEY v. FOOT AND OTHERS.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Goddard, Lord Oaksey, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Tucker), November 21, 22, 26, 27, 30, 1951, February 25, 1952.]

Libel—Fair comment—Need for facts on which comment made to be stated in alleged libel—Article criticising conduct of newspaper—Proof of truth of facts stated in particulars.

In an action claiming damages for libel the appellant, K., a shareholder and director of companies owning newspapers, alleged that the libel was contained in an article, written and published by the respondents, which was headed "Lower than [K.]" and which, making no further direct reference to K., was an attack on a report contained in a newspaper with which K. was not connected. K. claimed that the words meant, and were understood to mean, that he was a person who used his position as a director of newspaper companies to procure the publication of statements he knew to be false. The respondents in their defence denied the innuendo and pleaded: "Further or in the alternative if and so far as the said words refer to [K.] they are a fair comment made in good faith and without malice on a matter of public interest namely the control by [K.] of the newspapers . . . referred to in para. 1 of the statement of claim. Particulars of the specific facts on which the said words are a fair comment are delivered separately." On a summons to strike out this paragraph of the defence as being vexatious, embarrassing, and tending to prejudice the fair trial of the action on the ground that the defence of fair comment was not available because the facts, or some of them, on which the comment was made were not contained or specifically referred to in the article,

HELD: provided there was a substratum of fact stated or indicated in the words complained of which was sufficient to form a basis for the comment it was unnecessary for all the facts on which the comment was based to be stated in order to admit the defence of fair comment; in the present case the comment was on newspapers which were widely read and known and in the words complained of there was sufficient indication of the facts on which the comment was based; and, therefore, the paragraph should not be struck out.

Observations of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in Hunt v. Star Newspaper Co., Ltd. ([1908] 2 K.B. 319), explained.

Decision of COURT OF APPEAL ([1951] 1 All E.R. 331), affirmed.

Per curiam: Whereas in a case where the facts relied on to justify the comment are fully set out in the alleged libel the truth of each fact must be proved by the defendant, where the facts relied on are contained only in the particulars it is not incumbent on the defendant to prove the truth of every fact so stated in order to establish his plea of fair comment. He need only establish sufficient facts to support the comment to the satisfaction of the jury.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of the Court of Appeal (SOMERVELL, JENKINS and BIRKETT, L.JJ.), dated Dec. 14, 1950, and reported [1951] 1 All E.R. 331, allowing an appeal of the respondents from an order of PARKER, J., in chambers, made on a summons under R.S.C., Ord. 19, r. 27, and Ord. 25, r. 4, issued by the appellant in a libel action to have struck out a paragraph of the defence of the respondents which raised a plea of fair comment, and the particulars delivered thereunder, on the ground that they were vexatious and contrary to the rules of pleading and tended to prejudice, embarrass and delay a fair trial of the action, and disclosed no reasonable cause of action and were frivolous. The first three respondents were editors or on the editorial staff of a newspaper in which the alleged libel was published. The fourth respondent was the publisher of the newspaper. PARKER, J., struck out the paragraph and the particulars, but the Court of Appeal revised his decision.

The appellant contended that for the plea of fair comment to be available to the respondents there must be in the words complained of a statement of the fact or facts on which the comment was based, so that those reading the comment might be able to judge for themselves whether it was libellous or not.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 25. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, this case is concerned with the determination of a point of procedure and practice, leave having been given by your Lordships that it should be dealt with by this House.

Two points were originally involved: (i) whether an application in chambers to strike out para. 5 of the respondents' defence was properly the subject of such a summons or whether the matter should not have been dealt with by other means, e.g., by an objection taken in the pleadings and by setting down the point for argument under R.S.C., Ord. 25, r. 2, and (ii) whether a plea of fair comment is permissible where the facts or, at any rate, the salient facts on which the comment is made are not set out in the publication complained of. The application to strike out was, in fact, made on a summons in a libel action under Ord. 19, r. 27, and Ord. 25, r. 4, and sought to have para. 5, and certain particulars delivered thereunder struck out on the ground that they were vexatious and contrary to the rules of pleading, and tended to prejudice, embarrass and delay the fair trial of the action, and disclosed no reasonable cause of action and were frivolous.

The libel alleged was contained in an issue of the "Tribune" dated Mar. 10, 1950, and it is enough to set out its opening paragraph. It reads as follows:—

"Lower than Kemsley.

"By Michael Foot.

"The prize for the foulest piece of journalism perpetrated in this country for many a long year, and that certainly is saying something, must go to Mr. Herbert Gunn, editor of the 'Evening Standard' and all those associated with him in the publication of an attack on John Strachey last week."

It goes on to make a somewhat violent attack on the conduct of the "Evening Standard". The words used were said to reflect on the appellant and a writ was issued against the respondents and one other defendant, viz., Hardy Press, Ltd. The last named has now altered its defence and is not a party to this appeal. The four first-named respondents, however, are all parties to the appeal, but, as their positions do not differ one from the other, it is enough for the determination of the issue presented to deal with the case of Michael Foot.

Paragraph 5 of the defence is in the following terms:

"Further or in the alternative if and so far as the said words refer to the [appellant] they are a fair comment made in good faith and without malice on a matter of public interest, namely, the control by the [appellant] of the newspapers (other than the 'Evening Standard') referred to in para. 1 of the statement of claim. Particulars of the specific facts on which the said words are a fair comment are delivered separately."

The master, to whom the application was made, struck out two paragraphs of the particulars, but refused to strike out para. 5 of the defence or any of the other particulars. On appeal, however, PARKER, J., in chambers struck out the paragraph itself and all the particulars under it. The respondents appealed from the order of PARKER, J., to the Court of Appeal, who allowed the appeal and restored the master's order and at the same time gave leave to the respondents to amend the particulars of defence. In these circumstances it is not, in my view, necessary to set out the particulars in detail. It is enough to say that they contain excerpts from the appellant's newspapers and allegations of certain respects in which they are inaccurate or untruthful, together with complaints of their tone and the impropriety of their method of dealing with the news contained in them even when it is accurate. I need not make any reference to those particulars, the object of which is to show the responsibility of the appellant for the contents of the papers, inasmuch as the appellant accepts responsibility for the allegations made.

The rest of the particulars under discussion begin by asserting that they are particulars of the facts on which the words complained of are fair comment. Paragraph 3 is, perhaps, as good an example as can be adduced of the matters relied on. It begins as follows:

"The [appellant] in exercise of such control as aforesaid [i.e., general editorial control] caused or permitted to be published, as items of news, matter which did not correspond with the facts or was so coloured with comment as not to give an accurate representation of the news it purported to report, and headlines which distorted the news reported thereunder."

So far as I can discover no allegation of conscious lying is asserted in terms. The comment on these matters is said to be criticism of the way in which the appellant's newspapers are conducted, and to assert that that conduct is of a low character, that the respondents are entitled to criticise that conduct, and, as it is a matter of public interest, to comment fairly on it. The appellant, on his part, maintains that the right of comment is dependent on the existence in the words alleged to be libellous of a statement of some fact or facts on which comment is made so that those reading the comment may be able to judge for themselves whether it is justified or not. The respondents say that, in a case where the dispute between the opposing sides is one of this nature, an attempt to strike out para. 5 of the defence under the rules and orders specified above is not justified. Those rules should, they maintain, be used only in plain and obvious cases. If a serious discussion of legal principles is required, the point at issue should be taken in the pleadings and set down for argument under Ord. 25, r. 2. At the request of both parties, however, the Court of Appeal decided the substantive question as well as that concerned with procedure, and, as they have done so, all your Lordships have thought it proper to determine that matter and have not heard argument on the technical question as to the propriety of the course adopted. They have assumed that the application to strike out was rightly made, and, accordingly, have confined their consideration to the question of the correctness of the order made by the Court of Appeal in refusing to strike out para. 5 of the defence on the ground that no or no sufficient statement of the facts on which the comment is made appear in the article complained of. It is not, as I understand, contended that the words contained in that article are fact and not comment. Rather it is alleged that they are comment with no facts to support it. The question for your Lordships' decision is, therefore, whether a plea of fair comment is only permissible where the comment is accompanied by a statement of facts on which the comment is made, and to determine the particularity with which the facts must be stated.

Before one comes to consider the general question it is, I think, desirable to determine what the language of the alleged libel can be held to assert. It may, in my opinion, be construed as containing an inference that the Kemsley Press is of a low and undesirable quality and that Lord Kemsley is responsible for its tone. Indeed, as I understand the defence and such particulars as have been delivered, an imputation no less severe has been accepted by the respondents as being a true interpretation of the words used. Although the article complained of uses the phrase "Lower than Kemsley", that language is accompanied by an attack on Lord Beaverbrook's papers, and it is at least arguable that the attack is on the Kemsley Press and not on Lord Kemsley's personal character save in so far as it is exhibited in the Press for which he is responsible. Nevertheless, libel must reflect on a person and Lord Kemsley is held up as worthy of attack on the ground that he is a newspaper proprietor who prostitutes his position by conducting his newspapers or permitting them to be conducted in an undesirable way. In this sense the criticism does not differ from that which takes place when what is called literary criticism comes in question. In such case the attack is not on the personal character of the person libelled, it is on him as responsible for certain productions, e.g., an article in the Press, a book, a musical composition, or an artistic work. Later I shall have to come back to the truth and accuracy of this analogy, but I have thought it right to set out the basis of literary criticism at this point, because a distinction is sought to be drawn and, indeed, in some of the decided cases has been drawn, between literary criticism and a personal attack on the character of an individual.

If an author writes a play or a book or a composer composes a musical work, he is submitting that work to the public and, thereby, inviting comment. Not all the public will see or read or hear it, but the work is public in the same sense as a case in the law courts is said to be heard in public. Obviously not all those who wish to attend a trial can do so, but in so far as there is room for them in the court all are entitled to do so, and the subject-matter on which comment can be made is indicated to the world at large. The same observation is true of a newspaper. Whether the criticism is confined to a particular issue or deals with the way in which it is, in general, conducted, the subject-matter on which criticism has been made has been submitted to the public, though by no means

A all those to whom the alleged libel has been published will have seen or are likely to see the various issues. Accordingly, its contents and conduct are open to comment on the ground that the public have at least the opportunity of ascertaining for themselves the subject-matter on which the comment is founded. I am assuming that the reference is to a known journal. For the present purpose it is not necessary to consider how far criticism without facts on which to base it is subject to the same observation in the case of an obscure publication. A further ground for the distinction sought to be drawn between an attack on an individual and criticism of a literary work appears to suggest that comment on the literary production must be confined to criticism of it as literature. This is not so. A literary work can be criticised for its treatment of life and morals as freely as it can for bad writing, e.g., it can be criticised as having an immoral tendency. B The fairness of the criticism does not depend on the fact that it is confined to form or literary content.

The question, therefore, in all cases is whether there is a sufficient substratum of fact stated or indicated in the words which are the subject-matter of the action, and I find my view well expressed in the remarks contained in ODGERS ON LIBEL AND SLANDER (5th ed., 1911) at p. 203:

C "Sometimes, however, it is difficult to distinguish an allegation of fact from an expression of opinion. It often depends on what is stated in the rest of the article. If the defendant accurately states what some public man has really done, and then asserts that 'such conduct is disgraceful,' D this is merely the expression of his opinion, his comment on the plaintiff's conduct. So, if without setting it out, he identifies the conduct on which he comments by a clear reference. In either case, the defendant enables his readers to judge for themselves how far his opinion is well founded; and, therefore, what would otherwise have been an allegation of fact becomes merely a comment. But if he asserts that the plaintiff has been guilty of disgraceful conduct, and does not state what that conduct was, this is an allegation of fact for which there is no defence but privilege or truth. E The same considerations apply where a defendant has drawn from certain facts an inference derogatory to the plaintiff. If he states the bare inference without the facts on which it is based, such inference will be treated as an allegation of fact. But if he sets out the facts correctly, and then gives his inference, stating it as his inference from those facts, such inference will, as a rule, be deemed a comment. But even in this case the writer must be F careful to state the inference as an inference, and not to assert it as a new and independent fact; otherwise, his inference will become something more than a comment, and he may be driven to justify it as an allegation of fact."

But the question whether an inference is a bare inference in this sense must depend on all the circumstances. Indeed, it was ultimately admitted on behalf of the appellant that the facts necessary to justify comment might be implied G from the terms of the impugned article, and, therefore, the inquiry ceases to be: Can the defendant point to definite assertions of fact in the alleged libel on which the comment is made? and becomes: Is there subject-matter indicated with sufficient clarity to justify comment being made?, and whether the comment actually made is such as an honest though prejudiced man might make.

H Is there, then, in this case sufficient subject-matter on which to make comment. In an article which is concerned with what has been described as "the Beaverbrook Press" and which is violently critical of Lord Beaverbrook's newspapers, it is, I think, a reasonable construction of the words "Lower than Kemsley" that the allegation which is made is that the conduct of the Kemsley Press was similar to, but not quite so bad as, that of the Press controlled by Lord Beaverbrook, i.e., it is possibly dishonest, but in any case low. The exact meaning, however, is not, in my opinion, for your Lordships, but for the jury. All I desire to say is that there is subject-matter and it is at least arguable that the words directly complained of imply as fact that Lord Kemsley is in control of a number of known newspapers and that the conduct of those newspapers is in question. Had the contention that all the facts justifying the comment must appear in the article been maintainable, the appeal must have succeeded. But the appellant's representatives did not feel able to, and, I think, could not, support so wide a contention. The facts, they admitted, might be implied and the respondents' answer to their contention is: "We have pointed to your Press. It is widely read. Your readers will, and the public generally can, know at what our criticism is directed. It is not bare comment. It is comment on a well-known matter, much better known, indeed, than a newly printed book or a once performed play."

One further matter on which some discussion took place does not, in my opinion, directly arise on this appeal, but, as it may be raised in interlocutory proceedings later in the course of the action, I think it desirable to express an opinion on it. In a case where the facts are fully set out in the alleged libel, each fact must be justified and if the defendant fails to justify one, even if it be comparatively unimportant, he fails in his defence. Does the same principle apply where the facts alleged are found, not in the alleged libel, but in particulars delivered in the course of the action? In my opinion, it does not. Where the facts are set out in the alleged libel, those to whom it is published can read them and may regard them as facts derogatory of the plaintiff, but where, as here, they are contained only in particulars and are not published to the world at large, they are not the subject-matter of the comment, but facts alleged to justify that comment. In the present case, for instance, the substratum of fact on which comment is based is that Lord Kemsley is the active proprietor of and responsible for the Kemsley Press. The criticism is that that Press is a low one. As I hold, any facts sufficient to justify that statement would entitle the respondents to succeed on a plea of fair comment. Twenty facts might be given in the particulars and only one justified, yet if that one fact was sufficient to support the comment so as to make it fair, a failure to prove the other nineteen would not of necessity defeat the respondents' plea. The protection of the defendant in such a case would, in my opinion, be, as it often is in cases of the like kind, the effect which an allegation of a number of facts which cannot be substantiated would have on the minds of a jury who would be unlikely to believe that the comment was made on the one fact or was honestly founded on it, and, accordingly, would find it unfair. It is true that KENNEDY, J., in Joynt v. Cycle Trade Publishing Co. (1) ([1904] 2 K.B. 292) says that a comment cannot be fair which is built on facts which are not truly stated, and in the same case in the Court of Appeal (ibid., 298) VAUGHAN WILLIAMS, L.J., quotes the language of CROMPTON, J., in Campbell v. Spottiswoode (2) (32 L.J.Q.B. 200):

"If he [the critic] . . . imputes to the person whom he is criticising base and sordid motives which are not warranted by the facts, I cannot think for a moment that because he bona fide believes that he is publishing what is true, that is any defence in point of law."

But in each of these cases the court was dealing with the lack of any basis of fact sufficient to warrant the comment made and, in any case, what is fair or unfair comment and what amounts to an imputation of base and sordid motives are matters for the jury and not a subject for your Lordships' decision. In reaching the conclusion which I have stated I am not conscious of being at variance with the authorities, or, at any rate, with cases decided in this country.

The main support for the appellant's argument is founded on the observations of FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., in Hunt v. Star Newspaper Co., Ltd. (3) ([1908] 2 K.B. 319). The observations relied on are:

"The law as to fair comment, so far as is material to the present case, stands as follows: In the first place, comment in order to be justifiable as fair comment must appear as comment and must not be so mixed up with the facts that the reader cannot distinguish between what is report and what is comment: see Andrews v. Chapman (4). The justice of this rule is obvious. If the facts are stated separately and the comment appears as an inference drawn from those facts, any injustice that it might do will be to some extent negatived by the reader seeing the grounds upon which the unfavourable inference is based. But if fact and comment be intermingled so that it is not reasonably clear what portion purports to be inference, he will naturally suppose that the injurious statements are based on adequate grounds known to the writer though not necessarily set out by him. In the one case the insufficiency of the facts to support the inference will lead fair-minded men to reject the inference. In the other case it merely points to the existence of extrinsic facts which the writer considers to warrant the language he uses . . . In the next place, in order to give room for the plea of fair comment the facts must be truly stated. If the facts upon which the comment purports to be made do not exist the foundation of the plea fails. This has been so frequently laid down authoritatively that I do not need to dwell further upon it: see, for instance, the direction given by KENNEDY, J., to the jury in Joynt v. Cycle Trade Publishing Co. (1), which has been frequently approved of by the courts. Finally, comment must not convey imputations of an evil sort except so far as the facts truly stated warrant the imputation."

It must be remembered that in that case a jury had found a verdict for the plaintiff. That verdict had been taken on the general issue and it was not apparent whether, in their view, the facts were truly stated or not, or whether they thought the comment unfair. LAWRENCE, J., had ended his summing up by telling the jury (ibid., 312):

"If a newspaper publishes exactly what took place with no comment whatever, they would be justified in so doing as a matter of public interest, but if they add to that comment of their own, then the question is whether that comment was bona fide and fair comment, or whether it was comment which tended, as alleged here, to charge the plaintiff with improper conduct."

Such a charge obviously mis-stated the elements of fair comment. The facts truly stated might warrant an imputation by an honest man that the plaintiff's conduct was improper, and, accordingly, the Court of Appeal sent back the case for a new trial in order that it might be ascertained (i) whether the facts stated were true, and (ii) if the comment was such as an honest man might make on those facts. It was in those circumstances that FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J., gave his judgment. He was seeking to distinguish facts from comment, and, in effect, saying that the facts alleged must be such as to warrant an honest man's making the comment complained of. He had not to consider whether the facts must be set out in full or whether a reference to well known or easily ascertainable facts was a sufficient statement of those relied on. In that case the facts were all set out and the only question which the court had to consider was whether, on facts assumed to be truly stated, the comment was honestly made. As the jury had been wrongly directed on this matter, the case was sent back in order that it might be ascertained whether facts were true and, if true, whether the comment was an honest comment on facts truly stated. The limited measure of the learned lord justice's criticism is to be found in the last sentence which I have quoted, and I should myself accept it as it stands.

I do not think it necessary to go through the other cases one by one, but reference must be made to the South African case of Roos v. Stent (5). If I thought that that judgment represented a new and independent view, it would be necessary to analyse its reasoning carefully. But in truth it is founded on FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J.'s opinion in Hunt v. Star Newspaper Co., Ltd. (3), and does not contain any fresh point of view. It is the only direct decision on the point in issue. Admittedly no English authority determines this question, and for the reasons I have given I am of opinion that in this case a sufficient substratum of fact is to be found in the words complained of, and I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

My Lords, LORD GODDARD has not written an opinion in this case, but has asked me to say that he agrees with that which I have delivered.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree. The forms in which a comment on a matter of public importance may be framed are almost infinitely various, and, in my opinion, it is unnecessary that all the facts on which the comment is based should be stated in the libel in order to admit the defence of fair comment. It is not, in my opinion, a matter of importance that the reader should be able to see exactly the grounds of the comment. It is sufficient if the subject which, ex hypothesi, is of public importance is sufficiently and not incorrectly or untruthfully stated. A comment based on facts untruly stated cannot be fair. What is meant in cases in which it has been said that comment to be fair must be on facts truly stated is, I think, that the facts, so far as they are stated in the libel, must not be untruly stated. In the present case the word which indicates the subject is "Kemsley" and it must be read in its context and in that context it must, I think, mean the newspapers controlled by Lord Kemsley. That is the subject-matter of the comment. The comment is that those newspapers are nearly as low as Lord Beaverbrook's newspapers, about which many defamatory statements are made in the alleged libel. It is not, in my opinion, a statement of fact that a newspaper is low. It is a comment. It may be a statement of fact to say that a man is fraudulent for there is a legal sanction for fraud, but there is no legal sanction for publishing low newspapers. I think, therefore, that the words "lower than" are words of comment and that the particulars which are sought to be struck out were alleged for the purpose of supporting the comment, and, if it is proved to the satisfaction of the jury that an honest man might have made such a comment on Lord Kemsley's newspapers, the defence of fair comment will have been established. It is one thing to publish a defamatory statement of fact, it is quite another to allege a defamatory statement of fact in a pleading in order to show that a published comment was fair. A defendant who has made a defamatory comment on a matter of public importance must be entitled to adduce any relevant evidence to show that the comment was fair, and, in order to do so, must be entitled to allege and attempt to prove facts which he contends justify the comment. Whether the facts alleged are satisfactorily proved or not it will still be for the jury to say whether they consider that the comment in the circumstances proved might have been made by an honest man. I am, therefore, of opinion that the order of the Court of Appeal was right and this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I agree.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, I am in complete agreement with the reasons which have been stated by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack in support of the motion to dismiss this appeal. I also desire expressly to state my concurrence in his opinion that where the facts relied on to justify the comment are contained only in the particulars, it is not incumbent on the defendant to prove the truth of every fact so stated in order to establish his plea of fair comment, but that he must establish sufficient facts to support the comment to the satisfaction of the jury.

Appeal dismissed.

EARL FITZWILLIAM'S WENTWORTH ESTATES CO. v.
MINISTER OF HOUSING AND LOCAL GOVERNMENT AND ANOTHER.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Porter, Lord Goddard, Lord Oaksey, Lord MacDermott and Lord Tucker), December 3, 4, 5, 6, 1951, February 25, 1952.]

Compulsory Purchase—Building land—Compulsory purchase by Central Land Board—Power of board to acquire land for disposal for permitted development—Planning permission granted by local authority to prospective lessee—Owner unwilling to sell at existing value—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 43 (1).

The appellants, who were the owners of a plot of land, offered to grant to R., who wished to build a house on it, a three hundred years' lease thereof at an annual rent which exceeded the existing use value of the plot and to assign to him the benefit of the appellants' claim for compensation for loss of development rights under the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, R. to pay the development charge under the Act. Permission to build the house was granted to R. by the local authority. On a request by R. that a compulsory purchase order should be made for his benefit because the appellants did not propose to lease the land at the existing use value, the Central Land Board wrote to the appellants asking them whether they would be prepared to adopt one of three methods of disposing of the land. The methods, which the board considered fair to buyers who wanted a house immediately, were set out in a document entitled "House 1", and were: (i) to sell the land at existing use value, the buyer paying development charge, (ii) the seller to pay the development charge, and then to sell the land at a fair price, including the development charge; or (iii) the seller to pay the development charge, erect the house and then sell the house and land at a fair price, including the development charge. The appellants refused to adopt any of these methods, and the board then tried to negotiate with them a purchase by agreement. The existing use value of the land was £35, but the appellants would only agree to sell it at £462 (its probable value if it were developed). As they were unable to acquire the land by agreement on what they considered to be reasonable terms, the board resolved to acquire it compulsorily, and on June 22, 1949, an order to that effect was made under s. 43 (2) of the Act of 1947, and was confirmed by the Minister of Town and Country Planning on Dec. 3, 1949. On an application to the court by the appellants for an order that the compulsory purchase order and the Minister's confirmation order be quashed, the appellants contended (inter alia) that the functions of the board were limited to the assessment and collection of development charges and did not extend to the acquisition of land for the purpose of development, and, further, that the action of the board prevented the assignment by the appellants under s. 64 (2) of their right to receive compensation, and, therefore, the order was invalid as it was made for a purpose not authorised by s. 43 (1).

HELD: on the true construction of s. 43 (1) of the Act of 1947, the purpose referred to in the second part of the sub-section introduced by the words "in particular" was a "purpose connected with the performance of [the board's] functions" within the meaning of the first part of the sub-section, and, therefore, the board, in acquiring the land compulsorily for the purpose of disposing of it to R. for development, were acting within their powers, even though by so doing they were limiting the appellants' right of assignment under s. 64 (2) of the Act.

APPEAL by Earl Fitzwilliam's Wentworth Estates Co. from an order of the Court of Appeal (SOMERVELL, SINGLETON, L.J.J., DENNING, L.J., dissentiente), dated Apr. 13, 1951, and reported [1951] 1 All E.R. 982, affirming an order of BIRKETT, J., dated July 31, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 765, whereby he refused to make an order quashing a compulsory purchase order made by the Central Land Board on June 22, 1949, and a confirmation order made by the Minister of Town and Country Planning* on Dec. 3, 1949.

The appellants were the owners of large estates in Sheffield which they had been developing for some years by leasing plots of land on building leases for a term of three hundred years. In August, 1948, they informed the prospective lessee of one of the plots of the terms on which they would grant a lease to him. The prospective lessee, who had obtained permission from the local authority to build a house on the land, wrote to the Central Land Board complaining that the appellants did not propose to lease the land at present use value, and asking if the board would make a compulsory purchase order for his benefit. The board drew the appellants' attention to three methods of disposing of the land which they considered fair to buyers and asked the appellants if they were prepared to accept one of these methods. The appellants replied that they were not, and on June 22, 1949, the board made a compulsory purchase order in respect of the land. On Dec. 3, 1949, the order was confirmed by the Minister of Town and Country Planning. The appellants contended that the order was not within the powers conferred on the board by the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, s. 43 (1) and s. 43 (2), because its object was to compel the appellants to conform to the board's policy that land should not be sold at a price greater than its existing use value and it was made as a reprisal for the appellants' refusal to conform to the methods of sale suggested to them. They also contended that the power conferred by the second part of s. 43 (1), viz., the power to acquire land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission had been granted under the Act, was limited by the power conferred by the first part of the sub-section, and, therefore, it was a power exercisable only in connection with the performance by the board of their functions under the Act (viz., the ascertainment of development values and the determination of development charges), and was not a separate and independent power. It was further argued that the action of the board deprived the appellants of the benefit of their rights under s. 64 (2) in that they could not transmit their right to payment as a term of the agreement to sell the property in respect of which their right to payment arose. The respondents, the Minister and the board, contended that the action of the board was taken in exact accordance with the terms of the Act, in that they were unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms and that they, therefore, acquired it compulsorily for a purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the Act, and, in particular, for the purpose of disposing of the land for development for which permission had been granted.

BIRKETT, J., held that the power given to the board by the second part of s. 43 (1) was not limited by the earlier words of the sub-section, but was wide enough to allow the board to make the compulsory purchase order in the circumstances of the case, and, therefore, the order was valid. The Court of Appeal held that on the true construction of s. 43 (1) the second part of the sub-section did not confer on the board a power wholly independent of the first part of the sub-section, but was introduced to make it clear that the power of the board to acquire land for the purpose mentioned in the second part was a LORD PORTER: My Lords, this is an appeal from an order of His Majesty's Court of Appeal in England (SOMERVELL, SINGLETON and DENNING, L.JJ.), dated Apr. 13, 1951, affirming an order made by the King's Bench Division (BIRKETT, J.) on July 31, 1950, in favour of the respondents, whereby the appellants' motion to quash a compulsory purchase order made by the Central Land Board on June 22, 1949, and a confirmation order made on Dec. 3, 1949, by the Minister of Town and Country Planning (now the Minister of Housing and Local Government and hereinafter called "the Minister") was dismissed. The question for your Lordships' consideration is whether, on the true interpretation of s. 43 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and in the circumstances hereinafter described, the Central Land Board validly made an order, and were validly authorised by the Minister, to acquire compulsorily under that section a plot of land belonging to the appellants, which the appellants intended to lease for building purposes at a rent in excess of what would be commensurate with its existing use value.

The facts are not in dispute. The appellants are the owners of large estates in Ecclesall in the city of Sheffield. They and their predecessors in title have been developing these estates for over thirty years by leasing plots of land for three hundred years on building leases. In August, 1948, a Mr. C. N. Rodgers approached the surveyors to the appellants through his architect, a Mr. A. Lushby, for a long lease of a plot of land at Whirlow Lane, Sheffield, on which to build a house. He was informed that he could have a lease of a plot for a term of three hundred years at an annual rent of £20 10s. and the assignment of the benefit of the appellants' claim in respect of that plot on the sum of £300,000,000 from which payments in respect of the depreciation of land values are to be made under Part VI of the Act of 1947, on condition that he paid any development charge levied under Part VII of the Act. On Aug. 16, 1948, Mr. Rodgers obtained a grant of planning permission under Part III of the Act to build a house on the plot in question, and on Oct. 7, 1948, Mr. Lushby, on behalf of Mr. Rodgers, wrote to the Central Land Board a letter calling their attention to the fact that the appellants did not propose to lease the plot save at a rent which exceeded its existing use value. He requested the board to make a compulsory purchase order or lease for the benefit of his client. As a result of that letter, the secretary of the Central Land Board wrote to the appellants' surveyors, enclosing a pamphlet issued by the board entitled "House I", and asked whether the appellants were prepared to adopt in regard to the said plot of land one of the three alternative methods (and, if so, which) set out in the pamphlet. The three methods were, briefly: (a) To sell at existing use value, leaving the buyer to pay the development charge. (b) To accept liability to pay the development charge and to sell at a fair price, including that charge. (c) To pay the development charge, build the house, and then sell the house and land at a fair price including that charge. On Nov. 5, 1948, the surveyors to the appellants replied to the Central Land Board stating that the appellants were not disposed to adopt any of the three methods recommended by the board. Thereupon, the Central Land Board wrote to the Sheffield City Council to ascertain whether it was, in the opinion of the council, expedient in the public interest that certain sites, including the plot at Whirlow Lane, should be acquired and made available for housing development, and received a reply from the town clerk to the Sheffield City Council stating that, in the opinion of the council, it was in the public interest that the sites should be made immediately available for housing development. A report from the city engineer was enclosed with this letter. On Dec. 23, 1948, the Central Land Board again wrote to the surveyors to the appellants stating that the approved development of the plot might be hindered, if not prevented, unless it was made available, and that the district valuer had, therefore, been requested urgently to negotiate for the immediate purchase of the plot on the basis of existing use value provided by s. 51 (2) of the Act, which basis the board considered to be the reasonable terms referred to in s. 43 (2) of the Act. At the end of that month heads of agreement were sent to Mr. Rodgers by the appellants. They included the terms which the appellants had previously offered. On Jan. 7, 1949, the district valuer wrote to the surveyors to the appellants asking for certain information to enable him to negotiate for the acquisition of the plot. Meanwhile, negotiations between Mr. Rodgers and the appellants continued, but they finally broke down, whereupon the district valuer repeated his request for information. The surveyors to the appellants then replied that they recommended a price of £462 for the acquisition. On May 13, 1949, the Central Land Board passed a resolution to the effect that it was desirable to acquire the plot for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which planning permission had been granted on terms inclusive of any development charge payable in respect of the development, and that the plot should be acquired compulsorily since the board were unable to acquire the plot by agreement on reasonable terms. In accordance with this resolution the board purported to make an order on June 22, 1949, authorising them to purchase the plot compulsorily.

On July 20, 1949, the appellants made an objection to the confirmation of the order on the grounds: (i) That the order was ultra vires, in that it had been made to secure an object which was not within the board's powers to achieve, namely, that the appellants should bear the loss resulting from the vesting of development rights in the State by virtue of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and that it should not be permitted to make it a condition of sale that the purchaser should stand in its shoes. (ii) That it was not expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire the plot. (iii) That the terms on which the appellants were prepared to lease the plot were reasonable. As a result of this objection a public local inquiry was conducted at Sheffield by Mr. Fitzgibbon, an inspector of the Ministry of Town and Country Planning, and on Dec. 3, 1949, after his report, the Minister confirmed the compulsory purchase order and recited that he was satisfied that it was expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire the plot and that the board were unable to acquire it by agreement on reasonable terms. On Feb. 10, 1950, by virtue of the provisions of para. 15 (1) of sched. I to the Acquisition of Land (Authorisation Procedure) Act, 1946, the appellants gave notice of motion to challenge the validity of the compulsory purchase and confirmation orders on the grounds (i) that the compulsory purchase order had been made for a collateral purpose, namely, to enforce the policy of the Central Land Board set forth by them in their pamphlet "House 1", and (ii) that the board in making the order and the Minister in confirming it had taken into consideration and been influenced by extraneous matters, namely, the board's policy set forth in pamphlet "House 1", which policy was unlawfully directed to preventing landowners from making it a condition of a sale or long lease of land that the purchaser or lessee should stand in the owner's shoes and accept the risk of not receiving a payment from the £300,000,000 under Part VI of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, equivalent to the full development value of the land which value had become vested in the State. On the hearing of the motion BIRKETT, J., gave judgment for the respondents and confirmed the order. An appeal from his decision was dismissed.

As has been stated above, the substantial issue in the case depends on the proper construction of s. 43 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. The section reads as follows:

- "(1) The Central Land Board may, with the approval of the Minister, by agreement acquire land for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of this Act, and in particular
A may so acquire any land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted under Part III of this Act on terms inclusive of any development charge payable under those provisions in respect of that development. (2) If the Minister is satisfied that it is expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire any land for any such purpose as aforesaid, and that the board are unable to acquire
B the land by agreement on reasonable terms, he may authorise the board to acquire the land compulsorily in accordance with the provisions of this section . . . (4) Any land acquired by the Central Land Board under the provisions of this section shall be disposed of by them in accordance with such directions as may be given to them in that behalf by the Minister, and until the land is so disposed of the board may manage it in accordance
C with such directions: Provided that nothing in this section shall be construed as authorising the board to carry out any development of land acquired by them thereunder."

Together with this section the resolution of the board of May 13, 1949, must be set out. It is in the following terms:

- D "That it was desirable to acquire the land in Whirlow Lane, Sheffield (Appendix 'A') for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which planning permission has been granted on terms inclusive of any development charge payable in respect of that development, and that, as the board were unable to acquire the said land by agreement on reasonable terms, an order be made to acquire the land compulsorily."
- E The board say that their action is taken in exact accordance with the terms of the Act in that they were unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms and they, therefore, acquired it compulsorily for a purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of the Act, and, in particular, for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted. This contention gives rise to two considerations:
F (i) What is the standard by which "reasonable terms" are to be determined? (ii) Can the board acquire land compulsorily for the purpose of disposing of it simpliciter, or is any limit set to their powers, i.e., is their only right to acquire it where their object is to fulfil one of the functions under the subsequent provisions of the Act, and, if so, what are those functions? The first question is not seriously in dispute. There was evidence in an affidavit
G by Sir William Fraser on behalf of the respondents that the appellants were not willing to sell their land for less than £462, and that the district valuer, on the basis of Part V of the Act, estimated its value to be about £35. Indeed, the fact that the appellants' terms, whether for letting or sale, always exceeded the existing use value was not disputed by the appellants. A rent of £20 10s., and a liability for development charge, even though a claim on the £300,000,000
H fund was assigned, is obviously in excess of the existing use value.

The second question gives rise to more difficulty. In their motion to quash the order and the confirmation of it by the Minister, the appellants contended: (i) that the orders had been made by the board for a collateral purpose, namely, to enforce the policy of the board set out in the pamphlet, "House 1", hereinbefore referred to and to prohibit any other method of dealing with the land; and (ii) that the board and the Minister, in exercising their statutory discretions, had taken into consideration and been influenced by extraneous matters, namely, the policy set forth in "House 1". The honesty of the Minister or of the board was not challenged. They were misguided, it was said, but not consciously unfair. If these contentions are to succeed it must be inferred that the board did not concern themselves with the particular facts of the case, but were minded to carry out a policy which they had adopted whatever the circumstances might be. I see no evidence to this effect. The suggestion is purely speculative and is not borne out by any of the documents produced. But the appellants put their case in another and more persuasive way. The functions of the board, they say, are financial. The planning authority is the local authority in whose hands are placed the task of determining how development shall be planned. The board's only task is to determine the sums payable as development charges and to collect them: see Parts VI and VII of the Act. The contention has some force, but is not determinative of the case. It would have been possible so to limit the powers of the board that they should have authority only for the direct performance of the function of assessment and collection, but the Act has not done so. It has given them certain collateral powers of which those contained in s. 43 are an example. I should myself be inclined to hold that, even without the specific permission contained in sub-s. (1), the board, under their financial powers, are entitled to acquire land compulsorily in order to enable them to assess and collect the development charge, but I am of opinion that, in case this construction should be subject to any doubt, the fact that they are so entitled is expressly provided by the second half of the sub-section. As I understand his judgment, BIRKETT, J., relied on that half as decisive of the case. In his opinion, it conferred a second and independent power on the board quite irrespective of their other powers and functions. On the other hand, the majority of the Court of Appeal took the view that the second half did not confer a separate power, but was interpretative of the general powers contained in the first half. This view which was expressed by SOMERVELL and SINGLETON, L.JJ., adopts, I think, a correct construction of the wording of the section.

If the view that the function of the board was limited to finance and nothing else were to prevail, it is difficult to see any reason for giving it the compulsory powers contained in s. 43 (4), and, in particular, power to take over land. Jurisdiction to take over land, given, as it is, in direct terms, must be connected with some of the board's functions, and it must, therefore, either be a direct and separate power, or be given to assist in assessing and collecting development charges. It was, indeed, suggested that its object was to enable the board to test the market in order to assist them in determining the proper amount of the development charge or to help them to collect it. Either suggestion is, in my opinion, remote from reality. There must be ample opportunity of calculating value from other sales. In default of other reasons for the power given, the natural explanation is that it was given to enable them to perform their functions as assessors and collectors of the development charge.

It was said, however, that so to decide was contradictory of the provision in s. 64 (2) which makes the right to receive any compensation for loss of development value transmissible by assignment or by operation of law. This provision was, I think, natural in the case of a new charge for which some compensation was to be given. It was desired to make it clear that the compensation was not personal to one who was owner at the appointed day, but was transmissible by or from him. It is, in fact, transmissible in all cases except as part of the consideration given to the purchaser of the land in exchange for an undertaking to pay the development charge. The limitation on transmission imposed by the exception does not conflict with the provisions of the sub-section. It merely ensures that the right to transmit the compensation shall not be used to increase the price charged for the interest assigned to a sum greater than the present use value of that interest. The point is a new one and I do not get any assistance from the cases cited to your Lordships. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

- LORD GODDARD: My Lords, the question which falls for decision in this case in the main depends on the true construction of s. 43 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. In my opinion, that section confers a single power on the Central Land Board and not two powers. They have power to acquire land for a purpose connected with the performance of their functions, and the words which have been described throughout the argument as the second limb of the section, in my opinion, are no more than a particular instance of that which the legislature regarded as part of the board's functions. It would seem that in this case the board have acted in accordance with the clear words of the statute. The land which they have acquired was land for which permission for development had been granted and they acquired the land for the purpose of disposing of it on terms inclusive of the development charge.
- A They disposed of it to a person to whom permission to develop had been granted, but, although the section does not say that they must dispose of it to such a person, it can, in my opinion, make no difference that that person is also one who has received permission to develop. The appellants' argument, however, is based on the contention that the board has nothing to do with development and that their functions are purely fiscal. The board, on the other hand,
- B contend that this power is given to them for the purpose of facilitating the collection of the development charge. If it is not given to them for that purpose, I have great difficulty in seeing the reason for giving them power to acquire land. I cannot agree that Parliament could have intended to confer this power of compulsory purchase on the board merely for the purpose of enabling them to test the market. That they could use the power for this purpose may be true, though I should think it highly unlikely that they would ever do so, and equally
- C I think it would be most unlikely that Parliament would confer on them or the Minister powers of compulsory purchase merely to achieve such an object. Again, I cannot think that this power was conferred for the purpose of enabling them to realise a security that may have been taken for development charge. It is, I think, of great significance that the only land that they can acquire is
- D land for which permission to develop has been granted. One of the duties of the board is to collect the development charge for the purpose of providing funds for the payment of compensation to landowners who have been obliged to part with the development value to the State. If, therefore, permission has been given by the appropriate authority to develop land which it is in the public interest should be developed and a landowner is unwilling to sell at the
- E existing use value, it follows that the board would be unable to collect the development charge which would otherwise become payable. A would-be purchaser cannot obtain compulsory powers of purchase. It appears to me, therefore, that Parliament intended to give to the Central Land Board, if they obtain the permission of the Minister, the power to acquire the land themselves, so that they may dispose of it at a price which will include the development
- F charge from a purchaser who is willing to carry out the development, and thus to collect the appropriate sum.
- G

A further objection which was taken by the appellants was that by their action the board are preventing the assignment by the landowner of his right to receive the compensation to which he may become entitled. I am unable to agree with this contention. The landowner has, no doubt, the right to

H participate in the compensation fund, and he can still assign that right as he can assign any other chose in action. The only thing that he cannot do is to assign the right to a purchaser as part of the consideration of the purchase, but for all other purposes his right to assign remains, and, after all, this is a mere temporary provision as the compensation money is to be paid in 1953 after which there will be nothing to assign. But it was said that the real object of the action of the Central Land Board was to enforce a policy whereby all sales of land would have to take place at existing use values, and it is said that that is going beyond the provisions of the Act, as, if this had been the intention of Parliament, it would have been quite easy to provide in the Act that land should henceforth be sold only at that value. In my opinion, it cannot be said that, though it may well be, as I think, it was the desire of the board that sales should take place at existing use value, this would make the exercise of the power given to them ultra vires.

For the reasons I have expressed above, I think it clear that the action of the board in these or similar circumstances does facilitate the collection of the development charge, and we have here a case in which the landowner was endeavouring to obtain ground rent of an amount in excess of what could have been obtained if existing use value should be the governing consideration. I do not think we need consider whether the intending purchaser might, had the board not intervened, have still been willing to take a lease on the proposed terms. I think it is pretty clear, in fact, that he would not, but I do not find anything in s. 43 which prevents the Central Land Board exercising the express power which is given to them if they and the Minister think it is in the public interest so to do, and, accordingly, I would dismiss the appeal. A B

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree. In my opinion, the purpose referred to in the second part of s. 43 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, is a "purpose connected with the performance of their functions" by the Central Land Board within the meaning of the first part of that sub-section. Express power is given to the board by the sub-section to acquire land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted on terms inclusive of any development charge. It is conceded by the appellants that the functions of the board include the duty to assess and collect development charges, and it appears to me that the power to acquire land for the purpose of disposing of it on terms inclusive of any development charge is clearly a purpose connected with the performance of these functions. C D

Counsel for the appellants has argued that the advice of the Central Land Board contained in the document headed "House 1", and the correspondence between the board and the appellants' agents, show that the board exercised their powers for the purpose of preventing the appellants obtaining more than the existing use value of the land in question and that there is nothing in the Act to prohibit a sale at such a value. It is true that there is nothing in the Act to prohibit sales at such values, but the express power to acquire land compulsorily for which permission to develop has been granted is inconsistent with a right by the landowner to sell at all in the particular class of cases dealt with. It was further argued on behalf of the appellants that s. 64 (2) of the Act, which provides that the right to receive payment from the sum payable for depreciation of land values shall be transmissible by assignment, was limited by the construction sought to be placed on s. 43 because the landowner could not transmit his right to payment as a term of the agreement to sell the property in respect of which his right to payment arose, but, in my opinion, the right to payment remained transmissible within the meaning of s. 64 (2), and such a limitation is no ground for placing a different interpretation on s. 43. It was also argued that if the development charge could be assessed at less than its full value the landowner would have been forced to sell his land at its existing use value while the purchaser would obtain without paying for it a part of its development value. It may be true that land acquired compulsorily under s. 43 may be disposed of on terms inclusive of a development charge which is less than the full development value, but there is nothing in the Act to which your Lordships' attention was drawn to show that land cannot be sold at prices higher than its existing use value, and I am unable to see that the discretion, if there is a discretion, which the board have to assess the development charge on less than the full developed value has any bearing on the interpretation of s. 43. E F G H

LORD MACDERMOTT: My Lords, this appeal seems to me to present little difficulty once a decision is reached as to the true construction of s. 43 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. This sub-section provides as follows:

"The Central Land Board may, with the approval of the Minister, by agreement acquire land for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of this Act, and in particular may so acquire any land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted under Part III of this Act on terms inclusive of any development charge payable under those provisions in respect of that development."

In the course of the argument three views were advanced as to the meaning of this enactment. These, in my opinion, exhaust the relevant possibilities. They may be stated thus: (i) The second limb of the sub-section confers a power separate and distinct from, and wholly independent of, that contained in the first limb, the words "and in particular" which introduce the second limb being used as words of emphasis only and not as indicating an example of the power conferred by the first; (ii) the second limb but particularises something already within the general terms of the first, and, accordingly, the expression "for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions" must be satisfied before power arises under either limb—in other words, the board will have no power of acquisition in a case falling within the language of the second limb if the purpose of the acquisition is not also in fact connected with the performance of their functions under the subsequent provisions of the Act; and (iii) the second limb gives an instance of the power conferred by the first, but in terms which amount to a statutory recognition of the purpose described in the second limb as being within the scope of the first. Accordingly, if the case comes within the wording of the second limb (the word "so" being read as connoting acquisition by agreement and with the approval of the Minister) there is no need, in order to perfect the power it purports to confer, to trace a connection between the purpose therein mentioned and the performance of some function of the board. Of these alternatives view (i) is the most easily discarded. The structure of the sub-section is against it and so, I think, is the ordinary usage of the expression "in particular", though, no doubt, these words are occasionally employed merely to stress or direct attention to what they preface. Moreover, I find it difficult to see why a power to acquire land should be conferred on a statutory body in terms which are not to be related to the performance of its statutory functions, as the acceptance of this view would apparently entail. It seems to me that the proper approach to the second limb must be through the first, and not regardless of it, and, if that is right, view (i) falls out of account and the choice lies between views (ii) and (iii).

This choice I am content to make on what appears to me to be the natural meaning of the wording of s. 43 (1), for I have not found elsewhere in the Act anything to indicate that the language of the sub-section is used otherwise than in its ordinary everyday sense. Reading the enactment in this way I am in favour of view (iii). The word "so" in the expression "and in particular may so acquire" at the beginning of the second limb incorporates the earlier words of the first limb, "with the approval of the Minister, by agreement . . ." but it is, I think, impossible to go further and say that it also incorporates the expression "for any purpose connected with the performance of their functions." And if that expression is not to be read into the second limb by way of reference I see no good reason for implying it on the strength of the context. It may also be observed that view (ii), unlike view (iii), denies the second limb any practical legislative effect, and, further, that in s. 43 (2) the words "for any such purpose as aforesaid" are, grammatically and naturally, capable of referring to the purpose described in the second limb alone. Both these considerations seem to me to lend support to view (iii) and the definitive character of the second limb which it adopts, but, when all is said, perhaps the best reason for the conclusion I have reached is just that it accords with what this second limb of the sub-section says, namely, that the board "may so"—i.e., by agreement and with ministerial approval—"acquire any land for the purpose of disposing of it for development . . . on terms inclusive of any development charge . . ." If the purpose thus described had no perceptible connection with the performance of the board's statutory functions the position might be different. But, as it is, the purpose of disposing of land ripe for development at a price inclusive of the development charge is, prima facie, connected with the board's function of collecting the charge, and I think what the legislature has done in the second limb is simply to preclude the possibility of contention as to whether, in fact, a connection of this sort exists by coupling the power to acquire plainly and directly to the specified purpose. I find nothing strange or irrational in this for it is reasonable enough that a purchaser from the board who pays the development charge as part of the price should not have his title dependent on what may or may not come within a phrase so vague and wide as "any purpose connected with the performance of their functions under the following provisions of this Act".

My Lords, with s. 43 (1) construed in this manner, there is no need to embark on the task of tracing a connection between the acquisition in question and the board's statutory functions. The bona fides of the board and the genuineness of their resolution of May 13, 1949, have not been challenged. This resolution states the purpose of the acquisition in terms which echo those of the second limb of s. 43 (1), and there has been no suggestion that in fact such was not the true and immediate purpose of the acquisition. In these circumstances it is, in my opinion, beside the point that, in seeking to acquire land for the purpose thus stated, the members of the board, or some of them, may have been moved by considerations of policy which, in themselves, would not (as I shall assume without deciding) constitute a purpose within the meaning of any part of s. 43 (1). The short answer to all the submissions as to motive is that on the facts here the board have brought their case within the express terms of the second limb of that sub-section. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, this case turns on the proper construction of s. 43 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. [HIS LORDSHIP read the sub-section and continued:] Sub-section (2) goes on to give the Minister power to authorise the board to acquire the land compulsorily in any such case where the board are unable to acquire the land by agreement on reasonable terms if he considers it expedient in the public interest that the board should acquire the land for any such purpose.

Now, it is not in dispute that, in the present case, the compulsory purchase was made with a view to the acquisition of the land by the board for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission had been granted at an inclusive price, a transaction which is plainly within the express language of sub-s. (1). But it is said that the order was ultra vires by reason of the words in the sub-section preceding the words "in particular". My Lords, it is, of course, possible that the preceding words might have been so framed as to bring about this somewhat surprising result, but they would have to be very clear before I was persuaded to put such a construction on them. In my view, the true construction of this sub-section is that placed on it by SOMERVELL, L.J., where he says ([1951] 1 All E.R. 990):

"I think that the words should be construed as making it clear that a certain power, as to which there might have been doubt, is to be regarded as one in connection with the functions of the board."

I think it would otherwise have been open to debate whether or not a purchase of this kind was connected with the functions of the board. The language

- used has, however, in my view, placed the matter beyond dispute, although were it necessary for the decision of the case I should have been prepared to hold that such a purchase was "connected with" two functions of the board, viz., their function of assessing the development charge and their function of collecting it. I think that unrestricted sales on a large scale at prices in excess of existing use value would render more difficult the proper ascertainment of the true
- A existing use value which is a necessary element in calculating the development charge, and that, it being the function of the board to collect the charge to set it against the payments which they will have to make out of the £300,000,000 compensation fund, a policy which tends to facilitate and ensure a speedy payment of the charge by including it in the sale price is a policy the implementing of which is connected with their fiscal functions under the Act. The
- B declared policy of the board to discourage—by compulsory purchase if necessary—sales of land at prices in excess of existing use value seems to me to be one which the Act has empowered them to carry out by conferring on them this power to acquire land for the purpose of disposing of it for development for which permission has been granted at an inclusive price, and it is impossible to say that purchases made for this purpose are ultra vires. That the Act
- C might have, but did not, prohibit sales in excess of existing use value, or that the exercise of such powers tends to restrict in some degree the right given by s. 64 (2) to assign a claim on the compensation fund, are matters which afford me no assistance in the construction of s. 43 (1). On this short ground I would dismiss this appeal.

Appeal dismissed.

NOTE.

Re A DEBTOR (No. 360 OF 1951). Ex parte THE DEBTOR v. NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK, LTD. AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Jenkins, Hodson, and Romer, L.JJ.), January 11, 14, February 8, 1952.]

- F Bankruptcy—Act of bankruptcy—Remaining out of England with intent to defeat or delay creditors—Standard of proof—Fraudulent preference—Payments to some creditors—Bankruptcy Act, 1914 (c. 59), s. 1 (1) (c) (d).

APPEAL by the debtor from a receiving order in bankruptcy made by Mr. Registrar PARTON on Oct. 17, 1951.

- G The debtor was an American citizen who lived in England for some years down to Nov. 4, 1950. He served in the British Army during the war of 1939-1945, and later engaged in various businesses. He became managing director of a firm called Hillsleigh, Ltd., to which firm the petitioning creditor, the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., made various loans. The debtor guaranteed the repayment of these loans, and also loans made by the bank to one William Lorrain Owen.
- H On Aug. 25, 1950, the bank issued two writs against the debtor, claiming payment of the amounts due under the guarantees. Difficulty was experienced in effecting service, and orders for substituted service were obtained. Judgment was given in both actions against the debtor, in one, on Nov. 14, 1950, under R.S.C., Ord. 14, and in the other, on Dec. 1, 1950, in default of appearance.

On Nov. 4, 1950, the debtor left England for the United States of America, and thereafter he divided his time between the United States and Canada, in both of which countries he had relations and friends. From Nov. 16, 1950, until the presentation of the petition on June 5, 1951, correspondence passed between the bank's solicitors and the debtor's solicitors. The debtor's solicitors stated that the debtor had gone to America to discuss the position with his family. In February, 1951, proposals were made by the bank's solicitors for the payment of the judgment debts by instalments. The proposals were communicated to the debtor, who replied that he was "leaving for Canada next week" and proposed to discuss the matter with his family solicitor. On May 18, 1951, the debtor's solicitors informed the bank's solicitors that the debtor was still in America and that they "could not take the matter further". The bank's solicitors obtained an order for service of the bankruptcy petition in New York, at an address obtained by them from solicitors acting for a Colonel Dodds Parker who claimed to be a creditor of the debtor.

The petition was founded on the allegation that the debtor within three months before the date of the presentation of the petition had committed an act of bankruptcy within the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (d), viz., on or about Dec. 6, 1950, with intent to defeat or delay his creditors, the debtor departed out of England and being out of England with a like intent remained out of England and continued so to remain at the date of the presentation of the petition. On Oct. 12, 1951, the debtor swore an affidavit in New York in which he denied that it was or had at any time been his intention to defeat or delay his creditors. He said that he intended to return to England in or about March, 1952. He had, he said, paid various debts in England amounting to £1,757 18s. since he went to America, and, if given reasonable time in which to develop his present business and to obtain the assistance of relatives and friends, he could pay all his debts in full. He was a prospective beneficiary under his mother's will, but, if made bankrupt, he would be deprived of that inheritance by a clause in the will.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 8. JENKINS, L.J., in a written judgment, said that he did not think that the order under appeal was warranted by the evidence. Intent to defeat or delay creditors was an essential element in the act of bankruptcy defined by s. 1 (1) (d) of the Act, and the onus was on the petitioning creditor to prove such intent. HIS LORDSHIP appreciated that direct evidence of intent was rarely available, and that proof of it must, generally speaking, be a matter of inference from the circumstances in each case. He was sensible also of the caution as to the degree of proof which a court should require administered by the Court of Appeal in Re M. Kushler, Ltd. (1). That was a case of fraudulent preference, but the same principle applied here. An intent to defeat or delay creditors was a fact to be proved like any other, and it was wrong to hold that the onus of proof could only be discharged by demonstrating that the existence of such an intent on the debtor's part was the only possible explanation of the debtor's conduct.

The proper standard of proof of the fact of such intent was no less and no more than the common standard of proof, which demanded at least that the court should be satisfied that in all the circumstances of the case the presence of the intent was so much the most probable explanation of the debtor's conduct as to make it in effect the only probable one.

A HIS LORDSHIP asked himself, therefore, whether in all the circumstances of the case it was proved by this standard that the debtor, who, admittedly being out of England, remained out of England, did so with intent to defeat or delay his creditors? In other words, was this in effect the only probable, though not necessarily the only possible, explanation of his conduct? In his judgment, those questions should be answered in the negative. It was to be noted that the debtor was of American origin. It was, therefore, a reasonable supposition that B the debtor genuinely believed that, if he went to and remained in America, he would be in a better position to raise funds wherewith to pay his creditors than if he remained in this country. The distinction in the matter of inferring intent between an Englishman going to a strange country and a foreigner returning to his own country or an Englishman returning from England to a foreign country in which he had made his home was recognised in Ex p. Crispin. Re Crispin (2), C Ex p. Gutierrez. Re Gutierrez (3), and Ex p. Brandon. Re Trench (4), although those cases did not by any means conclude the present case in the debtor's favour.

D The bank had relied on the evidence that the debtor had paid to various creditors sums totalling £1,757 18s. as supporting their contentions because the payments involved preference of some creditors over others, and this view seemed to have been taken by the learned registrar. In HIS LORDSHIP's view, so far from being evidence of intent to defeat or delay the debtor's creditors, these payments were cogent evidence of an intention on the debtor's part to pay his creditors as and when he could.

E Once it was conceded that the original departure from England was not with intent to defeat or delay creditors, but, on the contrary, was with intent to raise funds wherewith to pay them, a change to the opposite and nefarious intent was not to be lightly inferred. If the debtor had engaged in business in the United States of America and hoped by this means to obtain money to pay his creditors, the mere prolongation of his absence provided no evidence of intent to defeat or delay his creditors. This case was clearly distinguishable on its facts from Ex p. Campbell. Re Wallace (5).

F Counsel for the bank had suggested that the receiving order could in any case be supported on the strength of an act of bankruptcy under the Bankruptcy Act, 1914, s. 1 (1) (c), on the debtor's own admission that in making the payments totalling £1,757 18s. he had preferred some creditors to others. There were several objections to this course. First, it seemed questionable whether a mere payment was a "conveyance or transfer of property" within s. 1 (1) (c), which did not expressly mention payments, particularly in view of the fact that s. 44 of the G Act (which dealt with fraudulent preferences) did expressly mention payments as well as conveyances or transfers. Secondly, some evidence of intent beyond the mere fact of payment was necessary, and here there was none. Finally, there was no evidence that any of these payments was made within the three months preceding the presentation of the petition.

MINISTER OF MATERIALS v. STEEL BROTHERS & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton and Morris, L.J.J., and Lloyd-Jacob, J.), February 5, 6, 7, 8, 1952.]

Sale of Goods—Quality—Clause regulating buyer's claim for inferior quality—Application to deterioration owing to defective packing.

Under a contract in writing for the sale of goods the buyer agreed to purchase rubber known as "R.M.A.2 ribbed smoked sheet Hevea Braziliensis". A clause in the contract read as follows: "Quality: To be as described above. If found inferior . . . buyer shall accept the rubber with a fair allowance . . . Notice in writing of any objection on the grounds of quality must be given . . . not later than sixty days after discharge of goods at destination . . ." The sellers delivered the rubber to the buyer's warehouse, where later the buyer discovered that it had suffered damage through the adhesion of defective coverings in which the sellers had wrapped it. The buyer gave notice of objection outside the time limit laid down by the quality clause in the contract, and the sellers refused to admit the claim on the ground that the notice of objection was out of time.

HELD: the complaint of the buyer was not that the sellers had supplied goods which were not of the quality contracted for, but that the goods supplied had suffered damage; the words of the quality clause were not expressed with sufficient clarity to include such damage to the goods as had been suffered in this case; and, accordingly, the buyer's claim was not out of time and he was entitled to an allowance.

APPEAL by the buyer from an order of McNAIR, J., dated July 20, 1951, made on a Special Case stated by the appeal tribunal of the Rubber Manufacturers Association.

The buyer under a contract for the sale of goods claimed an allowance for deterioration caused by defective packing, but the sellers rejected the claim as being out of the time laid down by a clause in the contract regulating defects as to quality. The dispute was referred to arbitration, and the arbitrators found that the quality clause in the contract applied to the defect in question, so that the buyer was out of time in his claim. The buyer appealed to the appeal tribunal, who upheld the award of the arbitrators. The appeal tribunal stated their award in the form of a Special Case for the opinion of the High Court, and McNAIR, J., set aside their award. The sellers appealed.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This dispute arises out of a contract for the sale of rubber. The parties to the contract were the Board of Trade, Rubber Directorate, as buyer, and Steel Brothers & Co., Ltd., the sellers. The position of the Board of Trade is now taken by the Minister of Materials. The contract is in the terms of this note from the sellers' brokers to the buyer:

"We have this day bought for your account from our principals Messrs. Steel Brothers & Co., Ltd., whose solvency we guarantee, the following plantation rubber, in bales and/or cases and/or bareback, viz., about nine and a half tons R.M.A.2. Ribbed Smoked Sheet Hevea Brasiliensis at forty-nine and a half Straits cents per lb. nett shipping weights to be delivered free on board at Rangoon during the month December, 1946, for shipment to London and/or Liverpool."

Below that there is a note:

A "This purchase is made subject to . . . (b) The f.o.b. contract for eastern ports adopted by the Rubber Trade Association of London to be effective on and after June 13, 1946, and agreed by the Board of Trade, Rubber Directorate."

B In fulfilment of that contract the sellers delivered to the ship selected by them according to the contract the amount of rubber called for by the contract. The grade of the rubber, in the terms of the contract, was to be "R.M.A.2.", which meant "Rubber Manufacturers Association, Grade 2". The rubber reached Liverpool in due course and was placed in a warehouse. When it was examined on behalf of the buyer a long time afterwards, it was found that some of it was damaged. The buyer made a claim against the sellers, which was first indicated by a letter from the buyer to the sellers' brokers, dated July 2, 1947, C which was in these terms:

"We have been advised by the wharfingers who are storing the above-mentioned parcel of rubber that the hessian covering the five hundred bales is adhering to the rubber and the rubber beneath the wrapping has become tacky as a result of a preparation applied to the hessian as a rot-proofing agent. The wharfingers asked a firm of surveyors to inspect this rubber, D and they suggested that a sample should be sent to a chemist to be analysed. The result of the analysis shows that there is oil in the hessian and this has acted on the rubber. To avoid further damage to the rubber it will be necessary to strip the hessian from the rubber and also the wrapper sheets which are damaged, and we hereby hold you responsible for the charges which will accrue. If you desire to inspect this rubber, we shall be pleased E to make the necessary inspection order available."

The sellers answered that the notification of claim was too late, and they based that contention on a term in the f.o.b. contract for eastern ports which was brought into the terms of the contract of sale by the note at the foot of the contract which I have read. The term is:

F "Quality: To be as described above. If found inferior, and failing an amicable settlement, buyer shall accept the rubber with a fair allowance to be decided by arbitration in London. Notice in writing of any objection on the grounds of quality must be given by last buyer to his broker in London not later than fifty-six days after discharge of goods at destination declared under this contract."

G The period of fifty-six days mentioned was altered by letter of a later date to sixty days. The answer made by the sellers was that the claim in respect of these goods related to quality, and that, as no notification of it was made until some eighty-five days after discharge, the claim of the buyer was out of time. It was said that the clause relating to quality contained a condition precedent to the buyer recovering an allowance in respect of these goods, and that the H claim was barred.

The dispute was referred to the arbitration of two arbitrators, and they, stating their award in the form of a Special Case, came to the conclusion that the contention of the sellers was right. There was an appeal from their decision to the appeal tribunal of the Rubber Manufacturers Association, and that tribunal likewise decided in favour of the sellers. At the request of the parties, they stated their award in the form of a Special Case. That case was argued before McNair, J., who reached the conclusion that the decision of the appeal tribunal was wrong, that the quality clause in the contract did not apply to this dispute, and that, consequently, the buyer's claim was not barred by lapse of time.

The quality clause begins by the words "Quality: To be as described above." If one refers back to the particular contract, one finds that the quality is contained in those letters, "R.M.A.2." That is a well-recognised grade of rubber, and the rubber which was to be supplied was ribbed smoked sheet. In the association's form of contract the preceding clause is a packing clause. The marginal note is "Packing", and that reads:

"In the case of ribbed smoked sheets each package of rubber shall be completely wrapped on all sides with equal quality sheet, and, in the case of other grades, in conformity with such specifications as may be prescribed from time to time by the Rubber Trade Association of London. Non-compliance with the foregoing shall not form a ground of rejection, but buyer shall be entitled to claim an allowance if it is proved that the contents have deteriorated owing to defective packing and for inferior quality wrappers. Where rubber is packed in bales or bareback, sellers not to be responsible for contents arriving in massed condition."

If a question arises on that clause, it does not appear that there is any time limit other than that prescribed by the Limitation Act, 1939, but the submission of counsel for the sellers is that, if you have deterioration in quality through bad packing, the quality clause applies and with it the limitation of sixty days within which a claim could be made also. Counsel for the buyer drew our attention to the words in the packing clause:

"Non-compliance with the foregoing shall not form a ground of rejection, but buyer shall be entitled to claim an allowance if it is proved that the contents have deteriorated owing to defective packing and for inferior quality wrappers."

[HIS LORDSHIP read the certificate of the grading committee of the association, said that that document showed that the goods, speaking generally, were equal to the contract quality, but that at some date after June 25, 1947, some of them had been damaged by reason of faulty wrappers, and continued:] In those circumstances the question, and the only question, which arises is: Was the claim made by the buyer too late? In other words, is the submission which counsel made on behalf of the sellers, that the quality clause applied to the damage in this case, right? In Szymonowski & Co. v. Beck & Co. (1) a somewhat similar question was raised, a discussion took place as to how far a clause of this kind gave protection to a party to a contract, and BANKES, L.J., said ([1923] 1 K.B. 464):

"A buyer has, in the event of his seller breaking his contract, a prima facie right to avail himself of one or other of several alternative remedies, and if the seller desires by a clause in the contract to restrict the buyer's right to those remedies he must say plainly whether he intends to deprive the buyer in certain events of all those remedies or only of one or more of them, and if so of which."

SCRUTTON, L.J., said (ibid., 466):

"The sellers relied on a printed clause No. 5 on the back of the contract. Now I approach the consideration of that clause applying the principle repeatedly acted upon by the House of Lords and by this court—that if a party wishes to exclude the ordinary consequences that would flow in law from the contract that he is making he must do so in clear terms."

There was an appeal to the House of Lords in that case, where the judgment of the Court of Appeal was upheld, LORD BUCKMASTER dissenting. LORD BUCKMASTER, in his dissenting speech, said ([1924] A.C. 48):

"The sole question, and it is one of some difficulty, is whether the general provisions of the clause apply to the particular breach? I agree with what was said by SCRUTTON, L.J., that in a contract from which the ordinary rights of buyer and seller ensue an attempt to exclude either party from those rights by general terms applicable to all contracts can only be effected by the use of plain language."

A That, indeed, is the accepted principle which we have to apply.

Counsel for the buyer submitted that the quality clause in the contract did not cover this dispute. He argued that he was entitled to infer from the terms of the certificate of the grading committee that the damage did not fall within the quality clause at all, and he said that, if he had had to settle a pleading in this case, he would have set up either a breach of the packing clause, as to which

B there was no time limit, or a breach of an implied term in the contract. The bales, he said, had to be wrapped in hessian covers according to the ordinary practice, hessian coverings were put on them, and there must be implied into the contract a term that the covers used would be proper and suitable for their purpose. If they were not, there would be breach of an implied term in the contract entitling the buyer to damages for breach of contract, a claim which

C would not fall within the quality clause at all. The submission of counsel for the sellers was that it did not matter what the cause of the damage was. The goods were found inferior within the meaning of the quality clause, and it mattered not whether they were found inferior by reason of damage during the voyage or at some later stage. The damage was something which went to quality, and it followed that the time limit in the quality clause applied. Indeed, his

D submission went further and was that, if at any time when the goods were examined after they had been discharged from the ship and put into warehouse, they were found damaged from any cause, that went to quality, and, however they had been damaged, the sixty days' limitation applied.

I do not think that the quality clause in this general form of contract covers a claim for damage. The claim of the buyer is not that there was anything wrong

E with the quality of the goods supplied, but that the coverings were unsuitable and caused damage to the goods at some later stage. If the sellers wished to avoid a claim of that kind, or to limit the time in which such a claim could be made, they ought to have used clearer terms. They could have said in their contract that no claim of any kind should be made or received after sixty days had gone. They did not say that. The time limit applies, and applies only, in

F respect of quality. In my opinion, the judgment of McNAIR, J., was right.

MORRIS, L.J.: I find myself in entire agreement with the judgment which my Lord has just delivered. The question of law which arose for the decision of the court was by agreement stated as follows: .

G "Whether, on the true construction of the said contract, the buyer is precluded from recovering damages in respect of the damage sustained by the goods delivered under the said contract (such damage being of the nature found in the award and caused in manner found by the award) by reason of the fact that notice of a claim in respect of such damage was not given until eighty-five days after the discharge of the said goods into a recognised warehouse."

H The point, therefore, was whether the buyer was precluded from recovering damages in respect of the damage sustained by the goods delivered under the contract. The quality clause does not, in so many words, state that, unless there is a notice in writing of an objection within the stipulated period, a claim shall be barred, but it was common ground that the words must be read as meaning that, if a notice in writing of an objection on the grounds of quality is not given within that period, a claim is barred. Counsel for the sellers submitted that any claim that related to the condition of the goods was a claim under which objection was made on the grounds of quality. The contract is one for the sale of goods f.o.b. There are, however, certain special terms. One is that certain loss in weight during transit, excluding theft and pilferage, may be for the sellers' account. Another is that on the sellers is imposed an obligation to engage the necessary tonnage. The sellers may dispatch the rubber in bales and/or cases and/or bareback. If, in the exercise of their option, the sellers choose to pack the rubber, it is not disputed that they must pack it properly. The claim which is put forward by the buyers is that the rubber sustained damage because it was defectively packed. It is not said that the rubber that was shipped was not properly described at R.M.A.2. ribbed smoked sheets, Hevea Braziliensis.

There is clear authority for the proposition that, if a party to a contract wishes to exclude the ordinary consequences that would flow in law from the contract that he is making, he must do so in clear and unambiguous terms. In my judgment, it is not shown that the claim which the buyer makes is barred by the words relied on. He does not raise an objection on the grounds of quality. He does not say that the rubber was, as to its quality, inferior to the quality denoted by the contract. Even if it could be said that the complaint could in words be formulated so as to be an objection to the quality of the rubber, the buyer did not need so to formulate it, and, if otherwise formulated, it is not within the barring words. The buyer does not, in fact, assert, and does not need to assert, that the rubber, when shipped, was not of contract quality. He does not need to assert that the rubber on arrival was not of contract quality. What is said is that, because of defective packing, damage was at some date caused to rubber which was of contract quality. I agree with the learned judge that a claim based on a term of the contract, either express or implied, that the packing should be of such a nature as not to damage the goods is not to be regarded as an objection on the grounds of quality within the words of this particular clause in this contract.

LLOYD-JACOB, J.: I also agree. It is said that the clause prescribing a time limit within which objection may justifiably be made by the buyer must be clear and free from ambiguity, if it is to operate effectively as a bar. The clause relied on, to which the side-note "Quality" is applied, begins with the phrase, "to be as described above." The description to which a reference is thus made is of the type of material to be loaded at Rangoon for shipment. The clause proceeds, "if found inferior . . .", and this plainly imports the potentiality of a determination in conformity, or otherwise, with the description at a date subsequent to the time of loading. The question whether, on its true construction, this clause calls for conformity with the description at the time of loading, or at the time of discharge at the warehouse, or at the time of examination, if any, only arises if it be assumed that a variation in description is contemplated as possible with the passage of time or with the subsequent examination. No evidence is available as to the general understanding of these words by those experienced in the trade, and it is noteworthy that changes in condition of the goods between the time of loading and delivery are specifically referred to elsewhere in the contract. One reference does appear in the quality clause itself, and that is to mouldy wrapper sheets, and this might conceivably be regarded as a reference to a condition, but, as it is found in that part of the clause which is dealing with sampling, it may well be included merely for convenience of reference and to avoid repetition of directions for sampling in other parts of the contract. I agree that there are plain difficulties in construing the language of this agreement, and, were it necessary to decide the point, I should, as at present advised, be disposed to hold that the quality clause cannot fairly be construed as though after the words "if found inferior" there were notionally inserted the phrase, "that is not in accordance with description or in an unsatisfactory condition." It is, however, sufficient, for the purpose of the present case, to hold that the clause is certainly not so clear in its terms as to give to the buyer a clear indication that an objection on the grounds of unsatisfactory condition must be presented within the time limit prescribed in the clause. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

WEBB v. WEBB.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (KARMINSKI, J.), January 30, 31, 1952.]

Divorce—Custody—"Child the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings"—Child born during marriage, but not child of husband—Husband registered as father—Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950 (c. 25), s. 26 (1).

Before her marriage the wife conceived a child by a man who was not her husband. She told the husband that she was pregnant, and, when the child was born after the marriage, he registered himself as the father of the child. The wife, having obtained a decree nisi against the husband, applied for an order for the custody of the child.

HELD: on the true construction of s. 26 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, the child with relation to whose custody the order is made must be a child of the marriage of persons who are in fact the parents of the child; the husband was not the parent of the child; and, therefore, the court had no power to make an order for custody.

FOR THE MATRIMONIAL CAUSES ACT, 1950, s. 26 (1), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 29, p. 413.

APPLICATION by the wife, who had obtained a decree nisi against her husband, for the custody of a child born during the marriage, but whose father was not the husband.

Miss M. Morgan Gibbon for the wife.

J. B. Gardner for the husband.

KARMINSKI, J.: This is an application by the wife, who today obtained a decree of dissolution of her marriage, for the custody of a child born during the marriage.

The parties were married on Nov. 19, 1947. The child was born on Jan. 9, 1948. In the proceedings which were completed today it was made abundantly clear—and, indeed, it was never contested—that the father of this child, who was conceived in or about April, 1947, was a man other than the husband. It is fair to say that the wife told the husband she was pregnant by this man some months before the marriage, that the husband accepted the position and undertook to look after the child as his own, and, indeed, that when the child was born in January, 1948, he registered himself as being the father of the child.

The wife having obtained a decree nisi, I am asked by her counsel to make an order in her favour for custody of that child. I have heard an interesting and ingenious argument, but, in my view, the matter is concluded by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 26 (1) which provides:

"In any proceedings for divorce or nullity of marriage or judicial separation, the court may from time to time, either before or by or after the final decree, make such provision as appears just with respect to the custody, maintenance and education of the children the marriage of whose parents is the subject of the proceedings, or, if it thinks fit, direct proper proceedings to be taken for placing the children under the protection of the court."

The essence of that sub-section is this. First, there must be a child or children. Then there must be a marriage, but the marriage has to be a marriage of the persons who are in fact and in flesh and blood the parents of the child. Counsel for the wife has argued that because this child was born during the currency of the marriage, therefore, it is prima facie not only legitimate, but the child of the parties in this case. I think the proposition so far is unexceptional, but the presumption of legitimacy cannot, in my view, survive clear and cogent evidence to the contrary. Counsel invited me to divide my mind into two separate compartments—one, to deal with the history and facts of the marriage as they were given in evidence in a heavily contested case, and the other, to regard only the birth of the child and the fact that there was a marriage before that birth.

On an application for custody it would be quite wrong to disregard the important fact that clear and compelling evidence was given in the other part of the suit, which, in my view, completely destroys and rebuts any presumption which may have existed until that evidence was given that the child of the marriage was the child of the husband and wife. In my view, s. 26 (1) means precisely what it says, namely, that the child with relation to whose custody an order is to be made is a child of the marriage of his parents. In this case clearly the husband was not the father of the child, and I hold that I have no jurisdiction to make an order in respect of the custody of the child.

Application dismissed.

SMITH v. W. H. SMITH AND SONS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), February 18, 1952.]

Negligence—Judgment—Both parties to blame—Judgment on claim and counter-claim for damages in proportion to responsibility for damage—Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 (c. 28), s. 1 (1).

Negligence—Costs—Both parties to blame.

The plaintiff's motor car was in collision with a motor van driven by a servant of the defendants. Both vehicles suffered damage, the plaintiff claimed damages for negligence, and the defendants filed a counterclaim on the same ground. The county court judge found both parties equally to blame, and he dismissed the claim with costs and the counterclaim with costs.

HELD: (i) having regard to the terms of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1), the proper form of order was judgment on the claim for damages in respect of half of the damage proved by the plaintiff and judgment on the counterclaim for damages in respect of half of the damage proved by the defendants.

(ii) the order as to costs made by the county court judge gave an undue advantage to the defendants, and without laying down any rule of practice to be followed in all cases in which there were cross-claims for negligence and each side was held equally to blame, justice would be done in the present case if there were no order as to costs on the claim or counterclaim.

APPEAL by plaintiff from an order made by His Honour JUDGE DONALD HURST at Oxford County Court on Nov. 12, 1951.

J. D. May for the plaintiff.

H. B. Grant for the defendants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The claim in the present action was for damages for negligence arising out of a collision between two motor vehicles at Headington, Oxford. The vehicles involved were the private motor car of the plaintiff and a van driven by a servant of the defendants. The damage suffered by the plaintiff was, except for a difference of a few shillings, of the same amount as that suffered by the defendants. The county court judge concluded that the parties were equally to blame, and he dismissed the plaintiff's claim and a counterclaim brought by the defendants, in each case with costs. We are told that the judge's attention was drawn to the provisions of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, and, no doubt, he had them in mind, but the making of the order in the form in which he made it is in two respects open to criticism. The result, having regard to Wilson v. Walters (1) and other authorities, is that the defendants would appear to gain an appreciable advantage, for the plaintiff would have to pay their general costs of the action while they would be liable to pay by way of costs of the counterclaim only such costs as the registrar would allow as being costs additionally incurred by reason of the fact that there was a counterclaim, and the latter would be trivial compared with the former.

It was submitted that, having regard to the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1), even though the monetary result was not different from the result achieved by the judge's order, the plaintiff was entitled to have judgment for damages in respect of half his damage, and counsel for the plaintiff conceded that the defendants were equally entitled to judgment for damages for half the damage they had proved. The substantial matter of the form of order has not been in dispute, and I am satisfied, in view of the terms of the Act, that the judge should have made the order in the form suggested, that is, judgment on the claim in respect of half the damage proved by the plaintiff and judgment on the counterclaim in respect of half the damage proved by the defendants.

The defendants' claim for damages set out in their counterclaim amounted to £58 6s. 11d., and that sum was admitted. The plaintiff's claim, admitted or proved in evidence, amounted to £58 15s. 2d. and thus exceeds the claim of the defendants by the sum of 8s. 3d. When divided by two the result is that the difference between them is reduced to approximately 4s. Even so, in my judgment, the order made ought to be set aside and in lieu there should be judgment for the plaintiff on the claim for half £58 15s. 2d., namely, £29 7s. 7d., and judgment for the defendants on the counterclaim for half £58 6s. 11d., namely, £29 3s. 5½d.

There remains the question of costs. In the ordinary way this court would not interfere with the exercise of the judge's discretion in the matter of costs, but the form of order as to costs which he made clearly depended on the form of order dismissing the claim and counterclaim. Once the latter is displaced it seems to me that the form of order as to costs cannot stand, and that this court, in the exercise of our discretion, must decide how the costs should be borne. It has been suggested that there should be, so to say, a reversal of the judge's order—that, each party having succeeded to an appreciable extent, the plaintiff should get the costs of the action and the defendants the costs of the counterclaim. That would, as it seems to me, give an advantage to the plaintiff equally deserving with the advantage which the judge's order as to costs gave to the defendants. I do not wish to be thought to be laying down any rule of practice to be followed in all cases in which there are cross-claims for negligence and each side is held equally or approximately equally to blame. The judges of the Queen's Bench Division have great experience in this class of case and deal with matters of costs according to their discretion, avoiding when possible the complexities of a double taxation: see William A. Jay & Sons v. Veevers, Ltd. (2). In this case I think that justice would be done if there were no order as to costs on the claim or the counterclaim in the court below. The order of the learned judge should be set aside and there should be substituted judgment for the figures I have given in favour of the plaintiff and the defendants, with no order as to costs.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree.

HODSON, L.J.: I think it might be useful to refer to a decision of this court in Cinema Press, Ltd. v. Pictures & Pleasures, Ltd. (3), in which LORD GODDARD delivered the judgment of the court. That was not a case involving claim and counterclaim, but there was a complicated decision which produced difficulties on taxation. In the closing passage of his judgment ([1945] 1 All E.R. 444) LORD GODDARD cited LORD BLANESBURGH's speech in Medway Oil & Storage Co. v. Continental Contractors (4) ([1929] A.C. 112):

“... this appeal will not be without permanent utility if it brings home to learned judges the necessity, in cases like these, of adjusting critically their orders as to costs if these orders are not sometimes to produce results at once unintentional and unjust’.”

LORD GODDARD, in giving the judgment of the court, added these words:

“We would add that the simplest way is to award costs in such proportions as the judge thinks fair.”

I agree with the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., and with the order proposed.

Appeal allowed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. DOWDELL O'MAHONEY & CO., LTD.

HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Oaksey, Lord Reid, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Tucker), November 14, 15, 16, 1951, February 25, 1952.]

Excess Profits Tax—Deductions against profits—Deduction of Eire taxes against English profits—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, r. 3 (a)—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939 (c. 109), sched. VII, Part I, para. 5, para. 8—Finance Act, 1940 (c. 29), s. 30 (1) (2).

A company resident in Eire carried on business at two branches in England. The whole of its profits, including those arising from the businesses in England, were subject in Eire to income tax, corporation profits tax (corresponding to the United Kingdom national defence contribution), and excess profits tax, and its profits from the businesses in England were subject to United Kingdom excess profits tax. The company sought to deduct a proportion of the Eire taxes in computing the profits of the businesses in England for assessment to excess profits tax in the United Kingdom.

HELD: (i) the Irish taxes were not disbursements or expenses wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the company's trade in the United Kingdom within the meaning of r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, to the Income Tax Act, 1918; they were not paid for the purpose of earning profits, but were an application of the profits when made; and, therefore, the exception to the rule (as applied by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 14 (1)) did not authorise the deduction claimed.

Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland. Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 367), and dictum of LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield ([1906] A.C. 453), applied.

Stevens v. Durban-Roodeport Gold Mining Co. (1909) (100 L.T. 481), considered.

(ii) although the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, sched. VII, Part I, para. 5 and para. 8, indicated a belief on the part of the legislature that there existed a right to deduct such taxes in computing profits, that belief was erroneous, and those provisions could not be regarded as enacting by implication that such a deduction should be allowed; the Finance Act, 1940, s. 30, conferred no new power on the commissioners to allow a deduction unless an appropriate Order in Council were made; and no such Order had at the relevant time been made.

Decision of COURT OF APPEAL ([1950] 1 All E.R. 969), reversed.

APPEAL by the Crown from an order of the Court of Appeal (SOMERVELL and SINGLETON, L.JJ., and ROXBURGH, J.) dated Apr. 4, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 969, allowing the appeal of the taxpayer, Dowdell O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd., from an order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., dated Oct. 25, 1949, remitting to the Special Commissioners a Case stated for the opinion of the High Court for them to state the evidence on which their finding was based, and to state, in summary form, the nature, effect, and incidence of the three Irish taxes referred to.

Both parties agreed that the Case set out all the evidence called, and they agreed in summary form a statement as to the Irish taxes. The appeal to the Court of Appeal was placed in the interlocutory list for hearing, but the Court of Appeal decided that it had jurisdiction to dispose finally of the substantive issue. The transfer of the appeal to the final list was ordered, the order of CROOM-JOHNSON, J., for remitting the Case to the Special Commissioners was set aside, and the Court of Appeal heard the appeal as a final appeal.

Cyril King, Q.C., and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.
Grant, Q.C., and Senter for the taxpayer.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 25. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, the question arising in the present appeal is whether the proportion of certain taxes paid by Dowdell O'Mahoney & Co., Ltd. (hereinafter referred to as "the company") in Eire in respect of profits of its trade arising in England are deductible in arriving at its profits assessable to excess profits tax of the United Kingdom. An agreed memorandum as to the nature of these Irish taxes was put in and is as follows:

"That the Irish income tax, corporation profits tax and excess profits tax referred to in the Case Stated were imposed under Irish statutes, the provisions of which are similar to the provisions of the United Kingdom Finance Acts imposing income tax, national defence contribution and excess profits tax, and in particular that the Irish income tax was imposed on the profits of a trade, which profits were computed on income tax principles similar to United Kingdom income tax principles and that the profits of a trade for assessment to Irish corporation profits tax and excess profits tax were computed on Irish income tax principles with adaptations similar to the adaptations for the purposes of United Kingdom national defence contribution and excess profits tax."

The company was incorporated in Eire and it is managed, controlled and resident there. Its business there is that of margarine manufacturers and butter merchants. It has two branches in England, one at Manchester and the other at Cardiff, where a general grocery business is carried on.

In the Court of Appeal and in your Lordships' House the question raised was treated as involving two points: (i) whether the Irish taxes in question were disbursements or expenses wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade of the company in England within the meaning of r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D; and (ii) whether, even if they were not, the company was entitled to deduct them by reason of the provisions of para. 5 of Part I of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, and s. 30 of the Finance Act, 1940. On the first question it was contended on behalf of the appellants that the authorities establish that the payment of such taxes by a trader is not a disbursement wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of his trade, and that this is so whether such taxes are United Kingdom taxes or foreign or Dominion taxes, and reliance was placed on Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (1), Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Von Glehn (2), Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Warnes & Co. (3), L. C. Ltd. v. G. B. Ollivant, Ltd. (4), and Smith's Potato Estates, Ltd. v. Bolland. Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5). On behalf of the company it was contended that the principle of these cases ought not to be extended, and that Dominion and foreign taxes stand on a different footing from United Kingdom taxes and ought to be considered as disbursements which the trader has, as a matter of fact and not of law, to pay for the purposes of his trade in the United Kingdom. Reliance was also much placed by the respondents on Stevens v. Durban-Roodeport Gold Mining Co. (6), in which CHANNELL, J., held that a tax paid in the Transvaal of ten per cent. on the net produce obtained from working gold mines should be deducted from the profits of the year to which it related before striking the average for the three years. I may say at once that, in my opinion, this is not a decision which affords much help since it was agreed between the Crown and the taxpayer in that case that the tax on the profits was to be brought into the computation and the only question was whether it was to be deducted from the profits of the year to which it related or from the average profits of three years.

On the first question, I am of opinion that taxes such as those now in question, viz., income tax, corporation profits tax and excess profits tax, are not, according to the authorities, wholly and exclusively laid out for the purposes of the company's trade in the United Kingdom. Taxes such as these are not paid for the purpose of earning the profits of the trade; they are the application of those profits when made and not the less so that they are exacted by a Dominion or foreign government. No clear distinction in point of principle was suggested to your Lordships between such taxes imposed by the United Kingdom government and those imposed by Dominion or foreign governments.

The second question is one of more difficulty, but I have come to the conclusion that neither para. 5 of Part I of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, nor s. 30 of the Finance Act, 1940, confers on the taxpayer the right to deduct such taxes. The provision in para. 5 of Part I of sched. VII to the Act of 1939 was, I think, necessary in order to make clear that, in cases which would otherwise have come under Cases IV and V, deduction of Dominion income tax was still to be allowed although the computation was now by s. 14 (1) to be made under Case I. But this provision confers no new right of deduction: it merely leaves the right to deduct income tax on investments and possessions in the Dominions as before. As to s. 30 of the Finance Act, 1940, I am of opinion that the section confers no new power on the commissioners to allow a deduction in respect of excess profits tax unless an Order in Council has been made, and none had been made at the time the present assessments were made. Sub-section (2) was, I think, intended to allow the commissioners either to make such adjustment of the excess profits tax as might be necessary to give effect to the arrangements with the government of the Dominion or to allow the deduction of the Dominion excess profits tax. It was provided by sub-s. (2), no doubt, that the adjustment should not be less favourable to the taxpayer than the effect of allowing the deduction, but I do not think these words can be read as conferring a right to the deduction unless the Order in Council was made. For these reasons, though not without some doubt, I am of opinion that the appeal must be allowed and I so move your Lordships. In accordance with the order of the Court of Appeal each party will pay their own costs of this appeal.

LORD REID: My Lords, the respondents are a company incorporated, managed and controlled in Eire. They are margarine manufacturers and butter merchants and they had two branches in Manchester and Cardiff where they carried on business as grocers. They were assessed to excess profits tax in the United Kingdom in respect of the profits of these branches for seven consecutive chargeable accounting periods ending on Mar. 31, 1946, for amounts varying between £5,400 and £9,000. They have paid taxes in Eire in respect of the profits of these two branches for these periods and in this case they maintain that they are entitled to deduct taxes which they have paid in Eire in computing the profits of their two branches for the purposes of United Kingdom excess profits tax. No question as to United Kingdom income tax arises because, as a result of an agreement between the British government and the government of the Irish Free State, confirmed by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 23, the respondents, are not liable to pay United Kingdom income tax, but there is nothing in that agreement or elsewhere to modify the ordinary provisions of the law of the United Kingdom with regard to their liability to pay excess profits tax for the periods in question.

Before the Special Commissioners, the respondents contended that the proportion of income tax, corporation profits tax and excess profits tax paid by them in Eire in respect of these two branches was a business expense and deductible in arriving at their profits assessable to excess profits tax in the United Kingdom. The Special Commissioners upheld this contention. In their decision they said:

"In our opinion, it was a necessary expense for the respondent company, in carrying on part of its trade at branches in England, to incur Irish taxes. We hold that the appropriate part of the taxes paid in Eire by the respondent company, applicable to the English branches, constitutes money wholly and exclusively laid out and expended for the purposes of its trade as a whole and is deductible in computing its profits or gains for excess profits tax."

A Case stated by the commissioners came before CROOM-JOHNSON, J., who ordered that the said Case be remitted to the said commissioners for them to state the evidence on which the finding was based that it was a necessary expense of the respondent company in carrying on part of its trade at branches in the United Kingdom to incur Irish taxes, and also for the said commissioners to state in summary form the nature, effect and incidence of the three Irish taxes, referred to in the said Case, and for this latter purpose, but not otherwise, to hear further evidence. The parties agreed a memorandum regarding these matters which is as follows:

"That the Irish income tax, corporation profits tax and excess profits tax referred to in the Case stated were imposed under Irish statutes, the provisions of which are similar to the provisions of the United Kingdom Finance Acts imposing income tax, national defence contribution and excess profits tax, and in particular that the Irish income tax was imposed on the profits of a trade, which profits were computed on income tax principles similar to United Kingdom income tax principles and that the profits of a trade for assessment to Irish corporation profits tax and excess profits tax were computed on Irish income tax principles with adaptations similar to the adaptations for the purposes of United Kingdom national defence contribution and excess profits tax."

The case then came before the Court of Appeal and on Apr. 4, 1950, the respondents' appeal was allowed and the determination of the commissioners affirmed. Against that judgment the present appeal is taken.

Excess profits tax was imposed by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939. Section 14 (1) directs that profits shall be computed on income tax principles as adapted in accordance with the provisions of Part I of sched. VII to the Act and "income tax principles" are defined as meaning the principles on which the profits arising from the trade are computed for the purposes of income tax under Case I of sched. D or would be so computed if income tax were chargeable under that Case in respect of the profits so arising. So those "income tax principles" must be applied to the facts of this case. It is enacted in sched. D:

"(1) Tax under this schedule shall be charged in respect of—(a) The annual profits or gains arising or accruing . . . (ii) to any person residing in the United Kingdom from any trade, profession, employment, or vocation, whether the same be respectively carried on in the United Kingdom or elsewhere; and (iii) to any person, whether a British subject or not, although not resident in the United Kingdom, from any property whatever in the United Kingdom, or from any trade, profession, employment, or vocation exercised within the United Kingdom."

The respondents are assessed to United Kingdom excess profits tax by virtue of sub-para. (iii) which I have just quoted, and no doubt they were assessed in Eire in respect of profits arising in the United Kingdom by virtue of the provision in the Irish legislation corresponding to sub-para. (ii). The same rules apply whichever be the sub-paragraph applicable. The relevant rules in this case are the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II, rr. 1 and 3 of which provide:

"1 (1) The tax shall be charged without any other deduction than is by this Act allowed . . . 3. In computing the amount of the profits or gains to be charged, no sum shall be deducted in respect of—(a) any disbursements or expenses, not being money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the trade, profession, employment, or vocation."

So, it is necessary to determine whether any part of the Irish taxes paid by the respondents can in law be regarded as money wholly and exclusively laid out or expended for the purposes of the respondents' trade.

It was argued for the respondents that this is a question of fact, and that, therefore, the decision of the commissioners on this matter is final in their favour. I cannot accept this argument. If certain payments made by a taxpayer are of such a kind that they are capable in law of being regarded as coming within the exception in r. 3 (a), then, no doubt, it is for the commissioners to determine whether the circumstances of the case are such that in fact they do come within that exception. But it is, in my judgment, a question of law whether particular payments are of a nature capable of coming within the exception, and that is the issue here.

The respondents argue that foreign taxes on income have in the past been regarded by the Revenue as proper deductions, and that in several enactments Parliament has shown by the language it has used that it regarded such taxes as proper deductions. The question does not appear to have come up in any case before 1909. In that year Stevens v. Durban-Roodeport Gold Mining Co. (6) was decided. In that case the taxpayer had paid tax under the Profits Tax (Gold Mines) Proclamation, 1902, of the Transvaal. It was not disputed that this taxpayer was entitled to some deduction in respect of that tax: the only issue in the case was how the deduction should be computed. United Kingdom income tax was payable by the company on the average of the profits of the preceding three years, and the Transvaal tax had only been paid in the last of these years. The company contended that in computing its income for United Kingdom income tax the Transvaal tax should be deducted from its average profits so that it would get the advantage in that particular year of assessment of the deduction of the whole of that tax. But it was contended, successfully, for the Crown that that tax should be deducted from the profits of the year when it was paid before those profits were averaged with those of the two preceding years. This meant that for that particular year of assessment the company only got a deduction equal to one-third of the tax it had paid, though in the following two years the amount of Transvaal tax paid would also come into the account. It was argued for the appellants in this case that that case is distinguishable because the Transvaal tax was not really a tax on income. Even if this were so, I do not think that it is material. The arguments of the parties are reported in the report in TAX CASES and neither in the arguments nor in the judgment of CHANNELL, J., is there any reference to this distinction. The admission made on behalf of the Crown appears to have been of a general character. The reported argument of the Attorney-General contains this passage with regard to the Transvaal tax (5 Tax Cas. 405):

"If it is a sum which, in fairness to the shareholders, must be treated as withdrawn from the amount available for division, it is rightly dealt with as a deduction from the profits of the year in which it falls."

It does not appear whether this admission for the Crown was based on an interpretation of the rule which is now r. 3 (a) or on some other ground, but it is difficult to see what else could have been regarded as a warrant for this deduction. It was argued for the respondents that this case is an authority in their favour because the decision is exactly what they are now contending for, but the decision proceeded on an admission which is now withheld. I think that all that the respondents can take from this case is that the Crown's former advisers had a different view of the law from that now maintained. It must now be determined which view is right.

The respondents then drew attention to certain statutory provisions with a view to showing that Parliament has long recognised a wider basis for deductions than that for which the appellants now contend. The first of these provisions in point of time is r. 1 of Case IV of sched. D. That rule in its present form first appeared in the Finance Act, 1914, s. 5. Before that date, a taxpayer was only liable to pay income tax in respect of income arising from securities in any place out of the United Kingdom in so far as that income was remitted to the United Kingdom and the question of deducting foreign income tax could hardly arise. But, in 1914, a British taxpayer became liable in respect of all such income whether it had been or would be received in the United Kingdom or not, and, therefore, the question of the right to deduct foreign income tax became material. There was then enacted a right to "the deduction (where such a deduction cannot be made under any other provision of the Income Tax Acts) of any sum which shall have been paid in respect of income tax in the place where the income shall have arisen."

Of course, the enactment of a deduction under Case IV and of a similar deduction under Case V cannot help the respondents. What they rely on is the phrase

"where such a deduction cannot be made under any other provision of the Income Tax Acts."

This certainly indicates that Parliament, when enacting this legislation, must have been of opinion that foreign income tax was in some cases at least a good deduction under some other provision of income tax legislation, and it is difficult to see what that other provision could be if not r. 3 (a). One curious feature of this enactment is that it seems to indicate an opinion that, apart from this enactment, foreign income tax would sometimes be deductible and sometimes not. No explanation has been suggested of how that could be and none occurs to me. The arguments of both parties in this case are inconsistent with this view. If the appellants are right, foreign income tax is never a good deduction under Case I; but if the respondents are right, it would seem that foreign income tax must always be a good deduction.

The respondents next found on the terms of the Finance Act, 1920, s. 27 (4). The purpose of that enactment is to mitigate the hardship of double payment of income tax, and it begins,

"Notwithstanding anything in the Rules Applicable to Case IV or Case V of sched. D or in any other provision of the Income Tax Acts, no deduction shall be made on account of the payment of Dominion income tax . . ."

The importance of this section to the respondents' argument is in the phrase "or in any other provision of the Income Tax Acts". Again it indicates, though, perhaps, not so clearly as Case IV, r. 1, that Parliament was of opinion that there was some right to deduct Dominion income tax other than that given in respect of Case IV and Case V. I think that the indication here is not so clear because a draftsman sometimes inserts general words of this kind without any very clear idea of what they are intended to cover, and I would not attach great importance to these words if this section stood alone.

But the next provision founded on by the respondents is more significant. I have said that for the purposes of excess profits tax profits are computed on the principles of Case I of sched. D as adapted by Part I of sched. VII to the Act of 1939. The respondents found on two of the paragraphs of this schedule. Paragraph 5 enacts:

"The provisions of sub-s. (4) of s. 27 of the Finance Act, 1920 (which disallows deductions on account of the payment of Dominion income tax) shall not apply" and para. 8 enacts:

"No deduction shall be made on account of liability to pay, or payment of, United Kingdom income tax, the national defence contribution, or excess profits tax."

Paragraph 5 must, it is said, have been intended to have some effect. It can have no effect unless s. 27 (4) has something to do with Case I, because excess profits tax is only concerned with Case I, and para. 5 is only concerned with excess profits tax. But s. 27 (4) only refers expressly to Cases IV and V. So the draftsman of para. 5 must have thought that the general words in s. 27 (4) to which I have already referred—"Notwithstanding anything . . . in any other provision of the Income Tax Acts, no deduction shall be made . . ."—were a sufficiently clear indication that some deduction otherwise permissible under Case I was being disallowed by s. 27 (4) to make it necessary for him to exclude s. 27 (4) and thereby restore that deduction under Case I. If the draftsman had thought that the general words in s. 27 (4) were of doubtful effect, he would not have used the positive words which are in para. 5. Parliament must, therefore, be taken to have legislated in the belief that there would be this deduction available to the taxpayer. I think that there is some substance in this argument and I shall return to it. The argument on para. 8 is twofold. In the first place, the whole paragraph is unnecessary unless there would have been some right to a deduction in respect of payment of these taxes if the paragraph had been omitted, and, secondly, it is significant that the paragraph only applies to United Kingdom income tax, etc. This limitation is said to show that income tax, etc., payable to foreign governments must have been intended to be deductible. I do not find the first branch of the argument very convincing. It is true that one ought not lightly to assume that any statutory enactment has no effect or is superfluous, but it is not very uncommon to find the legislature inserting superfluous provisions under the influence of what may be excessive caution. Paragraph 8 has the effect of providing inter alia that, in computing profits for assessment to United Kingdom excess profits tax, no deduction shall be made on account of liability to pay United Kingdom excess profits tax. I can hardly think that anything but superlative caution can have given rise to this provision. Moreover, it is somewhat difficult to reconcile para. 8 with s. 18 of the same Act. This section makes payments of excess profits tax a good deduction in computing profits for income tax purposes, so in drafting this section the draftsman must have thought that without it such payments out of profits would not have been allowable deductions. But profits for excess profits tax purposes are also computed on income tax principles, so one would think that when the draftsman came to the schedule he would still have thought that payments out of profits would not be allowable deductions in computing profits for excess profits tax and would, therefore, have seen that para. 8 was, strictly speaking, unnecessary. Nevertheless, he put it in. Putting in a provision of this kind is not misleading, and its insertion may well be explained by a cautious desire to make sure. But the limitation to United Kingdom taxes is not so easy to explain, particularly when taken in conjunction with para. 5 and I think that this limitation adds some weight to the argument founded on the insertion of para. 5.

The respondents also founded on the Finance Act, 1940, s. 30. That section empowers His Majesty to declare by Order in Council that excess profits tax is payable in another part of His Majesty's dominions in respect of profits in respect of which excess profits tax is also payable in the United Kingdom and that arrangements have been made with the government concerned for giving relief from double taxation in accordance with principles which are then set out. The first principle set out is

"(i) that there shall be computed the amount of excess profits tax which would be payable in each territory if excess profits tax in the other territory, and national defence contribution in the United Kingdom, were disregarded except in computing capital."

Then the method of calculating relief in each territory is set out. Sub-section (2) then provides:

"Where any such Order in Council is made, then, if the commissioners are satisfied that any case is one which falls within the arrangements to which the Order relates, they shall, in lieu of allowing, in computing profits for the purpose of excess profits tax or the national defence contribution, any deduction in respect of excess profits tax charged in the part of His Majesty's dominions outside the United Kingdom to which the Order relates, make such adjustment of the excess profits tax payable in the United Kingdom or the national defence contribution as may be necessary to give effect to the arrangements, and allow any necessary relief accordingly by repayment or otherwise, so, however, that the effect of the adjustment shall not be less favourable to the taxpayer than the effect of allowing the deduction."

The respondents contend that this section also clearly shows that Parliament was of opinion that, before this Act was passed, a taxpayer had a right to deduct excess profits tax paid elsewhere in the computation of his profits for United Kingdom excess profits tax. I agree. Sub-section (2) directs the commissioners in a case where an Order in Council applies, "in lieu of allowing . . . any deduction in respect of excess profits tax charged" in the other territory, to make the adjustment for which s. 30 provides, but it adds, "so, however, that the effect of the adjustment shall not be less favourable to the taxpayer than the effect of allowing the deduction". Parliament does not purport in this section to enact that the taxpayer shall be entitled to deduct the other excess profits tax in his computation of profits for United Kingdom tax. It would have been easier and simpler so to enact if it had been thought that the taxpayer had no pre-existing right to make the deduction. Instead, Parliament enacted that in lieu of allowing the deduction (which is not expressly authorised by the section) the arrangement shall be followed, but only if the arrangement is not less favourable than the deduction. Moreover, principle (i) which I have quoted directs that there shall be computed the amount of excess profits tax which "would be payable" if excess profits tax in the other territory were disregarded. This phraseology is quite inappropriate if the law then was that excess profits tax in the other territory must always be disregarded in computing profit for United Kingdom tax. The appellants' reply must be that, even if Parliament did think in 1939 and 1940 that there was a pre-existing right to make such a deduction under income tax principles, Parliament was wrong in so thinking. There is a difference between Parliament exhibiting an erroneous opinion as to the existing law and enacting that that law shall be changed. Before considering this matter I think it necessary to determine what was the existing law, and whether, in light of decisions of this House, it is possible to read the rules which are applicable to Case I in a way which would permit the deductions claimed. Counsel for the respondents admitted, rightly in my opinion, that r. 3 (a) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II is the only rule on which he could reply.

The rule in the Income Tax Act, 1842, which corresponded with what is now r. 3 (a) was considered in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (1). I need not set out the facts of that case. I shall only quote the passage in the speech of LORD DAVEY dealing with this rule. He said ([1906] A.C. 453), of the words in the rule "for the purposes of the trade", that these words

"... appear to me to mean for the purpose of enabling a person to carry on and earn profits in the trade, etc. I think the disbursements permitted are such as are made for that purpose. It is not enough that the disbursement is made in the course of, or arises out of, or is connected with, the trade, or is made out of the profits of the trade. It must be made for the purpose of earning the profits."

This explanation has always been regarded as authoritative and is difficult to reconcile with the respondents' contention. But I think that the matter is put beyond doubt by the reasons given by the majority in this House in Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5). In that case, an increase of salary to a servant of a subsidiary company had been disallowed for the purpose of excess profits tax. There was a successful appeal against this disallowance and the companies contended that the costs incurred in prosecuting this successful appeal were an admissible deduction for income tax and excess profits tax purposes. The Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 18, makes the amount of excess profits tax a good deduction for income tax purposes, but did not cover the sum expended in this case, so the case turned on the proper interpretation of r. 3 (a). By a majority the House held that the costs of the appeal were not deductible. VISCOUNT SIMON and LORD OAKSEY dissented. If their opinion had prevailed, I think that there would have been much to be said for the respondents in this case. VISCOUNT SIMON said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 369):

"... since excess profits tax is deductible as an expense when calculating the proper assessment of the trader to income tax, the fixing of a correct figure for the former is essential to the correct calculation of the latter, and it is only when the latter is ascertained that the trader knows how much of his commercial profit he can carry forward, or, if a company, how much of the year's profit is available for dividend or for reserve... Here, the expenditure was, in my view, incurred for the purpose of carrying on and earning profits in the trade, for a reduction in the amount of tax does increase the fund in the trader's hands after tax is paid and so promotes the carrying on of the trade and the earning of trading profits."

LORD OAKSEY said (ibid., 377):

"... it is an incident which he may think reasonably necessary for the purposes of his trade to engage in litigation as to the amount of his taxes. If he succeeds in either case he increases the profits arising from his trade, and it appears to me to be no straining of language to say that a trader who increases his profits by incurring a certain expense incurs that expense for the purpose of earning the profits".

These expressions of opinion do not appear to me to be very far removed from the admission made for the Crown in Stevens' case (6), to which I have already referred, and they would, I think, at least open the door for the respondents' argument that payment of taxes in Eire was a necessary incident of their earning profits in the United Kingdom, and, therefore, a proper deduction. But I cannot reconcile the respondents' contention with the opinions expressed by the majority in Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (5). LORD PORTER said (ibid., 371) with reference to the expense of an appeal for the purpose of discovering the true measure of profits for tax purposes:

"Such expenditure is incurred directly for tax purposes and for nothing else, though it may indirectly affect both the amount available for distribution to the proprietors of the business and that proper to be put to reserve", and, later, he said (ibid., 372) with regard to excess profits tax:

"It is true that a trader only is liable to pay it, but it is not payable by him as a trader. He pays as an individual, like any other individual, the tax on the sum which he has earned as a trader. 'To my mind', said LORD SELBORNE, L.C., in Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Lucas (7) (8 App. Cas. 905), 'it is reasonably plain that the gains of a trade are that which is gained by the trading, for whatever purposes it is used', and, therefore, what your Lordships have to determine is whether the expense is incurred . . . to earn gain or is the application or distribution of that gain when earned."

LORD SIMONDS said (ibid., 374):

"... neither the cost of ascertaining taxable profit nor the cost of disputing it with the revenue authorities is money spent to enable the trader to earn profit in his trade. What profit he has earned, he has earned before ever the voice of the taxgatherer is heard. He would have earned no more and no less if there was no such thing as income tax . . . Let me suppose that a trader, having been assessed to income tax in the sum of £X in a certain year, disputes the assessment, claiming that his taxable profit is not £X but a lesser sum, say £Y. Suppose further that he succeeds in his claim. I fail to see how he has by the expenditure that he incurred earned profit in his trade. His taxable profit has been reduced, which was the object of his expenditure. But what has this to do with his trading profit?"

LORD NORMAND, dealing with the reason why income tax is not deductible in computing profits for income tax purposes, said (ibid., 376):

"There is the more substantial reason that income tax is an impost made on profits after they have been earned, and that, unless the observations of LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodifield (1) ([1906] A.C. 453), which have often been referred to and applied in later cases, are to be disregarded, a payment out of profits after they have been earned is not within the purposes of the trade carried on by the taxpayer. But excess profits tax also is levied on profits after they are earned, and, apart from the statutory provision, is in pari casu with income tax."

My Lords, I trust that I have not misrepresented the speeches of noble Lords by giving these short extracts from them. I have read and re-read those speeches, and they appear to me to establish conclusively (i) the distinction between money spent to earn profits and money spent out of profits which have been earned, and (ii) the fact that income tax and excess profits tax payments come within the latter category. I have not dealt separately with national defence contribution or its equivalent in Eire, but there was no argument that this can be distinguished from the other two taxes for the purpose of this case. It is true that the payments which the respondents seek to have allowed as deductions were payments of Eire taxes and not of United Kingdom taxes, but the parties have admitted that the relevant legislation in Eire corresponds to that in the United Kingdom, and I cannot see that there is any distinction in principle between them for present purposes. Certainly no authority for any such distinction was cited. It, therefore, appears to me to be established that there is not and never was any right under the principles applicable to Case I to deduct income tax or excess profits tax, British or foreign, in computing trading profits.

A There remains the question whether the provisions of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, sched. VII, adapting income tax principles for the purposes of excess profits tax, have enacted any such right for the first time. I have said that I think that the terms of para. 5 and para. 8 indicate a belief that some such right already existed under Case I, but for the reasons I have given I am bound to hold that that belief was erroneous. So the question is whether the terms of those paragraphs are such as merely to indicate a belief or whether they can be interpreted as enacting by implication that which Parliament, having its erroneous belief, did not find it necessary to enact expressly. In such circumstances I would not be averse from holding that there was an enactment by implication, but first I must be able to discover precisely what Parliament's belief was. The Finance Act, 1940, s. 30, may well contain such an enactment. It is there made clear that Parliament believed that there was already a right to a certain deduction and the scheme of the section will not work unless there is such a right, so it is not difficult to imply the enactment of that right. But the whole section is limited to cases which are covered by an Order in Council, and it is not possible to imply any enactment which goes beyond the scope of the section. There has been no Order in Council which could apply to the present case; and, therefore, in my judgment, even if s. 30 were held to contain by implication an enactment authorising deductions such as those claimed by the respondents, that would not help them as they are outside the scope of the section.

E Then it was said that an enactment allowing the deduction ought to be implied because without it there will be great injustice. If taxpayers have to pay excess profits tax in two countries without being entitled to such a deduction they may have to pay in taxation much more than their total profits. That is true and I think that it has long been recognised by Parliament that applying the rigour of income tax principles to such cases is unjust. There is a whole series of statutory provisions designed to remove, or at least mitigate, this injustice in particular cases of double taxation. But it is the respondents' misfortune that there is no such provision applicable to them for the years in question. They can only obtain relief if there is some general provision in their favour, and instead of enacting any such provision Parliament had, at least until 1939, preferred to deal with the matter otherwise.

G The question is, therefore, narrowed down to this: Does para. 5 of Part I of sched. VII to the Act of 1939, reinforced by para. 8, contain or require the implication of an enactment that certain Dominion taxes are to be deductible in computing profits for United Kingdom excess profits tax? I think that the question is a difficult one, but I have come to be of opinion that it does not. Paragraph 5 is very misleading, but to mislead a taxpayer is not the same thing as to entitle him to relief. It may well be that these paragraphs show that H Parliament was under a misapprehension as to the existing law at the time, but it does not necessarily follow that if Parliament had been correctly informed it would have altered the law. It is one thing to leave an old deduction untouched, and quite another thing to enact for the first time a new deduction of a new kind. If para. 5 were held to have enacted a new deduction several difficult questions would arise. That paragraph only refers expressly to Dominion income tax. Would the implied enactment be limited to Dominion income tax or would it also extend to excess profits tax at least where that is assessed on income tax principles? And would it extend also to foreign income tax as does Case IV, r. 1? Moreover, the present case is an example of a puzzling situation which would arise if the respondents were right. It is admitted that tax in Eire is assessable on the same principles as in the United Kingdom. So, if the respondents are right here, they would have been entitled in Eire to a deduction of United Kingdom excess profits tax payable by them. The amount of tax payable in the one country could not be determined until the amount of the deductions allowable there had been determined, but one deduction would be the amount of tax payable in the other country. The amount of tax payable in the other country could not be determined until the deductions allowable there had been determined, but one of those deductions would be the amount of tax payable in the first country. I see no way in which this circle could be broken. Parliament provided for this difficulty in s. 30 (1) of the Act of 1940 which I have quoted; but, as I have said, that section cannot apply to this case, and I cannot see how any appropriate provisions to deal with this matter could be read into the Act of 1939. For all these reasons, I am unable to hold either that there was any provision before 1939 which could entitle the respondents to the relief which they claim, or that there is anything in the Act of 1939 which so entitles them. I, therefore, agree that this appeal should be allowed.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I agree that this appeal should be allowed. I would be content to say no more than this, but I will add a few words out of the respect that I feel for any judgment of SOMERVELL, L.J., on this subject.

Two main questions are involved in the respondents' claim to deduct a proportion of the income and profits taxes that they have paid in Eire when computing their trade profits for the purpose of assessment to excess profits tax in this country. The first question is whether such a deduction would be admissible in a computation of profits under Case I of sched. D, apart from any special statutory rules about excess profits tax. The second question is whether there is to be found in the legislation imposing excess profits tax some rule that makes this a permissible deduction, even if it would not be so in an ordinary Case I assessment to income tax.

The first question was answered by the Special Commissioners in the affirmative. They expressed the opinion that the payment of these Eire taxes was a "necessary expense for the respondent company in carrying on part of its trade at branches in England." I think that, on the information available to them and to us, they made an error of law in expressing that opinion. I do not think that such a view was open to them having regard to the established law as to the principles that govern the ascertainment of what is a necessary expense for this purpose. Their view is in conflict with what was said by LORD DAVEY in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (1) ([1906] A.C. 453):

"It is not enough that the disbursement is made in the course of, or arises out of, or is connected with, the trade, or is made out of the profits of the trade. It must be made for the purpose of earning the profits."

In this case, there is no material that makes it possible to say that these taxes (let alone any particular proportion of them) were paid for the purpose of earning such profits as were earned in the United Kingdom. There is much to be said for the criticism that LORD DAVEY's speech in Strong & Co., Ltd. v. Woodfield (1) imposes too limiting a criterion as to what is a permissible deduction by way of trade expenditure, but I do not know a wider one that is not vulnerable in other ways, and the fact is that his criterion has stood for so long and been so often applied that it has become, as it were, part of our income tax language. It led directly to the decision of the Court of Appeal in Rushden Heel Co., Ltd. v. Keene. Rushden Heel Co., Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (8), and to the decision of this House in Smith's Potato Crisps (1929), Ltd. v. Inland

Revenue Comrs. (5). It is true that both those decisions bore on the question of deducting excess profits tax paid in this country in a computation of profits, and the question before us relates to a deduction of income and profit taxes paid in another country. But, once it is accepted that the criterion is the purpose for which the expenditure is made in relation to the trade of which the profits are being computed, I have been unable to find any material distinction between a payment made to meet such taxes abroad and a payment made to meet a similar tax at home. Certainly Stevens v. Durban-Roodeport Gold Mining Co., Ltd. (6) suggests none. I think that it is no authority at all on the point that we are now considering. That point was not even argued.

Now, the Court of Appeal in this case have based their decision mainly on the ground that Parliament has shown a clear intention in its enactments relating to excess profits tax that there should be a deduction in respect of income and profits taxes paid abroad. This intention is said to be shown in one case by para. 5 of Part I of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, which paragraph repealed s. 27 (4) of the Finance Act, 1920, for the purpose of excess profits tax computations, and in the other case by s. 30 of the Finance Act, 1940. I do not think that either of these provisions, on any view, shows an intention to make law or to declare law in any way that bears on the subject of the present appeal, but I will deal with that aspect of the matter later. The first thing that strikes me about this argument as a whole is that if Parliament did really intend that for the purposes of excess profits tax there should be a different rule as to deduction of foreign taxes from that prevailing under Case I of sched. D for the purposes of income tax, they concealed their intention with a more than Baconian obscurity. For, whereas it is explicitly provided by the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, s. 18, that excess profits tax is an allowable expense for the purposes of income tax, and it is explicitly provided by para. 8 of Part I of sched. VII that United Kingdom income tax, national defence contribution and excess profits tax are not to be allowable expenses for the purposes of excess profits tax—provisions which, necessary or unnecessary, are at least precise—the allowability of foreign taxes if they are to be allowed is only to be deduced from a devious chain of reasoning based on this para. 5. This consideration alone would lead me to think that the legislature did not intend to enact a new rule for excess profits tax as opposed to income tax on this point, although it may well be that those who framed the excess profits tax legislation supposed that foreign taxes were as much deductible for the purpose of one computation as for the purpose of the other. If they did, they were, as I have said, mistaken.

But I do not think that the repeal of the Finance Act, 1920, s. 27 (4), has any bearing on the present problem. That sub-section did away with the deduction of any sum paid by way of Dominion income tax,

“notwithstanding anything in the Rules Applicable to Case IV or Case V of sched. D or in any other provision of the Income Tax Acts.”

It gave in exchange the relief provided by the rest of s. 27. There can be no doubt what rules of Case IV and Case V were being referred to. They were in each case r. 1 of the rules applicable to those respective Cases (the Case V rule being a mere echo of the Case IV rule), and they did provide for the deduction of income tax paid abroad in respect of income assessable under those Cases, and they also said that such tax could be deducted by the authority of those rules “where such a deduction cannot be made under any other provision of this Act”. But they had been saying that and, in effect, in just those words ever since the Finance Act, 1914, s. 5, had enlarged the area of income assessable under Case IV from a remittance basis to the larger basis of income arising in the place of source. That enlargement had been accompanied by the grant of this right to deduct the foreign tax on that income, if the deduction could not be made under any other provision of the income tax code. The Income Tax Act, 1918, merely consolidated those enactments. But the "other provision" could only be some provision that authorised a taxpayer in receipt of income "arising from securities out of the United Kingdom, except such income as is charged under sched. C" (I quote the words of Case IV) to deduct tax in computing that income. I do not see how it could possibly authorise the inference that there was some statutory provision which allowed foreign taxes to be treated as allowable expenditure for the purposes of the trade when income has to be computed under Case I of sched. D. In truth, as is well known, allowable expenses under Case I are not so much the product of express provision as inferences from the words "the balance of the profits and gains" or inferences from the prohibited deductions which are listed in r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II.

It remains extremely difficult to say what was actually achieved by para. 5 of Part I of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, having regard to the requirement of s. 14 (1) that the principles of computation that are to be applied are those of Case I of sched. D, subject to the specific modifications laid down by the Act. I think, though I do not come to any final conclusion about this, that para. 5 was put in because of the transfer to Case I for excess profits tax purposes of certain kinds of income, such as those provided for by para. 6, which would normally have been assessed under Cases IV or V. However that may be, I am satisfied that there is no permissible inference to be drawn either from s. 27 (4) of the Finance Act, 1920, or from para. 5 of Part I of sched. VII to the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1939, as to foreign taxes being an allowable expenditure when the profits of a trade are being computed for the purposes of Case I of sched. D. If that is so, I do not think that your Lordships need trouble further with the obscure significance of that paragraph.

The case is different when one turns to the Finance Act, 1940, s. 30. It seems to me very probable indeed that this section was framed on the basis that excess profits tax paid in any part of His Majesty's Dominions outside the United Kingdom would be an allowable expenditure in computing profits for the purposes of excess profits tax in the United Kingdom. Even that is not a certain inference, for all that the section does is to authorise an adjustment which is regulated by a calculation of what the situation would be if overseas excess profits tax were allowed. But suppose that it was in fact the assumption that this allowance could be claimed in the ordinary course so far as overseas excess profits tax payments are concerned, still the section affords no authority for giving the allowance if it is not otherwise permissible. The only authority that it gives is one that comes into existence if an Order in Council has been made, and none has been made that governs this case. If the Order in Council has been made, then the only adjustment which Parliament allows under this section is one that gives effect to "the arrangements" covered by the Order, even though in any particular case the adjustment may have to be larger than the "arrangements" above would justify because of the requirement that it is not to be less favourable to the taxpayer than it would be if the overseas excess profits tax were itself deducted.

What it comes to is this. Parliament has not made any enactment that requires or authorises the making of the allowances now claimed. It has not declared the law to be that such allowances are proper deductions. The most that can be said is that it is fairly certain that those who framed the Finance Act, 1940, s. 30, believed that such allowances ought to be given or were in fact being given (which is not always quite the same thing in this field). But if that is all that can be said it is, with all respect to the Court of Appeal, a misuse of words to say that the Law Courts ought to give effect to the "intention" of Parliament that overseas excess profits tax should be allowed. The beliefs or assumptions of those who frame Acts of Parliament cannot make the law. Section 30 will be just as much effective in those cases when it does operate as it would be if overseas excess profits tax were not, in general, an allowable deduction, for wherever it operates it operates under the authority given by Parliament in that Act and not otherwise. This is not the first occasion on which a somewhat similar problem has been presented to your Lordships' House, and, in face of the abiding complexity of income tax legislation, I do not suppose that it will be the last. But if the House felt no difficulty in Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Ayrshire Employers Mutual Insurance Assn., Ltd. (9), in disregarding the plain, though mistaken, assumption of the legislature as to the prevailing law, I do not think that your Lordships need feel even as much embarrassment in the present case.

DUPLEX SETTLED INVESTMENT TRUST, LTD. v. WORTHING BOROUGH COUNCIL.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J., Byrne and Parker, JJ.), January 23, 24, 1952.]

Housing—Limitation of rent—Flat constructed under building licence—Breach of condition of licence—Obligation to repair placed on tenant—Consideration other than the payment of a money rent—Expression in terms of money—Modification of rent—Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945 (c. 20), s. 7 (1), (4), (7) (b).

A licence was granted under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, reg. 56A, to the predecessor in title of the appellants for the building of a block of flats on the condition that each flat was to be let at a rental not exceeding £85 per annum exclusive of rates, that the owners maintained and kept in repair the buildings free of charge to the tenants, and laid out turf, planted trees, and maintained the gardens and private roadway, these provisions to be incorporated in the tenancy agreement. One flat was let at a rental of £85, and in the tenancy agreement the tenant undertook to maintain and keep the interior of the demised premises in good tenantable repair and condition, to maintain and keep a garden at the rear of the premises in good condition, and to pay, in addition to the rent, a fire insurance premium amounting to £1 4s. 11d. per annum. On a prosecution of the appellants by the respondents, the local authority, under s. 7 (1) of the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945, for breach of the conditions of the building licence, the justices convicted the appellants, assessed the annual value of the conditions imposed on the tenant at £12, and reduced the rent to £73 per year.

HELD: no question of a claim of right by the appellants arose to oust the jurisdiction of the justices because by s. 7 (1) the question whether the appellants were entitled to do what they did was expressed to be solely for the justices to determine; the flat had been let for a consideration which consisted partly of payments other than the payment of the rent within s. 7 (4) of the Act; the whole consideration was capable of being expressed in terms of money; and, therefore, the justices were entitled to assess the total value of the consideration in accordance with the evidence before them, to convict the appellants of an offence under s. 7 (1), and, under s. 7 (7) (b), to make such modifications of the terms of the letting as were necessary to secure that the rent payable in future did not exceed the permitted rent.

CASE STATED by Worthing (Sussex) justices.

On June 27, 1951, at a court of summary jurisdiction sitting at Worthing, an information was preferred by the respondents, the local authority, charging that the appellants had unlawfully let flat No. 29, Shirley Close, Worthing, one of a block of flats constructed under the authority of a building licence, dated Dec. 11, 1946, which was granted subject to a condition limiting the rent, at a rent in excess of the permitted rent, contrary to s. 7 of the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945. The justices found the charge proved, fined the appellants £10, and ordered that the rent payable be amended to the sum of £73 a year and that £6 out of the fine be paid to the tenant. The appellants appealed to the Divisional Court.

Lloyd-Jones, K.C., and L. F. Sturge for the appellants.

Glyn-Jones, K.C., and S. Rees for the respondents.

PARKER, J., delivered the following judgment of the court. This is an appeal by way of Case Stated from a decision of the justices sitting for the petty sessional division of Worthing, who convicted the appellants of letting a house, namely, flat No. 29, Shirley Close, Worthing, at a rent in excess of the rent limited by a building licence, contrary to s. 7 of the Building Materials and Housing Act, 1945. Section 7 (1) provides:

"Where a house has been constructed under the authority of a licence granted for the purposes of a Defence Regulation (hereinafter referred to as 'a building licence') and the licence, whether granted before or after the passing of this Act, has been granted subject to any condition limiting . . . the rent at which it may be let, any person who, during the period of four years beginning with the passing of this Act . . . lets or offers to let the house at a rent in excess of the rent so limited . . . shall be liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding the aggregate of—(a) such amount as will in the opinion of the court secure that he derives no benefit from the offence; and (b) the further amount of one hundred pounds; or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding three months, or to both such fine and such imprisonment."

It should be noted that the period of four years mentioned has now been extended by the Housing Act, 1949, s. 43 (1), to eight years. Section 7 (4) provides:

"Where a house is let for a consideration which consists wholly or partly of something other than the payment of a money rent for the house, and it appears to the court that the whole consideration is capable of being expressed in terms of money, the court shall assess the total value of the consideration upon the assumption that the transaction is carried out in accordance with its terms, and shall determine a rent which appears to the court to represent a benefit equivalent to the said total value, and the rent so determined shall be deemed for the purposes of this section to be the rent at which the house was let."

Section 7 (7) provides:

"Where proceedings are taken for an offence against this section, the court shall have the following powers, that is to say . . . (b) where any person is convicted of the offence of letting a house at a rent in excess of the permitted rent, the court may, if the interest created by the letting has not expired at the time of the conviction, make such modifications of the terms and conditions of the letting as in the opinion of the court are necessary for the purpose of securing that the rent payable in respect of periods falling after the date of the conviction does not exceed the permitted rent."

Section 8 (2) provides:

"It shall be the duty of every local authority to take such measures as they think necessary for securing the enforcement, in relation to houses within the area of the authority, of the provisions of this Act relating to the permitted price and permitted rent for houses."

In passing, it is to be observed that in s. 9 (3), the interpretation section, it is provided that the expression "house" includes a flat.

What happened in this case was this. On Dec. 11, 1946, the Minister of Works granted a licence under reg. 56A of the Defence (General) Regulations to Messrs. S. A. Gregory (Property Investment), Ltd., who were the predecessors in title of the appellants, for the sum of £51,840 for the building of a block of flats at Worthing. The conditions attached to that licence, so far as they are material, were as follows:

"(2) The flats to be let at a rental not exceeding £85 per annum, exclusive of rates. (3) The owners for the time being to maintain and keep in repair the buildings free of charge to the tenants, and to lay out turf and plant with flowering trees and shrubs and maintain the gardens and private roadway, such provisions to be incorporated in the tenancy agreements."

The block of flats was duly built, and at some stage the appellants acquired the property from Messrs. S. A. Gregory (Property Investment), Ltd. By an agreement dated Dec. 18, 1950, the appellants let one of the flats, No. 29, to a Miss Smith for the period of one week from Oct. 23 to Oct. 31, 1950, and thereafter from month to month. The rent payable was a rent of £7 1s. 8d. a month, which is £85 a year, the rent specified in the licence. It is to be observed in passing that, though the period of that tenancy, on the face of it, could be a very short one, the premises are subject to the Rent Restrictions Acts. The agreement provided that the tenant was to maintain and keep the interior of the demised premises and all fixtures and fittings therein in good tenantable repair and condition. It also provided that the tenant was to cultivate, maintain, and keep in good condition a garden at the rear of the demised premises allotted by the appellants, keeping the grass regularly cut and the garden free from weeds. It is provided that the appellants were to keep the demised premises insured against fire, but it was provided also that the tenant was, by way of additional rent, to pay to the appellants a sum equal to the amount paid by him for effectuating and maintaining the insurance.

The justices held that those three obligations on the part of the tenant constituted benefits to the appellants as landlords and formed part of the consideration for the letting of the flat. They further held that that consideration was capable of being expressed in money and assessed such benefits at the sum of £12. Accordingly, the total rent payable was determined by them to be the sum of £97, which exceeded the £85 limited by the licence, with the result that they found the offence proved and fined the appellants £10. Further, in exercise of their powers under s. 7 (7) of the Act, they amended the rent for the future to a rent of £73, being the rent of £85 less the sum of £12.

A number of points have been raised on the part of the appellants before this court. It is said, in the first place, that the acts of the appellants complained of were done in the exercise of a bona fide claim of right, thus ousting the jurisdiction of the justices. It is not necessary to deal in detail with this contention. It is sufficient to say that, in the view of this court, no question of claim of right arises in such a case as this. Whether there is any right in the appellants to do what they did depends solely on the construction of the Act, and that is expressly a matter for the justices to determine. Moreover, it is to be observed that the only provision in this statute for the determination of the matter is that it should be determined summarily, and, if the appellants' argument were correct, it would appear that the matter could never be dealt with at all.

It is further said that the covenant put on the tenant to keep the premises in tenantable repair is a usual covenant to be imposed on a tenant and that condition 3 of the licence applies only to structural, as opposed to decorative and interior, repair, and itself contemplates that the limit of £85 is to be for a letting under which the tenant is to be responsible for interior repair. In our opinion, however, there is no reason to give condition 3 the limited meaning suggested. Though not very happily worded, it must be remembered that what the licence was dealing with was a block of some forty flats. Bearing that in mind, it would seem that the ordinary meaning of condition 3 is that the owners were to be responsible for maintaining and keeping in repair those flats free of charge to the tenant, including both inside and outside repair. On that basis and on that interpretation it is to be observed that the appellants have not only failed to incorporate those terms in any tenancy agreement, as they were required to do, but they have, in fact, expressly put on the tenant a covenant to keep the interior in tenantable repair, an obligation on him which, in our view, is clearly for the benefit of the appellants.

With regard to the further obligation on the tenant to reimburse the amount of the insurance premium, the matter seems almost unarguable in view of condition 3, because under condition 3 it was a condition of the licence that the landlord himself should bear the cost of repair free of all charge to the tenant. Further, as regards the covenant to maintain in good condition the land in the rear of the premises, while this was, no doubt, primarily for the benefit of the other tenants, it seems impossible to say that it was not of some benefit to the appellants as maintaining the amenities of the premises as a whole.

However, it is said on behalf of the appellants that, even if these obligations which are put on the tenant were part of the consideration of the letting, that part of the consideration applicable to them is not capable of being expressed in terms of money. So far as the obligation to reimburse the insurance premium is concerned, it is clearly impossible to advance such an argument. The obligation is expressed to be the amount of the premium, a liquidated sum, in this case £1 4s. 11d. As regards the other obligations, the consideration, though it may be difficult to assess, is clearly capable of being expressed in terms of money.

Finally, it is said on behalf of the appellants that at any rate the justices have assessed the consideration on a wrong basis. The justices had evidence before them that the insurance premium was £1 4s. 11d. They further had the evidence of a surveyor to the effect that to do the necessary painting, distempering, and the like, and to keep the interior in tenantable repair would cost the tenant £13 7s. a year. He also gave evidence that to maintain the small patch of garden at the rear, the tenant would have to get a labourer or jobbing gardener half an hour a week at a cost of 1s. 6d., a total cost in the year of £3 18s. No evidence was given on behalf of the appellants. If the justices accepted those sums as the measure of the consideration, it may be that some criticism could fairly be levelled at them. Thus, for example, it might be said with some force that the cost of maintaining this little back garden was not necessarily the value of the benefit to the landlord—indeed, the value was probably so little that the principle of de minimis would apply. The justices, however, did not accept in full the evidence which was put forward because, although the figures adduced by the surveyor in his evidence were more than £18, they reduced that figure to £12. In those circumstances it is difficult to see how it can be said that they erred in law in fixing such a figure. Finally, the justices amended the rent to £73. It is true that under s. 7 (7) they had power, if they chose, to modify the covenants dealing with repair, but they chose not to do that but merely to modify the rent. It seems to this court that in doing so they were clearly acting within their powers, and, again, it cannot be said that they erred in law. In those circumstances, therefore, this appeal must be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

BARCLAYS BANK, LTD. v. BECK AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell and Denning, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), February 18, 19, 1952.]

Contract—Merger—Simple contract to repay bank overdraft—Subsequent agricultural charge under seal—Covenant to pay “all moneys now or hereafter due”—Agricultural Credits Act, 1928 (c. 43), s. 5 (1).

In 1948 and 1949 the defendants, who were farmers, had an overdraft with the plaintiff bank which by parol agreement they were jointly and severally liable to repay with interest and charges. On Nov. 2, 1949, the defendants executed in favour of the bank a charge under seal under the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, s. 5 (1), to secure all moneys then or thereafter owing to the bank, and therein covenanted to pay all such moneys on demand. In 1950, on the completion of a sale of the property charged, the charge was discharged by agreement on the payment of £4,000. On a claim by the bank for payment of an amount of the overdraft in excess of the £4,000,

Held: the merger of a simple contract in a specialty operated only if that were the intention of the parties; on construction the charge did not show that the intention of the parties in the present case was that the simple contract between the bank and the defendants should be merged in the charge; and, therefore, the contention of the defendants that the discharge of the charge discharged their debt in full must fail and they were liable for the balance of the overdraft.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of BARRY, J., dated Nov. 6, 1951, allowing the plaintiff bank's claim for £582 19s. 9d. owing by the defendants to the bank. The defendants contended that their simple contract to repay a bank overdraft had merged in a subsequent charge containing a covenant under seal, and, as that charge had been discharged, their liability had ceased to exist. BARRY, J., found that no merger had taken place.

J. G. S. Hobson for the defendants.

Percy Lamb, Q.C., and Bradburn for the plaintiff bank.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The plaintiff bank claim £582 19s. 9d. being the amount of the defendants' overdraft at the bank with interest.

From 1948 until the transactions with which this case is concerned the defendants were farming a holding known as Holtsmere End Farm. They had an account with the St. Albans branch of the plaintiff bank, and they were jointly and severally liable under the ordinary form of contract which had been entered into for any overdraft which might arise. The account ran into debt to a small extent in 1948, and it had become considerably overdrawn in 1949. On Nov. 2, 1949, the defendants executed in favour of the bank a fixed and floating charge under the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, Part II. The portion of the long title of that Act which relates to Part II is in these terms:

“An Act . . . to facilitate the borrowing of money on the security of farming stock and other agricultural assets, and for purposes connected therewith.”

Section 5 (1) of the Act which is contained in Part II, provides:

“It shall be lawful for a farmer as defined by this Act by instrument in writing to create in favour of a bank as so defined a charge (hereinafter referred to as an agricultural charge) on all or any of the farming stock and other agricultural assets belonging to him as security for sums advanced or to be advanced to him or paid or to be paid on his behalf under any guarantee by the bank and interest, commission and charges thereon.”

At the time the charge was entered into the overdraft was something over £4,000. The account was operated, and some £4,800 was drawn out. Further sums of about that amount were paid in, and when the charge was paid off the account was again in debit over £4,000. In the latter part of 1950 the bank were pressing the defendants and they appointed a receiver to exercise their right under the charge. The defendants were minded to sell the freehold of the farm, including the livestock, growing crops, and so on, which were charged to the bank. They were anxious that there should not be a forced auction of the property in lots by the bank, but that the whole should be sold together. After one or two suggestions which were not regarded as acceptable, on Dec. 21, 1950, the defendants' solicitors wrote to the bank's solicitors saying that it had been arranged that the purchaser who was going to buy the farm (with other property) would pay £28,000, of which £4,000 was to be regarded as apportioned to the property which was charged to the bank. One paragraph of the letter stated:

“We also confirm that we have our clients' irrevocable instructions to authorise the purchaser to pay your clients, Barclays Bank, direct on completion of the purchase of the farm the sum of £4,000 in respect of the live and dead stock and tenant rights at Holtsmere End Farm against your client's discharge of their agricultural charge.”

The bank's solicitors replied confirming that the agricultural charge would be discharged and handed over on receipt of the sum of £4,000 mentioned in the letter. Payment was to be made by banker's draft, and the defendants' solicitors were asked to make it payable to the receiver who had been appointed. The £4,000 in the bank's books was debited in the account of the defendants with certain charges which the receiver had made and expenses to which the bank had been put, charges which the bank said they were entitled to make under the terms of the charge. Those deductions produced a sum of £3,700 odd, and the difference between that sum and £4,000, added to the amount of the overdraft in excess of £4,000, make up the £582 19s. 9d. which is the claim in these proceedings.

The defence put forward is based on the principle that, if a higher security, for example, a bond or covenant, is given to secure an existing simple contract debt it operates in law as a merger, and the remedy is solely under the higher security. It is said that if one looks at this charge, one finds in it a covenant to pay the overdraft, and, therefore, the right of the bank to claim the overdraft by reason of the ordinary relationship of banker and customer has been merged in the right under the covenant contained in this charge, and, as a result of the letters which I have read and the agreement to which I will come, that deed and all liabilities arising under it have been discharged in toto, including the obligation to pay the overdraft, and in those circumstances the bank has no claim.

That depends, in my view, on the construction of the deed. We were referred to a number of cases—none, I think, directly in point. In Price v. Moulton (1) the general principle was discussed on a pleading point, and the opinion was there expressed by MAULE, J., that merger operated irrespective of the intention of the parties. That statement was doubted by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Stamps Comr. v. Hope (2). The issue in that case does not matter, but what was said, referring to the judgment in Price v. Moulton (1), was this ([1891] A.C. 483):

“The reported language of the court in some places indeed seems to imply a larger and broader meaning; but, if that is to be understood as importing that a merger of a simple contract debt in a debt of a higher nature is effected by law, merely by the existence of an identical covenant, and notwithstanding the plain intention of the parties to the contrary, that is a proposition which their lordships would hesitate to assent to.”

That opinion was in accordance with what BAYLEY, J., had said in Twopenny v. Young (3) (3 B. & C. 211):

“... where there is that in the instrument which shows that the parties intended the original security to remain in force, the new one has not the effect of extinguishing it ...”

With that in mind, I will approach the construction of the covenant which is relied on here. In doing so I think one necessarily has to have in mind the purpose of the general terms of the Agricultural Credits Act, 1928, under which this charge was given, and the general nature of the transaction as shown by that Act. It is the familiar transaction of a customer of a bank giving a security in respect of an overdraft. The words of the Act, in s. 5 (5), indicate, as one would expect, that it covers not only a charge to secure an advance of a specified sum which might be made ad hoc under some special terms, but also a charge given in respect of a fluctuating amount advanced on current account. The material part of cl. 1 of the charge (in which, by definition, “farmer” includes both defendants and relates to their joint account) reads:

“The farmer hereby covenants with Barclays Bank Ltd. (hereinafter called ‘the bank’) that the farmer will on demand or upon the death of the farmer without demand pay to the bank the balance of all moneys now or hereafter owing by the farmer under any account current or other account with the bank and all other moneys and liabilities now or hereafter due or to become due from the farmer to the bank in respect of any advance made or to be made by the bank to the farmer or upon any account or in any manner whatever and whether owing by the farmer to the bank as principal or surety and whether alone or jointly ...”

The simplest case of merger is, of course, where a simple contract debt is sued for and is merged in the judgment. That case is plain, but the prima facie case which, I think, the doctrine of merger contemplates is one in which there is first a debt for a specified amount due under a simple contract and afterwards a bond is entered into between the same parties, no surety being brought in. It may be that the creditor gives time, but gets the advantage of getting a bond or some other advantage such as payment on a certain day with interest. In such a case it is clear that the whole basis of the bond is that it is in substitution for the simple contract debt. It would make nonsense of the transaction if, having entered into that arrangement, by which, possibly, he gives time, the creditor could sue the next day on the simple contract debt. The question, as it seems to me, is whether the ordinary contractual position as between banker and customer, which would be usual in respect of advances apart from this clause, is merged in and destroyed by the covenant in the clause.

In my opinion, the clause, so far from doing that, indicates that the position is the opposite. I would rely, in particular, on the expression “all other moneys and liabilities now or hereafter due or to become due.” It is covering, that is to say, future advances. Those advances may be on any terms that the customer and the bank agree. The customer may get the bank to agree to grant an advance which shall only be repayable on six months' notice. The form is what I should have expected from the circumstances. The relationship of bank and customer continues, a charge is given, and cl. 1 sets out that the farmer remains liable to pay whatever is due and owing to the bank, according to the terms agreed between them apart from this document, as and when it becomes due and owing. The obligation to pay arises, not under the charge, but under one or more separate transactions with the bank. It may possibly be that, unless some such clause was there, it could be suggested that the bank, having accepted a charge in respect of the overdraft, had precluded themselves from saying they could sue on demand. If the value of the property charged exceeded the amount of the overdraft, it would seem rather unreasonable if repayment of all moneys owing could be demanded the next day, and, no doubt, that would not be done. But cl. 1 seems to me to make it clear that, notwithstanding the acceptance of the charge, the contractual rights of the bank as against their customer are preserved. For these reasons, it seems to me, the argument that there has been a merger fails.

The learned judge was inclined to take that view, but he went on to decide that, even if he was wrong about that, the effect of the later letters was not to discharge the bank's rights, assuming they were the only rights, to sue for the overdraft under cl. 1, but simply to release the property charged. Having come to the conclusion at which I have arrived on the first point, I do not propose to discuss that point because it seems to me one gets into a very artificial position. It is, as a matter of fact, plain from the correspondence that neither party at that stage thought that what was described as the discharge of the agricultural charge completely freed the defendants from any liability. The defendants disputed the bank's right to deduct the receiver's expenses and the solicitors' charges, but they did not dispute their liability to pay whatever was the amount of the overdraft above £4,000, and it, therefore, seems to me a rather artificial point. It is not necessary for the decision of this case to discuss whether a particular phrase meant this or that on the basis that the charge meant something which neither party thought it did.

A last point was raised by counsel for the defendants that in any case he could challenge the receiver's expenses, and, I think, the solicitors' charges. It is plain that the deed made provision for those charges, and, even if one regards it as completely discharged by what happened in December, those charges, as it seems to me, had accrued at the time of the alleged discharge. For these reasons I think that this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. The merger of a simple contract debt into a specialty debt depends undoubtedly on the intention of the parties, and their intention is to be gathered from the documents they have signed. In an ordinary case where a defendant who owes an existing simple contract debt gives security for the payment of it by means of a covenant under seal and a charge on his property the simple contract debt is merged in the specialty unless there is an express provision to the contrary. That appears from Price v. Moulton (1), as explained in Stamps Comr. v. Hope (2). But a running account with a bank stands on a different footing. When security is given for payment of amounts due or to become due on a running account, the doctrine of merger, if it applies at all, would at the most only apply to the indebtedness which existed at the date when the covenant was taken and the charge given. The reason is because merger can only apply to existing debts. Future debts do not merge; they take their colour from the circumstances in which they arise. They are then either specialty debts or simple contract debts, and, as they start, so they go on. If they are created under and by virtue of a deed, they are specialty debts from their commencement, but if they are created by a simple contract outside a deed, they remain simple contract debts even though there is a deed in existence which gives collateral security for them.

The distinction is clearly shown by considering the difference between a mortgage debt to a building society and a charge to a bank to secure a running account. The mortgage debt to a building society is created under and by virtue of a deed and is a specialty debt from its commencement, but a future debt on a running account is a debt created by parol and it remains a simple contract debt even though the customer has previously given a charge to secure it which includes a covenant under seal. The future debt on running account is not created under the deed. It may be that it would never have been created but for the deed, but that is a different thing. It only means that the deed is collateral security for its repayment. We are not concerned here with the debt which existed when the charge was given, because that existing debt was paid off during the time the account was running and was replaced by future debts. I would like to say, however, that, if the deed was given as collateral security in regard to the future debts, as I think it clearly was, as regards the existing debt also it did no more than to create a collateral security, for there is no reason for supposing that the parties intended to draw a distinction between them.

In my opinion, therefore, the agricultural charge was only collateral security for the running account. When this collateral security was discharged and handed over, the indebtedness on simple contract remained except in so far as it had been satisfied by payment. I would only add that in Price v. Moulton (1) MAULE, J., is reported to have said (10 C.B. 573):

“ . . . a man cannot have a remedy by covenant and by assumpsit for the same debt; the two are wholly incompatible and cannot co-exist.”

Having regard to what was said by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Stamps Comr. v. Hope (2), I think it must be taken that that statement is incorrect. It does not apply when the covenant is given by way of collateral security. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree. In such a case as this, which relates to an instrument of charge, the question of merger or no merger is a question of intention as revealed by that instrument, and I also agree that the instrument here in question indicates that there was to be no merger.

Appeal dismissed.

RAMA CORPORATION, LTD. v. PROVED TIN & GENERAL INVESTMENTS, LTD.

[KING'S BENCH DIVISION (Slade, J.), January 21, 22, 23, 24, February 5, 1952.]

Company—Director—Authority—Ostensible authority—Provision in article permitting delegation of powers to one director—Unauthorised agreement made by director—Ignorance of other party to agreement of provision in article—Company not estopped from setting up director's absence of authority.

By the articles of association of the defendant company the board of directors were empowered to delegate powers to a committee consisting of a member or members of their body. Without the authority of the other members of the board a director of the defendant company purported to enter into an agreement on the company's behalf with an agent of the plaintiff company who had no knowledge of the contents of the articles of association of the defendant company or of the board's right to delegate powers to a committee. On a claim by the plaintiff company arising out of the purported agreement,

HELD: as at the time of the making of the purported agreement the plaintiff company, through their agent, had no knowledge of the defendant company's articles of association and the powers of delegation contained therein, the plaintiff company could not rely on those articles as conferring ostensible or apparent authority on the director of the defendant company to make the agreement on behalf of the defendant company, and, therefore, the defendant company were not estopped from establishing that there was no authority in the director to enter into the agreement on their behalf and so were not liable under the agreement.

ACTION for an account of moneys alleged to have been paid by the plaintiff company to the defendant company under the terms of an agreement; alternatively for £1,000 with interest under s. 3 of the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934; and alternatively for damages for the alleged fraud of the defendant company's agent.

On Mar. 21, 1949, at 2 and 3 Salisbury Court, in the city of London, the plaintiff company by their director, Mr. A. H. M. Wedderburn, purported to enter into an oral agreement with Mr. G. E. Titley, a director of the defendant company purporting to act on behalf of that company. By the alleged agreement the two companies were to subscribe to the creation of a fund in the proportions of two-sevenths by the plaintiff company and five-sevenths by the defendant company with a maximum subscription of £2,000 by the plaintiff company. The defendant company were to apply the fund on behalf of the two companies to financing the sales of a telephone directory holder manufactured by R.B.K. Products, Ltd., by purchasing R.B.K. Products, Ltd.'s invoices of such sales at a discount of $3\frac{3}{4}$ per cent. The defendant company were to be responsible for administering the fund and were from time to time to account to the plaintiff company for two-sevenths of any repayments of capital or payments of profits arising. In pursuance of the alleged agreement the plaintiff company gave to Mr. Titley, as agent for the defendant company, sums totalling £1,891 5s. 10d., and said they received from him, also purporting to act in that capacity, repayments of capital totalling £891 5s. 10d. and payments of profits totalling £381 2s. 8d., leaving a balance of £1,000 outstanding. The plaintiff company claimed repayment of the £1,000 and any profit in respect thereof. Alternatively, they contended that they had been induced to enter into the agreement and to part with the sum of £1,891 5s. 10d., by the fraud of Mr. Titley, acting within the scope of his authority as a director of the defendant company, in fraudulently holding himself out to the plaintiff company as having been duly authorised by the defendant company to enter into the agreement and to receive the moneys on their behalf. The defendant company denied that they entered into the agreement alleged by the plaintiff company or that Mr. Titley had any authority express, implied, or apparent to enter into it. They also denied that Mr. Titley acted as their agent in receiving moneys from or paying moneys to the plaintiff company. They made no admission that the plaintiff company were induced to enter into the agreement by the fraud of Mr. Titley and denied that he was acting within the scope of his authority as a director of the defendant company in the fraud or holding out alleged. The plaintiff company submitted in reply that the defendant company were estopped from denying that Mr. Titley was authorised to enter into the agreement on their behalf inter alia because their memorandum and articles of association showed that he was capable of being so authorised. Article 119 of the defendant company's articles of association provided: "The directors may delegate any of their powers other than the power to borrow and make calls to committees consisting of such members of their body as they think fit. Any committee so formed shall in the exercise of the power so delegated conform to any regulations that may from time to time be imposed upon them by the board."

Curr. adv. vult.

Feb. 5. SLADE, J.: For the purposes of my judgment the material facts are (i) that Mr. Wedderburn trusted Mr. Titley completely; (ii) that he had never heard of the defendant company before Mar. 21, 1949; (iii) that the whole bargain was concluded, or believed to have been concluded, in Mr. Wedderburn's office on Mar. 21, 1949, and that neither on that date, nor, indeed, at any time in 1949, had Mr. Wedderburn any knowledge whatever of the contents of the articles of association of the defendant company. I find as a fact that Mr. Wedderburn did not rely on any power contained in the articles of association to delegate the powers of the defendant company's board to a committee of their number, who might in law be a committee of one, and I find as a fact that Mr. Titley never, at any time, disclosed to his fellow members on the board of the defendant company anything whatever about the transaction into which he purported to enter, on their behalf, with Mr. Wedderburn, on behalf of the plaintiff company, on Mar. 21, 1949.

In my judgment I am bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1) to hold that a person who, at the time of purporting to make a contract with a company registered under the Companies Acts, has no knowledge of the company's articles of association, cannot rely on those articles as conferring ostensible or apparent authority on the agent with whom he dealt, and by the same authority I am constrained to hold that the doctrine of constructive notice of a company's registered documents, such as its memorandum of association, its articles of association, its special resolutions, etc., does not operate against a company, but only in its favour. Put in the converse way, the doctrine of constructive notice operates against the person who has failed to inquire, but does not operate in his favour. There is no positive doctrine of constructive notice, it is a purely negative one. I am also bound by the same authority to hold that a person cannot set up an ostensible or apparent authority unless he relied on it in making the contract or supposed contract.

Although bound to hold that by the decision in the Court of Appeal in Houghton's case (1), had the matter been res integra, I should still unhesitatingly have come to the same conclusion and have respectfully allied myself with the judgment of SARGANT, L.J., in that case ([1927] 1 K.B. 263). Ostensible or apparent authority, which negatives the existence of actual authority, is merely a form of estoppel and has been termed agency by estoppel, and a party cannot call in aid an estoppel unless three ingredients are present: (i) a representation, (ii) a reliance on a representation, and (iii) an alteration of his position resulting from such reliance.

The decision of the Court of Appeal referred to, Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1) was affirmed by the House of Lords on other grounds, but they made no reference to, and in no way criticised, any of the judgments of the Court of Appeal. Houghton's case (1) was followed in the same year by Kreditbank Cassel G.m.b.H. v. Schenkers (2), also in the Court of Appeal.

In Houghton's case (1) the appellant company were fruit brokers. To reduce competition two companies engaged in the sale of fruit sold through the instrumentality of brokers decided to form a third company, the respondent company. That company had a name very similar to that of one of the two companies (not the appellant company), which was conveniently distinguished as the preserving company. A Mr. Maurice Lowe, a director of both the preserving company and the newly formed company, purporting to act on behalf both of the preserving company, who were badly in need of money, and of the newly formed company, made an arrangement with the appellant company whereby, in consideration of that company's advancing money to the preserving company, the preserving company and the newly formed company would give all the sales of their fruit to the appellant company and would authorise them to retain money out of the proceeds of the sale of that fruit in partial reimbursement of the sums lent to the preserving company. It followed that, in so far as the appellant company received money from the sales of the newly formed company's fruit, they were purporting to be authorised to use the newly formed company's money to repay the indebtedness of the preserving company which was a wholly different legal entity. The appellant company were apparently sufficiently surprised at this magnanimous offer on the part of the newly formed company through the instrumentality of Mr. Maurice Lowe who, as a director of the preserving company, was anxious to get money, not to accept the ipse dixit of Mr. Lowe as being sufficient to bind the newly formed company and they said they would want written confirmation from that company. Unfortunately, the written confirmation received was a letter signed only by the secretary of the newly formed company who had no shadow of authority to make a contract on his company's behalf and the so-called confirmation was not worth, in law, the paper on which it was written.

The headnote, which is abundantly borne out by the judgments, begins:

"The doctrine of constructive notice operates adversely to a person who neglects to inquire; it does not entitle such a person to claim for his own advantage to be treated as having knowledge of the facts which inquiry would have disclosed . . ."

After setting out the facts substantially as I have just recapitulated them it goes on:

"The secretary had no authority to give such confirmation. The defendants [the newly-formed company] subsequently repudiated the agreement as made without their authority. In an action for breach of that agreement, the plaintiffs claim that [Maurice Lowe], or the secretary, had ostensible authority, inasmuch as such an agreement might have been made by the board, and the plaintiffs were entitled to assume that the board had delegated their powers in that behalf to [Maurice Lowe] or to the secretary, under the articles of association. At the time that they made the advance the plaintiffs had no knowledge of the terms of the defendant's articles of association or that they incorporated Table A."

The articles of the defendants in that case incorporated art. 91 of Table A, which as it then existed, was in almost identical terms with the relevant portion of art. 119 of the defendant company's articles of association in the present case. It provided that the board of directors

"may delegate any of their powers to committees consisting of such member or members of their body as they think fit . . ."

The headnote concluded:

"Held, that, whether the agreement was to be treated as having been made by M.L. as an ordinary 'director' of the defendant company, or by the secretary as 'agent', or by the two combined, the plaintiffs were not entitled to assume that any authority to make it had been delegated to them by the board, and for the following reasons: (1) Although a person who contracts with an individual director or servant of the company, knowing that the board of directors has power to delegate its authority to such an individual, may under certain circumstances assume that that power of delegation has been exercised and that he may safely deal with the individual in question as representing the company, he cannot rely on the supposed exercise of such power if he did not know of the existence of the power at the time that he made the contract."

Ground (2) was that in any event the plaintiffs were put on inquiry.

"(3) Per SARGANT, L.J. (in whose judgment ATKIN, L.J., concurred). Even if the plaintiffs had known of the existence of the express power of delegation they would not have been entitled to assume that it had been exercised in favour of M.L. or the secretary to any greater extent than was to be inferred from the positions which M.L. and the secretary respectively occupied or were held out by the company as occupying."

That means that, if the articles authorised the board to give certain powers, e.g., to the office boy, even if some powers had been conferred pursuant to that authority, one would not be entitled to assume, if the office boy purported to make an enormous contract on behalf of the company, that his powers would extend to such an unusual transaction. The only material finding is the first one, but in Jacobs v. London County Council (3) the House of Lords decided that a reason given by a court for its decision is not to be regarded as obiter dictum merely because another reason is given: see per LORD SIMONDS ([1950] 1 All E.R. 740).

WRIGHT, J., had held ([1927] 1 K.B. 250)

"that the plaintiffs were entitled to deal with Maurice Lowe as the representative and plenipotentiary of the defendant company, and that it was immaterial whether he was actually authorised to make the agreements or not. For they were justified in assuming that Maurice Lowe, although he was only an ordinary director and not a managing director, had authority to bind the defendant company by the bargain which it purported to make, even though they had in fact no knowledge of the terms of the defendants' articles of association or that they empowered the board to delegate their functions to a single director."

WRIGHT, J., was reversed by the Court of Appeal.

The arguments of Mr. A. T. Miller, K.C., of Mr. S. L. Porter, K.C. (now Lord Porter) and of Mr. R. K. Chappell, were as follows. Under the Companies Acts the articles of association are a published document which is open to the inspection of any member of the public, and, accordingly, persons who have dealings with a registered company must be taken to have constructive notice of the articles. It is not essential for the party dealing with the company to prove that he had studied the articles. It is enough that if he had done so he would have been entitled to assume that the board had exercised the power which the articles conferred. The company will be bound if the director could have had the authority to make the contract sued on. This is the basis on which the rule in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (4) proceeds. Then, perhaps, even more strongly, the argument proceeds (ibid., 252):

"Indeed in none of the cases in which it was held that the person dealing with a company was entitled to assume that the director or other official of the company had the authority which he purported to have did the judgment proceed on the basis that the party had in fact studied the public documents. The party must for all purposes be treated as if he had read them; and this is what LORD HATHERLEY meant in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5), when he said that the articles of association and the partnership deed are open to all who are minded to have any dealings whatsoever with the company, and (L.R. 7 H.L. 893) 'those who so deal with them must be affected with notice of all that is contained in those two documents'."

SARGANT, L.J., there intervenes with these words (ibid., 253):

"The doctrine of constructive notice is not a positive doctrine, but a negative one operating against a person who has not inquired."

In his judgment BANKES, L.J., said (ibid., 254):

"The dispute between the parties depended entirely upon whether the defendants were or were not bound by an agreement which was said to have been entered into on their behalf by one of their directors, Mr. Maurice Lowe."

He then sets out the material articles and the material facts and says (ibid., 259):

"The plaintiffs' second ground of claim and the defence to the counter-claim were rested upon the rule of law laid down in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5) and other similar cases. Upon this part of the case the learned judge decided in the plaintiffs' favour. I should not have been at all sorry if I could have shared the learned judge's view. In my opinion, the facts are too strong to admit of the application of the rule referred to. The rule, and the application of the rule, were recently discussed in this court in the case of A. L. Underwood, Ltd. v. Bank of Liverpool (6), where the authorities are collected. Those authorities, I think, make it clear that in order to establish a case which falls within the rule it is essential that the person who claims the benefit of it must (a) prove that he relied upon the ostensible authority which he sets up, and (b) must not have been put upon inquiry as to whether the transaction was in order. In the present case the plaintiffs fail, in my opinion, on both points. . . . Mr. Dart [a partner in the plaintiff firm] in dealing with the defendant company was not relying upon any ostensible authority in Mr. Maurice Lowe, but upon what he unfortunately accepted as a binding written acceptance by the company of the terms negotiated between Mr. Maurice Lowe and himself. This conclusion, once arrived at, is sufficient to dispose of these appeals. As I have mentioned the second point I will deal with that."

That is the point about being put on inquiry which is not material to my decision in this case. ATKIN, L.J., concurs with the reasons given in the judgment of SARGANT, L.J., who says (ibid., 263):

"The decision of WRIGHT, J., in favour of the plaintiffs is founded not on actual authority, but on a wholly different ground—namely, the title of the plaintiffs in the circumstances to assume that such an authority had been given, and to act on that assumption."

WRIGHT, J. relied on the fact that under the articles of association of the defendant company their board of directors might have delegated their power to enter into such a contract to any person, including a single director or their secretary. Thirdly, he drew the conclusion that, although this power to delegate was unknown to Mr. Dart or to any one else acting for the plaintiffs, yet Mr. Dart and the plaintiffs were entitled to treat this as a matter of internal management only and to assume that Mr. Maurice Lowe and the secretary in fact possessed the power to bind the defendant company. The important part of the judgment is (ibid., 266):

"Next as to the power to delegate which is contained in the articles of association. In a case like this where that power of delegation had not been exercised, and where admittedly Mr. Dart and the plaintiff firm had no knowledge of the existence of that power and did not rely on it, I cannot for myself see how they can subsequently make use of this unknown power so as to validate the transaction. They could rely on the fact of delegation, had it been a fact, whether known to them or not. They might rely on their knowledge of the power of delegation, had they known of it, as part of the circumstances entitling them to infer that there had been a delegation and to act on that inference, though it were in fact a mistaken one. But it is quite another thing to say that the plaintiffs are entitled now to rely on the supposed exercise of a power which was never in fact exercised and of the existence of which they were in ignorance at the date when they contracted. No case was cited to us in which a binding obligation has been constructed out of so curious a combination; and I cannot see any principle on which an obligation could be so constructed."

SARGANT, L.J., continues (ibid., 267):

"Perhaps the nearest approach to the present case is to be found in Biggerstaff v. Rowatt's Wharf, Ltd. (7). But there the agent whose authority was relied on had been acting to the knowledge of the company as a managing director, and the act done was one within the ordinary ambit of the powers of a managing director in the transaction of the company's affairs. It is I think clear that the transaction there would not have been supported had it not been in this ordinary course, or had the agent been acting merely as one of the ordinary directors of the company. I know of no case in which an ordinary director, acting without authority in fact, has been held capable of binding a company by a contract with a third party, merely on the ground that that third party assumed that the director had been given authority by the board to make the contract."

SARGANT, L.J., referring to Biggerstaff's case (7), and giving the ground which, in his view, underlay the decision in that case, might have fortified the view that he was expressing in his judgment by referring to a passage in the judgment of LINDLEY, L.J. LINDLEY, L.J., said ([1896] 2 Ch. 102):

"It is said that the company are not bound by those orders because Mr. Davy had no authority to give them. Now, what is the law as to this point? What must persons look to when they deal with directors? They must see whether according to the constitution of the company the directors could have the powers which they are purporting to exercise. Here the articles enable the directors to give to the managing director all the powers of the directors except as to drawing, accepting, or indorsing bills of exchange and promissory notes. The persons dealing with him must look to the articles, and see that the managing director might have power to do what he purports to do, and that is enough for a person dealing with him bona fide."

I emphasise the last three or four lines.

In Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkers (2) WRIGHT, J., said in the court of first instance, in a judgment given before the judgment in the Court of Appeal which I have just read ([1926] 2 K.B. 459):

"The memorandum and articles are public documents, and everyone dealing in such matters with a limited company is taken in law to be acquainted with their terms. But once it appears that the company has the necessary power, and that the person purporting to bind the company by his signature to the negotiable instrument on the company's behalf falls within the category of persons who under the articles might be properly so empowered if the appropriate steps by way of internal management have been taken, the company will be bound. On any other basis the position of persons dealing with the negotiable paper of a limited company would be very difficult and business could not go on. The rule is subject to the obvious limitation that the person so dealing must have no actual or constructive notice that the professing agent of the company has not authority in fact: A. L. Underwood, Ltd. v. Bank of Liverpool (6). I do not find it laid down as a condition that the person so dealing must have actually examined the articles of association. In business he would seldom or never do so, but take the risk. He is bound by the articles if they are adverse to his claim: it seems that if the articles are in his favour he should be entitled to benefit by their terms."

That is the very argument which has been put forward on behalf of the plaintiff company in this case. It was rejected by the Court of Appeal, who held themselves bound by their previous decision in Houghton's case (1).

The facts in Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkers (2) are not very material. The Manchester manager of Schenkers, Ltd. in fraud of his employers purported to draw seven bills of exchange on behalf of the company. The bills were duly accepted, they were dishonoured by the acceptors, and the appellant bank who were holders in due course sued Schenkers, Ltd., as the drawers of the bills. Schenkers, Ltd., said that the man who purported to sign those bills on their behalf was only their Manchester branch manager. He was not a director of the company. I have dealt with the way with which WRIGHT, J., decided the case. The headnote in the Court of Appeal reads:

"Held, (1) applying Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1), ante, p. 246 [the Court of Appeal decision and not the House of Lords decision], that as it did not appear that the plaintiffs knew of the existence of the power of delegation contained in the defendants' articles of association they were not entitled to rely upon its supposed exercise."

The Court of Appeal also held that, as the bills of exchange were forgeries, the rule in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (4) did not apply in any case and they gave other reasons for their decision. But there is no doubt that, as will be clear when I read the judgment, one of the reasons for the decision was the first one in the headnote, and that the Court of Appeal held they were bound in that respect by their previous decision in Houghton's case (1). One of the facts was that ([1927] 1 K.B. 827):

"... by a further resolution the bank was empowered to honour the signature of S. Clarke on all cheques payable only to His Majesty's Customs."

WRIGHT, J., held that (ibid., 828):

"Clarke in drawing the bills on behalf of the defendants was a person acting under their authority within the meaning of s. 77 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, and that the defendants were liable inasmuch as by their constitution the Manchester manager might have been authorised to draw the bills, and therefore a person taking them in due course was not prejudiced because Clarke had no authority in fact."

Mr. Pritt, for the defendants, said (ibid., 829):

"Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1) shows that a person who has no knowledge of the existence of the power of delegation in a company's articles of association—and in this case it was not shown that the plaintiffs had such knowledge—cannot rely upon it so as to validate an unauthorised transaction."

ATKIN, L.J., interposed to ask whether it could not have been within the implied authority of Clarke to draw and indorse the bills. BANKES, L.J., in his judgment, said (ibid., 832):

"The plaintiff's case was that the defendants, a limited company, had in their articles of association an article which authorised the delegation of authority to do such an act as drawing or indorsing bills of exchange, and that, in view of that, the rule of law laid down by the House of Lords in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5) applied, because the plaintiffs had discounted the bills bona fide and without notice of any irregularity attaching to them. Upon that state of facts and upon that contention WRIGHT, J., decided the case. At that time Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1), in this court had not been decided. Mr. Pritt for the defendants relies upon that case as an authority that on the facts and the particular form of the article in this case the plaintiffs fail in substantiating their cause of action. But during the argument another point was taken—namely, that the act of the branch manager was a forgery . . ."

He continued (ibid., 833):

"In Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1) the article empowered the directors to 'delegate to any managing director, local board, head manager, manager, attorney or agent any of the powers . . . for the time being vested in the directors'. The authority there was thus more circumscribed than here, because it indicated by description the persons to whom the authority might be delegated. In that case all the members of the court came to the conclusion that the plaintiffs were not in a position to rely upon the rule in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5), because upon the facts the true inference was that they did not rely upon any suggested delegated authority. The true inference from the facts there was that the plaintiffs distrusted the position of the person who was negotiating on behalf of the company, and, distrusting his authority, they required express confirmation of it, and, unfortunately for them, the express confirmation was no confirmation at all. But SARGANT, L.J., in whose judgment ATKIN, L.J., concurred, went further and laid down in terms a proposition of law that, in the circumstances of that case, which I cannot distinguish from those now before us, the rule in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5) does not apply. If I am correct in that view, that is sufficient to dispose of this appeal."

SCRUTTON, L.J., said (ibid., 836):

"This is not an easy case, and, but for two decisions to which we have been referred, I should have desired to go much more carefully into the various lines of authorities than has been done; but in my view this court is bound by authority to decide that this appeal should be allowed."

He continued (ibid., 837):

"... this action was brought and came before WRIGHT, J., who applied the doctrine of Royal British Bank v. Turquand (4). As I understand that doctrine it is this: any person dealing with a company is deemed to have notice of its articles of association—some of the cases go further and say that he must be deemed to understand them, an extensive presumption sometimes—but if, looking at the articles, or being deemed to know their contents, the thing that has been done is one that might have been done, if certain internal arrangements had been made, the person so dealing with the company is not bound to inquire whether those internal arrangements have been carried out, but is entitled to assume regularity in the proceedings. Acting on that decision WRIGHT, J., found that as there was in the articles of Schenkers, Ltd., an article under which power could have been delegated to Clarke, the Manchester manager, the bank was not bound to inquire whether power had in fact been delegated to him and consequently, on Turquand's case (4) and the line of authorities following it, the judge held that the bank was excused from inquiring whether the domestic arrangements necessary to delegate to Clarke the power to draw bills of exchange had been complied with. There are two matters which, I think, bind me to say that WRIGHT, J.'s decision is wrong."

I pass over the first and come to the second (ibid., 840). SCRUTTON, L.J., continued:

"The second matter which I think binds me is this. In Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1), which in many of its details is very similar to this, two judgments in effect were given in the Court of Appeal. BANKES, L.J., dealt with the question on the particular facts and declined to express any further opinion, but SARGANT, L.J., in whose judgment ATKIN, L.J., concurred, took a further point. He there said that although there is a power of delegation contained in the articles of association, and although a person dealing with a company is deemed to know it, he cannot be heard to say: 'I am deemed to have known of the power to delegate and I acted upon it', unless it is proved that he had knowledge of the existence of the power. I hope it is not disrespectful to express the wish that SARGANT, L.J., who is thoroughly conversant with this branch of the law, had explained to those not equally familiar with it, how this fits in with the doctrine enunciated in a line of cases of which Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co.

(5) is an instance, that a person is deemed to know of the company's articles of association. But whether SARGANT, L.J., has explained his reasons or not, there is no doubt about what he said, nor is there any doubt that ATKIN, L.J., agreed with the reasons given. In those circumstances, I am bound by the decision given by the majority of the court in that case, and that decision precludes the plaintiffs saying: 'We are deemed to know that there was a power of delegation and we are excused in those circumstances from inquiring into the company's internal management'."

Although I say anything which differs from what SCRUTTON, L.J., says only with trepidation, I think that SARGANT, L.J., did give his reason, and it was that the doctrine of constructive notice was a purely negative one and not a positive one. When he says that a party is affected with notice, he means that, if the party fails to inquire, he will be imputed with notice. There the doctrine operates in the company's favour. But it does not operate in a party's favour so as to enable him to say he relied on something of the existence of which ex hypothesi he says he had no knowledge. Secondly, with even greater trepidation, I have no difficulty in reconciling SARGANT, L.J.'s judgment with the decision of the House of Lords in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5), for the reasons which I am about to give.

ATKIN, L.J., said (ibid., 844):

"The true limits of the doctrine as to the effect of an article which empowers a company or its directors to nominate a person to have authority to do a particular act on behalf of the company are, I think, made quite plain in the judgments in Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1). It is therefore unnecessary to consider further the doctrine as to the knowledge of the articles of association of a company."

"I may say this, however, that the doctrine is as to the knowledge of the articles; that is to say, the person is to be in the same position as if he had read them, and if he had, all that he would see would be that the directors had power to nominate a particular individual who could sign bills of exchange. In such a case a person reading the articles would be in no better a position unless he went further and inquired whether or not the directors had, in fact, nominated that particular individual to sign the bills. There are cases where that inquiry need not be made. When, for example, you find power given to do a certain thing, and the act can be done by the company in board meeting, and there purports to be a resolution authorising it, you are not obliged to inquire whether or not the forms of the company required by the articles as to the constitution of the board, the quorum and so forth, have been actually complied with. If you are dealing with a director in a matter in which normally a director would have power to act for the company, you are not obliged to inquire whether or not the formalities required by the articles have been complied with before he exercises that power. Those are matters of internal management which an outsider is not obliged to investigate."

I have gone so minutely into those two decisions of the Court of Appeal because I am quite unable to reconcile them with the reasons given in the judgment in a third decision of the Court of Appeal, British Thomson-Houston Co., Ltd. v. Federated European Bank, Ltd. (8). Those passages were relied on in the judgment of the Court of Appeal in that case, so far as I can see, as suggesting that ATKIN, L.J., was saying in the Kreditbank Cassel case (2) that one need not always have actual knowledge of the articles of association and of the fact that they contain a power to delegate, and that there are cases when one need not know them at all, and need not inquire. I do not read ATKIN, L.J., as saying anything of the kind and I do not see how he could hold himself to be bound by Houghton's case (1) if that is what he meant.

Before turning to this third decision of the Court of Appeal I am going to resolve the difficulty which SCRUTTON, L.J., said confronted him, by referring shortly to the decision of the House of Lords in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5). In my judgment, the decision there proceeded on the footing that the bank had actual knowledge of the company's articles of association. The appellant was the public officer of the National Bank of Dublin. The East Holyford Mining Co. had been promoted by a number of persons who had obtained subscriptions and who, without having been regularly appointed as directors of the company as required by the company's articles of association, described themselves as directors, and acted as directors. Under the company's articles of association they could have been validly appointed as directors though, in fact, the necessary machinery had not been gone through for that purpose. That applied also to the person who was appointed and described as the secretary of the company. The National Bank of Dublin were appointed the company's bankers and a formal notice signed by a person describing himself as the secretary of the company required them to pay cheques signed by any of the following three directors—the word directors being used in the notice—and countersigned by himself as secretary in accordance with what was stated to be “a resolution passed this day”. The bankers from time to time received cheques signed and countersigned as provided for in the mandate, and duly honoured and paid them. When practically the whole of the company's funds had been drawn out, the company went into liquidation and it then appeared that there never had been meetings of shareholders, nor any appointment of directors, nor any appointment of secretary, but that the persons who had promoted the company had treated themselves as directors and secretary and appropriated the money obtained from the subscriptions. It was held that the official liquidator could not recover from the bankers the amount of the cheques which they had bona fide paid. The case was originally tried with a jury, and the important point appears to me to be this. KELLY, C.B., stated that at the trial counsel had asked the judge to give the jury certain information. The report continues (L.R. 7 H.L. 880):

“This the judge declined to do, but, by consent, reserved liberty to enter the verdict for the defendant, ‘if the jury should have found in his favour on any questions that I ought to have submitted to them. The court to be at liberty to draw any such inferences of fact as in their opinion the jury ought to have done’.”

In other words, the matter came before the House of Lords not only on the facts as found by the jury, but on any inference of fact which in the House of Lord's opinion the jury ought to have drawn had those matters also been left to them. It seems to me to be clear that one of the inferences of fact on which the opinions of the House of Lords proceeded was that the bank by their public officer and servants had actual knowledge of the articles of association of the Holyford Mining Co.

This view is supported, I think, by the opinions of LORD CHELMSFORD and LORD HATHERLEY, and LORD HATHERLEY's opinion was referred to in the argument before the Court of Appeal, in Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1) ([1927] 1 K.B. 259). LORD CHELMSFORD said (ibid., 889):

“We have a right to assume that the bankers, acting with proper caution, before they commenced transactions with the company, referred as they were bound to do, to the articles of association, to ascertain in what manner the account which had been opened was to be drawn upon. Beyond the particulars of the objects of the company, and information as to the mode in which the account was to be dealt with, which alone the bank was concerned to know, I do not consider that any more preliminary inquiries were necessary. Upon referring to the articles of association they would have found, by the 58th clause, that every sum paid on behalf of the company amounting to £10 or upwards, was to be paid by cheques to be signed and countersigned as might from time to time be directed by the board. With this information the bankers must have been prepared to receive a communication on behalf of the company as to the persons who were to sign and countersign the cheques. And on July 26 they received the expected letter from Wall, the person already introduced to them through the prospectus as the secretary of the company . . . ”

LORD HATHERLEY said (ibid., 898):

“ On the other hand, on the part of the bankers, I see no possible mode by which they might have pursued their inquiries in the manner contended for at the Bar without requiring all the minute books of the company to be produced to them, and without conducting a detailed investigation into all the transactions of the company as to the appointment of directors and the like—a duty they were not called upon to perform, and a duty which, if it was objected to, they could not have insisted upon performing. I apprehend, my Lords, that the bankers having done all that was strictly their duty to do, having made themselves acquainted with the articles of the company, and having seen the offices of the company, with persons there affecting to perform all the duties of directors according to those articles, and having seen those who had the power of appointing them continually present there, witnessing their performance—there can be no doubt that in this state of circumstances the bankers are not in any default whatsoever, and that the cheques must be taken, as between them and the company, to have been properly drawn, and the shareholders must be held liable to the loss.”

It seems clear to me from those two passages alone that one of the inferences that the House of Lords drew was that the bank had made themselves acquainted with the articles and the powers contained in the articles, and relied on those powers having been, as they supposed, duly exercised. There it was a question of the appointment of directors. The persons concerned had not been appointed at all. They might have been appointed by a board meeting when there was no quorum present, or not a disinterested quorum. Those are all matters of internal management of the company's affairs which a person, knowing of the existence of the power in the articles and relying on it, is entitled to assume have been observed when the power has been exercised. He has no power to demand production of the minute book of the company. Moreover, the question in Mahony's case (5) was whether the bank were entitled to treat the persons who signed the cheques as directors. They were described as directors in the mandate of the bank and they were directors de facto. Whether they were also directors de jure depended on whether the provisions in the articles relating to the appointment of directors had been complied with, and this was a matter of interior management of the company into which the bank were not, according to Turquand's rule (4), bound to inquire. Their apparent position was that of directors, they had the apparent authority of directors and there was nothing in the articles restricting that apparent authority. In my view, therefore, there is nothing whatever in the decision of the House of Lords in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5), which is inconsistent with the judgment of SARGANT, L.J., in Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1) in the Court of Appeal.

In the last decision of the Court of Appeal, British Thomas-Houston Co., Ltd. v. Federated European Bank, Ltd. (8), which I have said I am unable to reconcile with their decisions in Houghton's case (1) and in Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkens (2), the headnote reads:

“ By the articles of association of a company the directors had power to delegate to one or more of their own body such of the powers conferred on the directors as they might consider requisite for carrying on the business of the company, and to determine who should be entitled to sign contracts and documents on the company's behalf. A document purporting to be a guarantee was given to the plaintiffs executed by the company in this form: 'The F.E.B., Ltd., signed N.P.' N.P. was a director of the company. During the negotiations for the giving of the guarantee he had written to the plaintiffs, signing the letter 'For and on behalf of' the company, 'N.P., Chairman'. On these facts, in an action on the guarantee:—Held: that the plaintiffs were entitled to presume that the directors of the company had authorised N.P. to sign contracts on behalf of the company and that the company was liable on the guarantee."

I find this, to me, astonishing statement in the headnote:

"Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills [1927] 1 K.B. 246; [1928] A.C. 1, considered; Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkers [1927] 1 K.B. 826, followed. Judgment of MACNAGHTEN, J., affirmed."

The significant point about the British Thomson-Houston case (8) is that at the trial before MACNAGHTEN, J., neither party put in either the memorandum or the articles of association and they were called for by SCRUTTON, L.J., in the course of the hearing before the Court of Appeal. It was, apparently, admitted at the trial that N. Pal was the chairman of the board of directors of the defendant bank and it appeared that he had offered the plaintiffs a form of guarantee signed by himself for and on behalf of the defendants as chairman. The plaintiffs would not accept the guarantee in that form and subsequently the form referred to in the headnote was sent by the plaintiffs and signed as I have indicated. When SCRUTTON, L.J., called for the articles of association it appeared that art. 106 gave power to the directors to delegate to any managing director, local board, committee or agent, or to one or more of their own body or to any manager or other officer such of the powers and authorities thereby conferred on the directors, with one exception, as the board considered requisite for carrying on the business of the company. According to a footnote to the report ([1932] 2 K.B. 177) it appeared from the articles of association that two directors should form a quorum.

It is possible to have ostensible or apparent authority apart from the articles of association, though not where it is inconsistent with or beyond the articles of association. A company can hold out by correspondence and so on to third parties dealing with a person in good faith that that person holds authority which he does not, in fact, possess. It may be that that was the ground of the decision in the case of the managing director in Biggerstaff's case (7). It is not for me to say whether the principle would have applied to the act of a chairman in the present case. I am dealing only with the grounds which were given by the Court of Appeal for their decision in the British Thomson-Houston case (8), and it is sufficient to repeat that the articles were not even before MACNAGHTEN, J., at the trial. There was no suggestion that the British Thomas-Houston Co. or any one acting on their behalf had ever seen the articles and still less that he, or they, relied on them. That was the basis on which the case came before the Court of Appeal. How, in those circumstances, Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkers (2) could have been followed, I find myself quite unable to understand. Although the articles are not set out in the full report, I should have thought from the fact that the quorum of directors was two and that, presumably, the articles contained the orthodox clause entrusting the management of the company's affairs to their normal or ordinary directors, unless the authority conferred by art. 106 had been conferred by a disinterested quorum of the board on Mr. Pal, the chairman, he would have had no greater authority under the articles than any ordinary director. He may have been chairman, but under the articles, apart from the exercise of the power conferred by art. 106, it required a board meeting consisting of a minimum of two directors to bind the company.

In his judgment SCRUTTON, L.J., says ([1932] 2 K.B. 180):

"One defence raised is that the defendant bank have not executed [the guarantee] because by their articles of association any guarantee of the bank requires to be executed by two directors. At the trial neither party put in the articles of association. Mr. Turrell for the defendants took the point that one director had no authority to pledge the credit of the company. In view of the decision of the House of Lords in Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5), that those who have dealings with a company are affected with notice of all that is contained in its memorandum and articles of association, we asked to see the articles of association of the defendant company. Now we have seen them, and we find that they confer upon the directors two powers: (i) to delegate to one or more of their number any of the powers of the board of directors, and (ii) to decide who shall sign contracts and other documents on the company's behalf. Then Royal British Bank v. Turquand (4) and Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5) decide that, if the articles of association give a power, persons dealing with the company, though they are deemed to have notice of the extent of the power, are not bound to inquire into what is called the 'indoor management' of the company to see whether the power has been properly and regularly exercised with all the prescribed formalities, and if they find an officer of the company openly exercising an authority which the directors have power to confer upon him, they are relieved from the duty of further inquiry and are entitled to assume that the power has been regularly and duly conferred."

For myself, and I speak with the utmost diffidence in dealing with a judgment of so learned a judge as SCRUTTON, L.J., I find it difficult to understand the words:

"if they find an officer of the company openly exercising an authority which the directors have power to confer upon him."

How can they find that if they do not know that the articles confer such a power? SCRUTTON, L.J., continues (ibid., 180):

"A difficulty in the way of the plaintiffs is raised by the judgment of SARGANT, L.J., in Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1), where one director of a company purported to pledge certain future profits of the company by a contract which was said to be beyond his powers. It was a question whether his act was or was not within the powers conferred by one of the company's articles of association. SARGANT, L.J., held, and ATKIN, L.J., agreed with him, that, assuming that the articles enabled the directors to delegate to the particular director power to perform the act, it was not enough for the pledgees to rely upon their constructive knowledge of the effect of the articles where the power of delegation had not in fact been exercised and where the pledgees had no actual knowledge that the power existed, and did not rely on its existence. This case was considered in Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkers (2), where, besides the decision in Houghton's case (1), there were other good reasons disentitling the plaintiffs from recovering . . ."

Then he says there were three reasons (ibid., 181):

" . . . thirdly, they held themselves bound to follow the decision in Houghton's case (1)."

I pause there to repeat that, even if there were other good reasons for the decision, the House of Lords has held in Jacobs v. London County Council (3) that that is no ground for treating one of the grounds of the decision as a mere obiter dictum. It binds me, and, in my view, it bound the Court of Appeal in this case that I am now reading.

SCRUTTON, L.J., continues (ibid.):

" But ATKIN, L.J., held that in certain circumstances the inquiry, whether directors have in fact nominated one of their number to do the act relied on, need not be made—namely, where directors have power to nominate one of their number to do acts on their behalf, and a director is found acting in a matter in which normally a director would have power to act for his company. In that case, in the view of ATKIN, L.J., a person dealing with the company would not be obliged to inquire whether the director had been formally invested with authority to do the act. Assuming that to be correct, in the present case we have a director acting in matters which are normally entrusted to directors."

I think it is clear that GREER, L.J., in his judgment decides this case on the footing that there was an actual holding out of Mr. Pal, the chairman, apart from the articles, i.e., the chairman was within his apparent authority as chairman, just as in Biggerstaff's case (7) the act was in the apparent authority of the person who was acting as managing director apart from the articles. GREER, L.J., says (ibid., 182):

" If it were necessary for the decision of this case to apply the first ruling, as stated in the headnote to Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1), I should find myself in some difficulty. One of the propositions of law there stated is: ' Although a person who contracts with an individual director or servant of a company, knowing that the board of directors has power to delegate its authority to such an individual, may under certain circumstances assume that that power of delegation has been exercised and that he may safely deal with the individual in question as representing the company, he cannot rely on the supposed exercise of such power if he did not know of the existence of the power at the time that he made the contract '. If I rightly understand the decision in that case, it proceeds upon that proposition as good law."

I respectfully assent to that statement. That was the basis, or one of the bases, underlying the decision in Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1), which was expressed to be followed in the Kreditbank Cassel case (2).

GREER, L.J., continues (ibid.):

" But it is not necessary for me to inquire whether it was an essential element in the ratio decidendi, because there are in this case adequate grounds upon which we can rest a decision apart from Houghton's case (1). In the case before us the guarantee was signed by a person who was the chairman of the board of directors. Someone must represent the company for the purpose of conducting correspondence, it may be a secretary, or the managing director, or some other officer; and he must have authority to bind the company by letters written on its behalf. The person chosen by the defendants for this purpose was the chairman of the board, and the defendants have represented by their chairman that the plaintiffs could rely on the guarantee of the defendants as the act of the defendants and are responsible for those acts which they have held him out as having authority to perform. That is enough to decide this case; I reserve for further consideration the question how the first ruling in Houghton's case (1) is to be reconciled with Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5)."

SLESSER, L.J., says (ibid., 183):

" I agree. Speaking generally of the articles of association of the company and of the powers of the Manchester manager in Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkers (2), ATKIN, L.J., says: ' The person ' (who relies on the articles) ' is to be in the same position as if he had read them, and if he had, all that he would see would be that the directors had power to nominate the particular individual who could sign bills of exchange. In such a case a person reading the articles would be in no better a position unless he went further and inquired whether or not the directors had in fact nominated that particular individual to sign the bills'. But the lord justice points out, as an exception, a case where this further inquiry need not be made, as follows: 'If you are dealing with a director in a matter in which normally a director would have power to act for the company you are not obliged to inquire whether or not the formalities required by the articles have been complied with before he exercises that power'. Here we are dealing with a company having four directors, of whom N. Pal describes himself as the chairman and, in one case, signs a document as 'N. Pal, Chairman'. In my opinion the plaintiffs were dealing with N. Pal in a matter in which normally a director would have power to act. The difficulty arising on the decision in Houghton & Co. v. Nothard, Lowe & Wills (1), therefore, does not press me in the present case, where, in the circumstances, the plaintiffs were entitled to assume that they were dealing with a person who had the authority of the defendant company to execute the contract sued on."

If that case had been decided on the basis on which it was decided by GREER, L.J., there is, of course, nothing inconsistent in that with the first ground of the decision in Houghton's case (1), but I understand this case to have been decided by SCRUTTON, L.J., and SLESSER, L.J., on the footing that ATKIN, L.J., in his judgment in the Kreditbank Cassel v. Schenkers case (2) had said that there were cases in which one could rely on the articles of association and a power conferred by the articles even when one did not know of the existence of the articles or power, and ex hypothesi could not have relied on them, provided one found someone like a director dealing with the matter which would normally be dealt with by a single director. I respectfully think that ATKIN, L.J., said nothing of the kind in the Kreditbank case (2) and that the whole of his judgment, where, indeed, he held himself bound by the previous decision of the Court of Appeal in Houghton's case (1), proceeded on the footing that the person dealing with the company had actual and not merely constructive notice of the company's articles of association.

There is a footnote to the report of the British Thomson-Houston case (8) in which the learned reporter says (ibid., 183, 184):

"The authorities seem to warrant the following propositions: If in an action against a limited company the plaintiff relies upon an act of an officer of the company, then (i) if the company has only a limited power to do the act, e.g., a power to borrow up to a certain amount, the plaintiff is affected with notice of the limitation: Fountaine v. Carmarthen Ry. Co. (9) ((1868) L.R. 5 Eq. 316). (ii) if the articles of association of the company give the officer authority to do the act provided certain directions are observed, and the officer purports to do the act; the plaintiff is entitled to assume that the directions have been followed: Royal British Bank v. Turquand (4), (1855) 5 E. & B. 248; (1856) 6 E. & B. 327; Re Land Credit of Ireland, Ltd. (10) (1869) L.R. 4 Ch. 460; Mahony v. East Holyford Mining Co. (5) (1875) L.R. 7 H.L. 869; County of Gloucester Bank v. Rudry Merthyr Steam & House Coal Colliery Co. (11) [1895] 1 Ch. 629."

I agree with (i), but disagree with (ii). The statement of the law there set out requires to be qualified by the addition of the requirement of actual knowledge and reliance on the existence of the power of delegation conferred by the articles. The note continues:

"(iii) It is submitted that actual knowledge on the part of the plaintiff of the contents of the articles of association is irrelevant except to an issue raised as to his bona fides."

I disagree and I say that is quite inconsistent with the decision of the Court of Appeal in Houghton's case (1).

It is not uninteresting to refer to a short passage from the speech of LORD LORD ATKIN in the House of Lords in Midland Bank, Ltd. v. Reckitt (12). I need not refer to the facts of the case. He said ([1933] A.C. 17):

"It remains to deal with contentions of the bank based upon the terms of the power of attorney. The bank never in fact asked for or saw the terms of the document; and, for my part, I venture to doubt whether in such circumstances they could ever rely on any other than an actual authority. Ostensible authority appears to be excluded when the party averring it cannot show that any appearance of authority other than the actual authority was ever displayed to him by the principal. He neither shows a representation nor that he relied on it."

In my view, that passage is quite inconsistent with the construction put on ATKIN, L.J.'s judgment in the Kreditbank case (2) that one can have agency by estoppel when there is no representation, no reliance on it, and no alteration of position in consequence of such reliance.

In Clay Hill Brick & Tile Co., Ltd. v. Rawlings (13) the defendant purchased bricks from the plaintiff company, dealing at all times with one Barber who was the chairman of the directors and acted as managing director of the company, though he had not been properly appointed to the office of managing director. Thinking that the company was a one-man company, the defendant handed to the chairman cheques made payable to the chairman personally, or his order, in payment for the bricks. The chairman cashed the cheques and did not pay the money over to the company. The articles of the company provided that the directors might delegate powers or authorities and discretions, and might annul or vary such delegation, but that no one dealing in good faith and without notice of such annulment or variation should be affected thereby. It was held that there was a power under the articles to authorise B. to receive payments in cash, and, so far as the defendant was concerned, it must be taken that B. had in fact such authority. The other point decided does not matter. It was merely that payment by cheque to a person who was authorised to receive payment in cash is as good as payment in cash. It may well be said that a person who is authorised to sell a company's goods is impliedly authorised to receive payment for them, just as a shop assistant who is authorised to sell his employer's goods is impliedly authorised to receive payment for them. I use the implied authority as the actual authority, not, of course, ostensible or apparent authority. As I read it, that is the ground on which TUCKER, J., decided this case in favour of the defendant when, the chairman having misappropriated the money, the company who had duly delivered the bricks sued the buyer for the money over again, saying that the chairman was incapable of giving him a proper discharge for the payment. TUCKER, J., said ([1938] 4 All E.R. 104):

"As I have already said, at this time, although Mr. Barber did not hold in the company quite the position that Mr. Rawlings thought he held, he was none the less, during the time when the cheques were given, the chairman of the directors, and acting as managing director, and, at the time the last cheque was paid, he was actually acting as manager, pursuant to his appointment as such . . . I think that it cannot be said that to receive payment in cash is beyond the power of a managing director or chairman of a company. It may be true that he is not the usual person to receive such sums. They may be received by a woman sitting in an office. However, that is a very different thing from saying that he has not the power to receive them. I think that Mr. Barber, in the position which he held in this company, was an officer who would not be ordinarily empowered to receive a payment of cash, but that, as a result of art. 12 of the articles of the company, which have been put in, as between himself and Mr. Rawlings, he might be so empowered. By art. 12, the directors may delegate to any one of their number or ' . . . to any manager, attorney or agent any of the powers, authorities and discretions for the time being vested in the directors . . . any such appointment or delegation may be made in such terms and subject to such conditions as the directors may think fit, and may include a power to sub-delegate, and the directors may at any time remove any person so appointed, and may annul or vary any such delegation, but no person, dealing in good faith and without notice of such annulment or variation shall be affected thereby'. I think that the result of that article, the law being as I understand it, is that there being in fact power to confer that authority upon Mr. Barber, so far as Mr. Rawlings was concerned, it must be taken that he in fact had the authority which he was purporting to exercise . . . "

To that I can only say that there was no evidence that Mr. Rawlings ever knew of the existence of the power conferred by art. 12, and there was no evidence that he ever relied on such a power having been exercised by a proper delegation to the chairman and acting managing director.

If the decision of that case proceeded on that footing, namely, the application of the rule in Royal British Bank v. Turquand (4) where there was no actual knowledge or reliance on the company's articles of association, then I can only respectfully say I think the decision inconsistent with the decisions of the Court of Appeal in Houghton's case (1) and in the Kreditbank Cassel case (2). If, on the other hand, it proceeds on the footing that a chairman of a board taking orders for the sale of the company's bricks, the company's bricks being duly delivered by the company to the buyer on the faith of those orders, and the chairman of the company having implied, i.e., actual though not express, authority, as being reasonably incident to the power of selling bricks which he had, to receive payment for them, there is nothing inconsistent with those decisions or, indeed, anything in the case to deal with ostensible or apparent, as opposed to actual, authority at all.

I desire to acknowledge my indebtedness to a most illuminating analysis of the apparent authority of an agent of a company written by PROFESSOR J. L. MONTROSE in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW, 1934, at p. 224. But quite apart from that, I hold that I am bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in the Houghton case (1). If I had not been bound I should have arrived independently at precisely the same conclusion. I agree with the conclusions of PROFESSOR MONTROSE and disagree with the contrary conclusions arrived at by the late SIR ARTHUR STIEBEL in an article entitled "Ostensible powers of directors" which is contained in the LAW QUARTERLY REVIEW, 1933, at p. 350. I find in the present case that there was no actual authority, expressed or implied, and I find, in so far as it is a question of fact, as a question of fact, and in so far as a question of law, as a matter of law, that there was no apparent or ostensible authority on which the plaintiff company, or Mr. Wedderburn, was entitled to rely. Ostensible or apparent authority must, of course, be something emanating from the company and not from the person who seeks to defraud it and the other party. In the result, there will be judgment for the defendant company, with costs.

Judgment for the defendant company.

UNITED STATES OF AMERICA AND ANOTHER v. DOLLFUS MIEG ET COMPAGNIE S.A. AND ANOTHER.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Viscount Jowitt, Lord Porter, Lord Oaksey, Lord Radcliffe and Lord Tucker), December 10, 11, 12, 13, 17, 18, 19, 1951, February 25, 1952.]

Conflict of Laws—Impleading foreign sovereign States—Gold bars belonging to French company seized by Germans and carried off to Germany—Discovery by allied forces—In possession and under control of governments of United States, United Kingdom and France—Deposit with Bank of England for purpose of applying agreement by allied governments on restitution of monetary gold—Action by French company against bank claiming delivery of bars or damages for conversion.

Before the outbreak of the war in 1939 a French company purchased sixty-four identifiable bars of gold and stored them in a bank at Limoges in a special vault hired for that purpose. In 1944 the bars were seized by the Germans and taken to Germany where they were found by the United States forces in 1945 after the invasion of Germany by the allied armies. In September, 1946, to implement the terms of the Paris Agreement on Reparations, dated Jan. 14, 1946, the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America and France (into whose possession the sixty-four gold bars had passed) set up a Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold to deal on their behalf with gold taken from Germany. In March, 1948, the Bank of England was requested by the Treasury to open a gold set-aside account in the name of the Treasury on account of "the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France," the account to be operated by the representatives of those three governments on the Tripartite Commission "for the deposit and eventual distribution of a portion of the gold looted by Germany from the occupied States of Europe and recovered by the allied occupation forces". Under the terms of the contract the bank was to make charges in connection with the account. In July, 1948, under the orders of the Tripartite Commission, the sixty-four gold bars were conveyed to England and deposited in the gold set-aside account which had been opened by the bank pursuant to the request of the Treasury. After 1940 it was the normal practice of the bank, when gold bars were deposited by a customer, to ascertain the gold content of the bars deposited and to credit the customer with the quantity of ounces of fine gold discovered on assay, but not thereafter to treat the specific bars deposited as segregated in any way to the particular contract of deposit. When the sixty-four gold bars were sent to the bank it was known that the French company had, or might have, an interest in them, and on July 16, 1948, the Tripartite Commission wrote a letter to the bank saying that it had received a request from the French government that the bars should be set aside and that "the commission would be grateful, providing such action does not present insuperable technical or administrative difficulties, if you could see your way to having these bars set aside intact on arrival, if they can be identified, pending receipt of a further communication from the commission on the subject." On July 19 the bank replied, agreeing to the commission's proposal provided that, at the time it received the commission's authority to hold the gold at the disposal of the Bank of France, it also received instructions from the commission to ship the gold from London. On receiving the bars, the bank had them segregated to the account of the commission by placing them in two trucks, away from its other gold. A warning notice was placed on each truck indicating that the bars were not to be dealt with in any way without reference to higher authority. A similar warning notice should have been attached to the cards relating to the bars which constituted the records of the bank's bullion office, but this was not done. On Oct. 25, 1948, the bank wrote to the commission informing it of the fine gold content of the bars, "which amount has accordingly been set aside today for account of H.M. Treasury o/a the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France," and adding, "in view of the circumstances outlined in your letter . . . these bars have been temporarily segregated pending the receipt of instructions as to their disposal." As a result of the failure to place the warning notice on the bullion office cards relating to the bars, thirteen bars were removed from one of the trucks without the authority of any responsible official of the bank and were inadvertently sold between Dec. 30, 1948, and Jan. 26, 1949. In an action by the company against the bank claiming (inter alia) delivery of the bars, and, alternatively, damages for their conversion, the governments of the United States of America and France obtained leave of the court to be added as defendants. They contended, inter alia, (a) that the bars were held by the bank under a bailment from them and from the government of the United Kingdom, and were, accordingly, in the possession or under the control of the three governments, (b) that the disposal of thirteen of the bars by an employee of the bank in breach of the bank's duty to the three governments did not affect the three governments' control of the remaining bars, and, therefore, fifty-one bars were still in their possession or under their control, and (c) that, as they were foreign sovereign States who declined to submit to the jurisdiction of the court, all further proceedings in the action should be stayed, or, alternatively, all further proceedings relating to the fifty-one bars should be stayed.

HELD: (i) the relationship between the bank and the three governments created by the correspondence and the delivery of the sixty-four gold bars was that of bailee and bailors, the bailment being for safe custody and immediately determinable at the will of the bailors; the failure of the bank to take all possible or reasonable precautions to ensure that the arrangement which had been made for the segregation of the bars was carried out was not effective to destroy the conditions on which the bank held the bars; and, therefore, the relationship of bailee and bailors still existed in regard to the fifty-one bars remaining with the bank, notwithstanding the fact that, by some error of internal management on the part of the bank, thirteen of the bars had been sold.

(ii) the doctrine of the immunity of a foreign sovereign from process in a municipal court in respect of property which was in his possession or under his control was not confined to cases in which the foreign sovereign was either directly in possession of the property himself or indirectly in possession by his servants, but applied also where bailment of the property was made by or on behalf of the foreign sovereign and action was brought against the bailee, and, therefore, the court had no jurisdiction to order the bank to deliver to the company the fifty-one gold bars which were still subject to the contract of bailment.

Per VISCOUNT JOWITT and LORD TUCKER: "possession", within the meaning of the doctrine of immunity as explained by LORD ATKIN in The Arantzazu Mendi ([1939] 1 All E.R. 722), included a right to immediate possession.

(iii) if damages were awarded against the bank for conversion of the bars, the bank would, on payment, acquire the company's title to the gold and could set up that title against its bailors, the three governments; such a course would interfere with the right of the governments, vis-à-vis the bank, to immediate possession of the bars, and, if they wanted to recover them, they would be obliged to submit to the jurisdiction of the courts as plaintiffs in an action; and, therefore, damages could not be awarded against the bank in regard to the fifty-one bars still subject to the contract of bailment and all further proceedings in regard to those bars should be stayed; but, as the bank had itself put an end to the bailment in regard to the thirteen bars which it had sold, the action against the bank for damages for conversion of the thirteen bars should be allowed to proceed.

Decision of the COURT OF APPEAL ([1950] 1 All E.R. 747) reversed in regard to the fifty-one gold bars still with the bank and affirmed in regard to the thirteen bars sold.

INTERLOCUTORY APPEAL from an order of the Court of Appeal (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R., SOMERVELL and COHEN, L.J.J.), dated Jan. 11, 1951, affirming an order of ROMER, J., dated Nov. 3, 1950, whereby he refused an application by the defendants, the United States of America and the Republic of France, for an order to set aside the writ and all subsequent proceedings in an action by the plaintiff, a French company, relating to sixty-four bars of gold, or, alternatively, all such further proceedings as related to fifty-one of the bars which were still held by the defendant, the Bank of England.

The French company was the owner of the sixty-four gold bars which were seized and removed to Germany by the Germans during their occupation of France. In 1948, with the object of carrying out the provisions of an agreement by the Allied governments dated Jan. 14, 1946, the bars were deposited by the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom, and France in a gold set-aside account which had been opened on their behalf at the Bank of England at the request of the Treasury. On Oct. 18, 1948, the company commenced an action against the bank claiming (a) delivery of the gold bars, or, alternatively, damages for their conversion; (b) an injunction to restrain the bank from dealing or parting with possession of the bars; and (c) damages for their detention. On Mar. 10, 1949, by motion in the action, the bank moved before JENKINS, J., to have the writ and all subsequent proceedings in the action set aside on the grounds that the sixty-four bars were in the possession or under the control of the governments of the United Kingdom, the United States of America, and France and that the action impleaded two foreign sovereign States, viz., the governments of the United States of America and France, who declined to submit to the jurisdiction of the court. By an order, dated Apr. 6, 1949, and reported [1949] 1 All E.R. 946, JENKINS, J., granted the bank's application.

The company appealed, and, at the conclusion of the argument before the Court of Appeal, the court were informed that further investigations had shown that the bank had inadvertently sold thirteen of the sixty-four bars which were the subject-matter of the action. Evidence was given that since 1940 it had been the practice of the bank not to segregate bars deposited with it to the particular contract of deposit, but to credit the customer with the quantity of ounces of fine gold discovered on assay. It had, however, intended to depart from its regular practice in the case of these particular bars as the result of a request made by the representatives of the three governments when depositing them. The bars had been segregated by being placed in two trucks separate from the bank's other gold and a warning notice was placed on them indicating that they were not to be dealt with without reference to higher authority. To make the segregation effective a warning notice should also have been attached to the cards which constituted the records of the bars in the bank's bullion office, but this was not done. By an order dated Mar. 6, 1950, and reported [1950] 1 All E.R. 747, the Court of Appeal (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., SOMERVELL and COHEN, L.JJ.), allowed the appeal on the further evidence which was now before them, on the ground that, as the bank had failed to take one of the steps necessary to create an exception to its general rule of not segregating bars to the particular contract of deposit, the sixty-four gold bars were not at any relevant date in the possession or under the control of the three governments. But for the new evidence which was before them, SOMERVELL, L.J., and COHEN, L.J., would have affirmed the decision of JENKINS, J. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., held that, assuming that the bars had remained segregated, they were nevertheless not in the control of the three governments.

The United States of America and the Republic of France then presented a petition to the House of Lords for leave to appeal against the order of the Court of Appeal notwithstanding that they were not parties to the action, and, alternatively, for an order adding them as defendants to the action with leave to appeal against the order. The petition was heard by the Appeal Committee on May 8, 1950, when the petition was ordered to stand over generally with liberty to any party to apply to restore it, but on the footing that, if the United States of America and France should within fourteen days apply to the court to be joined as defendants to the action, the petition should not be restored until such action had been finally disposed of.

By an order of WYNN-PARRY, J., dated July 20, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 605, the United States of America and the Republic of France were added as defendants in the action. On Oct. 17, 1950, the writ of summons in the action was amended accordingly, and on Oct. 27, 1950, the two governments entered conditional appearances to the writ. They then applied, by motion in the action, for a stay of all further proceedings in the action, or, alternatively, of all such proceedings as related to the fifty-one bars still with the bank. On Nov. 3, 1950, the motion was dismissed by ROMER, J., without hearing argument, on the authority of the judgment of the Court of Appeal dated Mar. 6, 1950.

On an appeal by the two governments from his decision, the Court of Appeal considered certain additional evidence, contained in affidavits filed by officials of the bank on June 19, 1950, and July 24, 1950. The affidavit of June 19, 1950, sworn by the deputy chief cashier of the bank, exhibited instructions, dated Sept. 14, 1948, to the bank's bullion office that the sixty-four bars should be "temporarily segregated . . . pending the receipt of instructions from the Tripartite Commission", and contained (inter alia) a statement that the thirteen gold bars were removed in error and "without the authority of any official of the bank competent to revoke or override the instructions" of Sept. 14, 1948. The Court of Appeal held that the additional evidence did not affect the ratio decidendi of their decision of Mar. 6, 1950, and dismissed the appeal. Leave was given to appeal to the House of Lords. In the circumstances of the case, the bank considered, and the three governments agreed, that it would be more appropriate for the appeal to be brought by the two foreign governments and for the bank to be a respondent to it. The bank did not, however, oppose the appeal.

Sir Hartley Shawcross, Q.C., and Denys B. Buckley for the appellants, the United States of America and the Republic of France.

Sir Andrew Clark, Q.C., and R. O. Wilberforce for the first respondent, the French company.

Cross, Q.C., and J. R. C. Lee for the second respondent, the Bank of England.

The House took time for consideration.

Feb. 25. The following opinions were read.

VISCOUNT JOWITT: My Lords, Dollfus Mieg et Compagnie S.A., the respondent to this appeal, is a French company which before the outbreak of war in 1939 had acquired as its property sixty-four bars of gold. These bars of gold were stored in a bank at Limoges in a special vault which the company had hired. When the German armies overran Limoges they captured the sixty-four bars in question and carried them off to Germany, and, when the American armies occupied that part of Germany at which the bars had been stored by the Germans, they were taken possession of by the Americans and brought to Frankfurt where they remained for some time in American custody. Negotiations followed between the various allied governments as to the course to be followed with gold captured by the allied armies in Germany and finally a treaty was signed between eighteen allied governments. Nothing, I think, turns for present purposes on the precise terms of that treaty. It is sufficient to say that the sixty-four gold bars in question, together with other gold bars, passed into the possession of the American, British and French governments. These governments established a Tripartite Commission for the Restitution of Monetary Gold to deal with gold taken from Germany on their behalf. In March, 1948, a gold set-aside account was opened at the Bank of England in accordance with the terms of a letter from His Majesty's Treasury dated Mar. 9, 1948, and the bank's reply dated Mar. 11, 1948. The trial judge set out the terms of these letters in his judgment and came to the conclusion that the effect of such letters was to create a contract between the Bank of England and the American, British and French governments. He regarded the Treasury as a mere intermediary acting on behalf of the governments who were to operate the account ([1949] 1 All E.R. 959). I think he was amply justified in reaching this conclusion.

The terms of the contract must be construed in the light of the course of business which was well-known to all the contracting parties. Ever since 1940 the Bank of England, in operating a gold set-aside account, had not kept separate the gold belonging to one customer from the gold belonging to another customer, though the customers' gold, considered globally, was kept separate from gold belonging to the bank itself. Under the gold set-aside account, as managed in 1948, the bank, on receiving gold in whatever form from a customer, would weigh the gold and assay it and, if necessary, bring it up to the standard of fineness for good delivery in the London Bullion Market. Until the completion of weighing and assay the particular gold would be kept separate in the name of the depositor, but once these operations were completed there would be recorded in the books of the bank the number of ounces of fine gold comprised in the deposit, and the depositor would be entitled to receive from the bank the number of ounces of fine gold so ascertained, less charges. The customer would, however, no longer be entitled to receive any particular bars of gold in satisfaction of his contract. The contract, in short, once weighing and assaying had been completed, created a relationship between the depositor and the bank closely resembling that of debtor and creditor, except that the bank's obligation was to be discharged by the handing over of the requisite number of ounces of fine gold.

During the hearing in your Lordships' House we had produced for our inspection the bank's account. This is headed "Bar Gold set aside o/a His Majesty's Treasury o/a the governments of the United States, the United Kingdom and France". The account opens under date May 20/April 19, 1948, with an item "imported from B.N. Suisse Berne" and this is entered as "578700 oz. fine". The sixty-four bars, the subject-matter of these proceedings, were dealt with on a different basis. By a letter of July 10, 1948, a Monsieur Rueff, who was acting on behalf of the French delegation of the Inter-Allied Reparations Agency, wrote to the Secretary-General of the Tripartite Commission asking that the sixty-four bars should be preserved in their present form, and, as a result of this request, the Secretary-General of the Tripartite Commission, in a letter dated July 16, and addressed to the Bank of England, asked if the bank would be able and willing to have "these bars set aside intact on arrival . . . pending receipt of a further communication from the commission . . ." By a letter of July 19, 1948, the Bank of England answered as follows:

"The proposal which you make is acceptable to the Bank of England provided that at the time we receive the authority of the commission to hold the gold at the disposal of the Bank of France we also receive instructions from them to ship the gold from London."

Shortly after these letters the bank received the sixty-four bars and, as requested, set them aside. The weighing and assaying of the sixty-four bars were not completed until shortly before Oct. 25, 1948, and their gold content was on that day entered in the gold set-aside account as 25,679.605 fine ounces. This entry was, however, plainly not intended to terminate the bank's obligation to hold the specific sixty-four bars, for the letter of Oct. 25, 1948, from the bank to the Tripartite Commission recording the above facts concludes with this sentence:

"I would mention that in view of the circumstances outlined in your letter under-reference, these bars have been temporarily segregated pending the receipt of instructions as to their disposal."

In these circumstances I think that the correct view is that the letters of July coupled with the sending of the sixty-four bars to the bank constituted a bailment of the sixty-four bars "pending receipt of a further communication from the commission", and that the contract of bailment continued, notwithstanding the entry of Oct. 25. If there had been no special arrangement constituted by the July letters, I should have been of opinion that the bailment of the individual bars had been terminated when the account was credited with the fine gold content.

The writ in the action, in which the French company was the plaintiff and the Bank of England was the defendant, was issued on Oct. 18, 1948, and claimed delivery of the sixty-four bars and an injunction restraining the bank from parting with the bars. On the same day the company gave notice of motion for an interim injunction restraining the defendant bank from selling or parting with the possession of the sixty-four bars until the trial of action. On Nov. 2, 1948, the bank served notice of motion asking the court to set aside the writ on the ground that the sixty-four bars were in the possession or control of the governments of the United States of America, the Republic of France and the United Kingdom and on the further ground that the two foreign governments who declined to submit to the jurisdiction were directly or indirectly impleaded. On Mar. 8, 1949, the writ was amended by the insertion of a claim for damages for detention and conversion of the sixty-four bars. The company, by an affidavit sworn on its behalf by Frédéric Engel on Oct. 16, 1948, asserted that the sixty-four gold bars in question had been purchased by it and remained its property at all material times, and an affidavit sworn by Mr. Rootham, an assistant chief cashier in the employment of the Bank of England, set out the terms of the letters of Mar. 9 and 11, 1948, and was relied on by the bank in support of its application to stay all further proceedings. It is the fact that this latter affidavit made no reference to the July correspondence. Further affidavits were put in establishing the fact that the governments of the United States of America and of the Republic of France were not willing to submit to the jurisdiction. Mr. Engel made a further affidavit, dated Dec. 17, 1948, referring to and exhibiting the letter from Mr. Rueff of July 10, 1948, and this produced a further affidavit by Mr. Rootham exhibiting the two letters of July 16 and 19, 1948, respectively.

I have briefly referred to all the evidence that was available to JENKINS, J., when the case was heard before him in March, 1949. Unfortunately, the fact that by some mistake thirteen of the sixty-four bars had been delivered to purchasers outside the bank between Dec. 30, 1948, and Jan. 26, 1949, had not then been discovered, so that the case before the trial judge proceeded on the basis, which everyone believed to be the fact, that the sixty-four bars were still intact in the bank's possession. If discovery had been ordered, it is possible that this fact would have been brought to light, but, whether this would have been so or not, it seems to me desirable that in a case of this sort an order should be made for full disclosure of documents before the hearing. In the present case, as is apparent from the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., documents were produced before the Court of Appeal which had not been produced before the trial judge, and in your Lordships' House still further documents were produced which had not been available to either of the courts below. This would have been avoided if full discovery had been given.

JENKINS, J., delivered his reserved judgment on Apr. 6, 1949, setting aside the writ. He regarded the three governments as being in possession or control of the sixty-four bars of gold, which were held for their public purposes, and regarded the action against the Bank of England as being an attempt to sue indirectly the three governments, two of whom he treated as foreign sovereign States. He decided that, so long as property is in the possession or control of a foreign sovereign State, no court in this country can entertain proceedings which, if successful, would result in any interference with the foreign sovereign State's exercise of such possession or control whether directly (as by removing the property from the custody of an agent to whom the foreign sovereign State has entrusted it) or indirectly (as by casting in damages for wrongful possession an agent through whom the foreign sovereign State is exercising its possession or control). The company appealed to the Court of Appeal and before the conclusion of the hearing in that court the fact that by some error thirteen of the sixty-four bars had been delivered on the market was revealed. I have not overlooked the fact that the disposal of the thirteen bars did not take place until after the issue of the writ. This difficulty could have been surmounted by the issue of a further writ after Jan. 26, 1949, and all the parties have asked us to treat the case as though the writ had been issued on the later date.

My Lords, it is, I think, clear that, so treating the date of the writ, the action in regard to these thirteen bars must be allowed to proceed, for in regard to them it may well be argued that no question any longer arises of interfering with the possession or control of a foreign sovereign State. I do not think it would be proper for us to come to any final conclusion as to this matter. It is not for us to try the case. We have merely to decide at this stage whether the action should or should not be allowed to go for trial, and, in so far as the thirteen bars are concerned, I certainly think that the action should be allowed to go on. All the members of the Court of Appeal thought, however, that the disposal of the thirteen bars made it inevitable that the action should be allowed to proceed as to the entire sixty-four bars. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., thought ([1950] 1 All E.R. 751) that the disposal of the thirteen bars had "destroyed at a single blow the whole premise on which the judgment below proceeded". SOMERVELL, L.J., would have agreed with the judgment of JENKINS, J., but for the disposal of the thirteen bars. He states his view as follows (ibid., 763):

"The sixty-four bars for all relevant purposes at all material dates were in the pool. Thirteen of them were disposed of and the whole sixty-four might have been disposed of without instructions from or reference to the Tripartite Commission. In these circumstances it seems to me impossible to hold that the sixty-four bars were in the possession or under the control of the three governments."

COHEN, L.J., agreed with SOMERVELL, L.J.

My Lords, I cannot agree with this reasoning. If the bars were in the possession or control of the governments, I cannot think that the fact that by some error of internal management thirteen bars were disposed of alters the position except as to those thirteen bars. For the question of possession or control must depend on the terms of the contract under which the bars in question came to the bank. If possession or control was retained by the governments, that position is not altered by the fact that through an error thirteen bars were disposed of in breach of the contract. Unless the disposal of the thirteen bars throws some light on the terms of the contract, it seems to me to be irrelevant in regard to the remaining fifty-one bars. I have already stated my view that in regard to the sixty-four bars there was a contract of bailment and an obligation was thereby imposed on the bank to keep these bars separate and intact and not to allow them to become merged in the general pool of customer's gold pending the receipt of further instructions. The Master of the Rolls, differing in this respect from the other judges in the Court of Appeal, thought that JENKINS, J., had come to an erroneous conclusion on the facts as presented to him. He thought that from and after the time at which the sixty-four bars were delivered to the bank the governments no longer had such a degree of possession or control as would justify them in asking to have the action stayed. After the decision of the Court of Appeal had been given, and in view of the then contemplated appeal to your Lordships' House, the two foreign governments applied to be added as defendants to the action. An order was made that they should be so added with the result that we have had the advantage of hearing counsel on their behalf as well as counsel for the Bank of England in support of the appeal.

My Lords, I think that the question for our decision is whether the foreign governments, notwithstanding the delivery of the sixty-four bars to the Bank of England, still retained such an interest in the bars as to entitle them to have the action stayed. The decided cases which illustrate the way in which the principle of immunity has been applied by our courts are largely concerned with ships and actions in rem. In Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. (1) LORD WRIGHT refers with approval ([1938] 1 All E.R. 734) to the observation of Sir H. S. Giffard, S.-G., in his argument in The Parlement Belge (2) (5 P.D. 202):

"The privilege depends on the immunity of the sovereign, not on anything peculiar to a ship of war, though it seldom arises as to anything else, because hardly anything belonging to a sovereign in his public capacity, except a ship of war, ever goes wandering into the jurisdiction of foreign courts."

Delivering the judgment of the court in The Parlement Belge (2), BRETT, L.J., deduces the following principle (ibid., 214) from the decisions of the English and United States cases:

"The principle to be deduced from all these cases is that, as a consequence of the absolute independence of every sovereign authority, and of the international comity which induces every sovereign State to respect the independence and dignity of every other sovereign State, each and every one declines to exercise by means of its courts any of its territorial jurisdiction over the person of any sovereign or ambassador of any other State, or over the public property of any State which is destined to public use, or over the property of any ambassador, though such sovereign, ambassador or property be within its territory, and, therefore, but for the common agreement, subject to its jurisdiction."

In that case the Belgian government was the owner of the ship. In the Cristina case (1) LORD WRIGHT said ([1938] 1 All E.R. 732):

"The rule is not limited to ownership, however. It applies to cases where what the government has is a lesser interest, which may be not merely not proprietary but also not even possessory."

LORD ATKIN stated the principle in the following terms (ibid., 720):

"The foundation for the application to set aside the writ and arrest of the ship is to be found in two propositions of international law engrafted on to our domestic law which seem to me to be well established and to be beyond dispute. The first is that the courts of a country will not implead a foreign sovereign. That is, they will not by their process make him against his will a party to legal proceedings, whether the proceedings involve process against his person or seek to recover from him specific property or damages. The second is that they will not by their process, whether the sovereign is a party to the proceedings or not, seize or detain property which is his, or of which he is in possession or control. There has been some difference in the practice of nations as to possible limitations of this second principle, as to whether it extends to property used only for the commercial purposes of the sovereign or to personal private property. In this country, it is, in my opinion, well-settled that it applies to both."

My Lords, I think it probable that LORD ATKIN inserted the words "or control" in his second proposition so as to make it wide enough to cover those cases which had been cited to him in argument in which the foreign government had requisitioned or directed a ship without depriving the owners of their possession. This is, I think, merely an illustration of one of those interests "lesser than a proprietary interest or even than a possessory interest" to which LORD WRIGHT referred. There is, I think, no special doctrine applying to ships which does not equally apply to gold bars.

We were pressed in argument with the difficulty which might arise if it were alleged that a foreign sovereign while in this country seized goods in this country without any legal justification and then made a bailment of such goods to a private person within the jurisdiction. We are not dealing with any such case at present and I should prefer not to make any pronouncement in regard to such a case. In the present case the foreign governments had, undoubtedly, been in possession of the gold bars before they were sent to this country. They decided in the public interest to send these gold bars to the Bank of England in London. In my view, the bank became bailee of these bars and was bound to keep them intact pending further instructions.

In the case now before us the action is an action in personam and not an action in rem. I do not think that the foreign governments can be said to be directly impleaded. Neither do I think that they are being indirectly impleaded, for the present action is an action in personam brought against the Bank of England. The word "control" in the second limb of LORD ATKIN's proposition is a word of vague import, and I think it fallacious to treat LORD ATKIN's words as though they were the words of a statute. I do not think that the word "control" is apt in the present context. The bars of gold did not require any treatment or anything in the nature of management. All that was required was that they should be left intact and undisturbed in the vaults of the bank.

In these circumstances, I think we should consider whether the foreign governments had such a possessory right in relation to the gold bars as to entitle them to ask that this action should be stayed. Under English law, where there is a simple contract of bailment, the possession of the goods bailed passes to the bailee. The bailor has in such a case the right to immediate possession and by reason of this right can exercise those possessory remedies which are available to the possessor. The person having the right to immediate possession is, however, frequently referred to in English law as being the "possessor"—in truth, the English law has never worked out a completely logical and exhaustive definition of "possession". We are bound to decide this case in accordance with the English law and we have no evidence of any other system of law. Yet it is germane to remember that the English law has incorporated the doctrine of State immunity from international law. It would be an unsatisfactory position if the extent and ambit of this doctrine were to depend on the special and peculiar doctrine of each jurisdiction in relation to "possession" with the result that differing results might be arrived at according to whether the case was governed by English law or, for example, by Scottish law. The basis of the rule was explained by LORD ATKIN ([1939] 1 All E.R. 722) in The Arantzazu Mendi (3), as being intended either to secure reciprocal rights of immunity, or to avoid the risk of injured pride if jurisdiction was sought to be exercised, or to avoid the risk of belligerent action if government property is seized or injured, and the distinction between "possession" and the immediate right to possession would have no bearing on these considerations. I agree with JENKINS, J., in thinking that the fact that the foreign governments had the immediate right to possession of the sixty-four bars made it possible consistently with the established principle of English law relating to State immunity for relief to be given in this action by ordering the delivery up of the bars or by granting an injunction restraining the bank from parting with their possession, for, if either of these courses were taken, it would be necessary for the foreign governments to take proceedings in this country if they wanted to recover the gold here. The doctrine of immunity should not, I think, be confined to those cases in which the foreign sovereign was either directly in possession of property by himself or at least indirectly by his servants, but, if it were so confined, the doctrine would not be applicable to the case of simple bailment. I can find nothing in any decided case to support any such limitation. We have been referred to certain American cases which I have considered with care, but I do not think that any of these cases affords any justification for such a limitation of the doctrine of sovereign immunity as is here sought to be introduced. JENKINS, J., in the course of his judgment, which I would desire to express my indebtedness, expresses the matter as follows ([1949] 1 All E.R. 960):

"A foreign sovereign State (unless embodied in a personal sovereign visiting this country) cannot, so far as I can see, be in actual physical possession of property here otherwise than by its servants. Accordingly, if actual physical possession by a foreign sovereign State were essential to immunity on the score of possession by such State, immunity on that ground could only be claimed in respect of property in this country in the actual physical possession either of some personal sovereign or of a person who could be shown to be in the strict sense a servant of a foreign sovereign State (so as to make his possession that of his master) or else to be himself entitled to diplomatic immunity. The application or exclusion of the principle of immunity would thus be made to depend on nice distinctions respecting the particular mode in which a foreign sovereign State might happen to exercise dominion over property brought by it to this country in its possession or control. For instance, if gold was brought to this country by a foreign sovereign State to be applied in the purchase of goods for the public purposes of that State and placed in the hands of a servant of the State concerned to be applied in making such purchases in accordance with its directions, the gold would be protected by the principle of immunity on the score of possession by the foreign sovereign State, irrespective of any immunity from process the servant might be entitled to claim in his own person. If, on the other hand, gold brought to this country by a foreign sovereign State for similar purposes was deposited by it with a banker or other agent for safe custody and disposal in accordance with its directions, the gold would at once become exposed in the hands of the banker or other agent to any adverse claims there might be, and the principle of immunity would afford no protection from actions brought by third parties against the banker or other agent for the purpose of establishing such claims. I cannot think that it would be right to make the application or exclusion of the principle of immunity (based as it is on substantial reasons of policy) turn on nice distinctions of this kind."

Although I agree with the observations of LORD MAUGHAM in the Cristina case (1) that the doctrine of immunity should not be extended, yet I think that we should unduly limit the doctrine if we were to decline to apply it to any bailment which might be made by or on behalf of the foreign sovereign in which the action is brought against the bailee. If it were so limited, the result would be that, if the foreign sovereign deposited his bag or his jewellery with the railway or with the hotel or with the bank, proceedings could be taken against the bailee claiming the delivery of the article which had been deposited by or on behalf of that sovereign.

It remains to consider whether the fact that the writ, by reason of the amendment, claims damages for conversion should be allowed to make any difference. The only act of conversion in respect of the fifty-one gold bars which can be relied on is the fact that the Bank of England refused to deliver any of the gold bars which it was holding for the three governments to the company. If the bank were ordered to pay damages representing the value of the gold bars, then, on payment, it would acquire the title of the company to the gold and could set up that title against its bailors, the three governments. This would result in an interference with the rights of the three governments who would be obliged, if they wanted to recover the gold, to submit to the jurisdiction by starting proceedings as plaintiffs in our courts. Moreover, if the court cannot order the bank to deliver the gold bars to the company, it is difficult to see how the court can order the bank to pay damages for not so delivering the gold bars. On the whole, therefore, I come to the conclusion that the action should be allowed to continue as to the thirteen bars only. With regard to the question of costs, I think that all orders already made as to costs should be allowed to stand and that in relation to any steps in these proceedings in which orders as to costs have not already been made, including this appeal and the previous application by the governments to be joined as defendants, each party should pay their own costs.

LORD PORTER: My Lords, in this action the French company sued the Bank of England in detinue for the recovery of sixty-four bars of gold which were at one time the property of the company but were seized by the Germans in the course of the late war, taken by them to Germany and found and taken possession of by the Allies. The bars were then transferred to a Tripartite Commission set up by the French, American and English governments for the purpose of recouping the losses suffered by their countrymen as a result of the predation of the Germans. For the purpose of the present appeal the appellants, the United States of America and the Republic of France, are prepared to accept the view that the property in the bars remains where it originally was, viz., with the company. Undoubtedly, the bars were at one time in the possession of the three governments and were entrusted by them to the Bank of England. The question for your Lordships is whether the company can sue the bank or whether that body can rely on the immunity accorded to a sovereign State on the ground that the bars are still in the possession or under the control of the governments which deposited them, and whether the result of allowing the case to proceed would be to implead such a State or States. The Crown of this country is not a party to the appeal inasmuch as, since the Crown Proceedings Act, 1947, the British government can claim no greater protection than that accorded to a private individual, but the United States of America and France are still protected by the doctrine of State immunity where that doctrine applies.

The facts have been set out by JENKINS, J. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 949), in the Court of first instance, by COHEN, L.J. ([1950] 1 All E.R. 763), in the Court of Appeal, and by VISCOUNT JOWITT in your Lordships' House. I need not repeat them. JENKINS, J., stayed the action, but when he gave his judgment he was unaware that after action brought the bank had delivered thirteen of the sixty-four bars to third parties. The majority of the Court of Appeal, as I understand them, would have reached the same conclusion as the learned Judge if they had had to depend on the same material, but thought that the disposal by the bank of the thirteen bars destroyed the argument for staying the proceedings in respect of the whole of the sixty-four, the view of SOMERVELL, J., being that the bank had ceased to keep them separate because, though it had stacked them in two special trucks and placed a notice that they were for disposal, it had failed to enter a warning note on the cards relating to the consignment in question, and that the entry of the note was a precaution which must be observed if the bars are to be regarded as separated from the rest. SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., went further and thought that, even without the additional evidence, a case had been made for allowing the action to proceed against the bank. In his view it was not established that the bank was ever under a duty to keep the bars separate, and, even if it was, he agreed with the other members of the court in thinking that it had not done so. This portion of the case involves a question of fact or inference from fact, and, in my view, the inference drawn by the Court of Appeal is not justified. The correspondence and affidavit evidence show that, though since 1940 it has not been the practice of the bank, except as the consequence of a special arrangement, to keep a customer's gold separate from that of other customers, that in this special case it agreed to do so and took steps to carry out its agreement. I cannot read the letter dated Oct. 25, 1948, from the bank to the Tripartite Commission as bearing any other meaning. The suggestion that it means: "We have in fact, but without obligation, held the bars separate, but that separation ceased once we had assayed" is inconsistent with the final letter of Oct. 25 and, indeed, with the general import of the correspondence. The entry in the account crediting it with the value of the bars and the charges made for assaying do not conflict with this view. It is but an account-keeping device and it would be odd if the bank, knowing that an action had been brought against it and, indeed, as a result of that fact, were to change the whole relationship between itself and its customer. But it is said that the Treasury was the customer and the Tripartite Commission was merely empowered to draw on the account through certain specified persons nominated by the Treasury. I cannot take that view. The Treasury was, no doubt, the instrument by means of which the relationship between the bank and the Tripartite Commission was brought about. The commission, however, was the only body entitled to deal with it and, in fact, through its secretary, gave instructions to the bank and was informed by the bank's officials of the action taken. It is true that instructions as to the operation of the account are, in the words of Sir Edward Rowe Dutton, in his letter of Mar. 9, 1948 [from His Majesty's Treasury to the Bank of England] entrusted to certain named representatives, but this arrangement is limited to instructions for the operation of the account and leaves the commission to make arrangements through its secretary as to the disposal of the bars. In fact, the commission gave such instructions and the bank accepted them.

Had, then, the sixty-four bars remained intact, I find myself in agreement with the original judgment of JENKINS, J. Does it, then, make a difference that in error thirteen bars were treated as if they were part of the pool from which gold could be drawn for customers generally, instead of being treated as confined in use to one particular customer? The reason for the decision of the majority in the Court of Appeal is, perhaps, most clearly exemplified in the words of SOMERVELL, L.J. He says ([1950] 1 All E.R. 763):

"The authorities of the bank responsible for the correspondence with the Tripartite Commission intended that these bars should be kept apart from the pool and held as individual bars for the three governments. Some steps were taken to this end, but, as the facts show, and as is admitted, one necessary step was not taken. The sixty-four bars for all relevant purposes at all material dates were in the pool."

My Lords, with all due respect, I am unable to concur with this view. In fact, the bars were kept separate in two trucks and a notice was placed on them to indicate that they were to be used only for a particular purpose. It is true that one precaution, viz., an entry on the cards, which would have been helpful in avoiding a misuse of the bars and might have prevented it, was not taken, but that neglect did not cancel the instructions of the Tripartite Commission or the bank's acceptance of them. So long as the bars remained in the possession of the bank, a failure to take all possible precautions, or, indeed, even a failure to take all reasonable precautions to prevent the bars being dealt with in the ordinary course, is not effective to destroy the conditions on which the bank was instructed to hold and agreed that the bars should be held. Misdelivery may in certain cases put an end to a claim to possession, though it will not in the normal case destroy a right of property. On the other hand, negligence in failing to take all possible steps to see that an arrangement which had been made is carried out does not alter the fact that all bars in the possession of the bank remained in its possession subject to the terms on which they were deposited. In such a case, however, misdelivery does, in my view, affect the position, since, as regards the thirteen bars, it can no longer be asserted that they are in the possession of the three governments through their bailees, the bank.

That the bank is a bailee, is, I think, not open to doubt, but that fact leaves undecided the difficult and interesting question: Can those who assert a possessory title to goods, but make no claim to the property in them, be said still to retain possession after they have entrusted those goods to a bailee to hold on their behalf? There is no direct English authority which decides the point, much less is there one binding on your Lordships. The nearest, I suppose, is Ancona v. Rogers (4), a decision on the words "apparent possession" contained in s. 7 of the Bills of Sale Act, 1854. In delivering the judgment of the court in that case, MELLISH, L.J., said (1 Ex.D. 292):

"... there is no doubt that a bailor, who has delivered goods to a bailee to keep them on account of the bailor, may still treat the goods as being in his own possession, and can maintain trespass against a wrongdoer who interferes with them. It was argued, however, that this was a mere legal or constructive possession of the goods, and that in the Bills of Sale Act, the word 'possession' was used in a popular sense, and meant actual or manual possession. We do not agree with this argument. It seems to us that goods which have been delivered to a bailee to keep for the bailor, such as a gentleman's plate delivered to his banker, or his furniture warehoused at the Pantechnicon, would, in a popular sense, as well as in a legal sense, be said to be still in his possession."

It is urged, however, that these dicta are obiter and wrong, that, in any case, the judgment was not concerned with "possession" as opposed to property, and that the true view is that the rule applies only in a case where the bailor has the property and the bailee has the possession. In such a case it is maintained that the bailor can sue in right of his property but that an action in right of possession belongs to the bailee only. This contention may be true where the bailor has no right to demand an immediate return of the article at his will, but the better opinion is, I think, that, where the bailor can at any moment demand the return of the object bailed, he still has possession: see POLLOCK AND WRIGHT ON POSSESSION IN THE COMMON LAW (1888), p. 166, BEAL ON BAILMENTS (1900), p. 40, and HALSBURY'S LAWS OF ENGLAND (Hailsham ed.), vol. 1, p. 775, sub. tit. Bailment. In each of the authorities referred to, the right of the bailor is limited to a case of gratuitous bailment, a requisite which, in my opinion, is fulfilled in the present case. The bank held the bars, without any right of lien, at the will of the commission.

The commission being, in my opinion, as I have indicated, still in possession of the fifty-one of the bars, it has to be determined whether the commission or the bank is entitled to immunity from suit instituted by the company. Such an action, it is argued on behalf of the latter, can be brought and determined without in any way impleading the two governments or affecting their rights. It is accepted by both parties that the principles to be considered are those laid down by LORD ATKIN in the Cristina case (1). He says ([1938] 1 All E.R. 100), in regard to those principles:

"The first is that the courts of a country will not implead a foreign sovereign. That is, they will not by their process make him against his will a party to legal proceedings, whether the proceedings involve process against his person or seek to recover from him specific property or damages. The second is that they will not by their process, whether the sovereign is a party to the proceedings or not, seize or detain property which is his, or of which he is in possession or control."

As, in the view which I have expressed, the three governments are in possession of the fifty-one bars, it is not necessary to inquire what is the exact meaning contributed to the word "control". It is enough that they are in possession and an attempt is being made to interfere with that possession. It is said, however, that the decision in the Cristina case (1) is not of universal application but applies only to an action in rem and that, in other cases, retention in the hands of the possessor himself is required to bring its principles into force. It is true that the matter then under consideration was a ship and that a decision in respect of a ship is an action in rem and would, therefore, bind all the world and not the parties only, but the observations of those members of your Lordships' House who sat to decide the case were by no means confined to actions in rem. They extended to the case of all chattels: see, in particular, the observations of LORD MAUGHAM and LORD WRIGHT. The principle, in my opinion, is a wider one and embraces any chattel, whether the subject of an action in rem or not. No doubt, the doctrine should, as LORD MAUGHAM suggested in the Cristina case (1), be narrowly watched, but it has always to be remembered that governments must act through servants or agents and often through bailees, and it would destroy the efficacy of the doctrine if it were strictly confined to personal possession. I do not find any light or enlightenment in the American cases on the subject under discussion.

They all, I think, turn on the question who was in possession at a particular time and depend on their own facts.

So far, I have dealt with the claim of the company to recover the gold bars themselves and with its claim to an injunction. Counsel on behalf of the company, however, expressed himself as willing to give up that claim and rest on his right to recover damages for conversion. Such a claim, he maintained, neither impleaded the sovereigns nor involved a seizure of their property. It was merely a claim for damages against the bank. But, if the bank were ordered to pay damages to the company, it would in law be entitled to the company's right of property on paying the damages awarded and it would follow that, if the Tripartite Commission required the bank to return the bars, the bank could refuse to do so, relying on the title acquired by the payment of the damages, and thereby compel the governments either to bring an action or forego their rights. The object of the doctrine of immunity, it has been said, is that a sovereign may not be compelled either to submit to a foreign jurisdiction or be compelled to go to law to obtain or preserve his right. Such an object might be defeated if this action were permitted to proceed, since the bank is in possession of the bars and could refuse to surrender them and so compel the governments, if so minded, to take action in an endeavour to recover them.

One other point of substance has been mentioned. It was suggested that immunity would only be granted where the country claiming it granted reciprocal immunity to other nations. I can find no authority for this proposition and, in any case, it was not taken either before JENKINS, J., or in the Court of Appeal, and no material fact has, therefore, been presented to your Lordships to enable them to deal with the argument or to ascertain whether the two governments concerned grant reciprocal immunity or not. In my view, the argument is not established. The question is: What is the law of nations by which civilized nations in general are bound, not how two individual nations may treat one another: see per LORD MAUGHAM ([1938] 1 All E.R. 739) in the Cristina case (1).

I would only add that, in my opinion, it might have been possible for the Court of Appeal to refuse to stay the action and allow it to proceed against the bank, and in the course of that proceeding to ascertain the true relationship between the bank and the Tripartite Commission. If, as a result of those proceedings, it should have been held that the commission was in possession or control of the gold bars, the claim to immunity would have succeeded and the action against the bank would have failed. But, in fact, a different course was taken. The two governments, whose interest, it was contended, took away the jurisdiction of the court to hear the case, applied to your Lordships' House either to be permitted to attend and argue the case before your Lordships or to be added as parties. On this application they were given leave to be added in order that they might enter a conditional appearance and claim immunity from the jurisdiction of the courts of this country to deal with the matter. The two governments concerned then applied to WYNN-PARRY, J., to be added. They were given leave and were so added. Thereupon they filed further evidence and again applied that the action might be stayed. Both the learned judge and the Court of Appeal refused to stay, and from that refusal the two governments appeal to your Lordships' House. Had the action continued to be carried on against the bank only, it might have been possible to ascertain all the facts more fully and accurately, and, if it was found, after further steps had been taken, that the bank had rightfully claimed immunity on the ground that the foreign governments would be implicated or their rights invaded, the action could then have been stayed. As it is, the two governments are parties, and it is, therefore, incumbent on your Lordships here and now to stay or refuse to stay the action. In these circumstances and on the material before your Lordships I would agree with VISCOUNT JOWITT in staying the action as to the fifty-one bars but allowing to proceed in respect of the thirteen.

LORD OAKSEY: My Lords, I agree.

LORD RADCLIFFE: My Lords, I do not think that the difficulty of this case lies in deciding what relation the Bank of England bore to the Tripartite Commission in respect of the sixty-four gold bars that were delivered to the bank. No doubt, it was difficult to establish the facts on which this relation depended, primarily because the bank itself seems to have known less than it might have about the real nature of its own proceedings. It was this uncertainty that led the Court of Appeal to take what I regard as a mistaken view of the facts. But, when those facts are finally established and can be surveyed in their proper setting, it seems to me reasonably clear that both at the date of the issue of the writ and at the dates of the launching of the relevant motions in this action the bank was holding such of the bars as it then retained as a mere deposit on behalf of the commission. These bars were held for the time being in specie to the order of the commission, subject to the stipulation that instructions placing them at the disposal of the Bank of France were not to be given unless accompanied by instructions from that bank to ship at once from London. This deposit amounted to no more than a bailment at will. I think that this view of the facts is the one which in substance commends itself to all your Lordships, and I do not think it necessary to say anything more about it. It follows that I do not attach to the disposal of the thirteen bars of the original consignment which disappeared from the vault the same significance as was attached to it by all the members of the Court of Appeal. That incident can mean only one of two things. Either the fact that it happened at all is itself such cogent evidence that the bars were not held in specie that it might to outweigh all other evidence that they were, or the removal of the bars was merely something which ought not to have been done and the doing of which was contrary to the arrangement which the bank had come to. If the latter was all that the incident amounted to, it is of no importance for our purpose. In my opinion, the latter was all that the incident did amount to. The important and difficult question is whether, on that basis of fact, anything ought to be done to arrest the company's action. For the time being I will confine myself to the action so far as it relates to the fifty-one gold bars which are now all that the bank retains. Does that action offend against the rule of immunity of independent sovereigns which forms part of our municipal law? I treat the commission as no more than three sovereigns joined in a particular relation. It is, of course, beyond question that there is some such rule and that it has been expounded or applied in a number of decisions in our courts. But I do not feel confident that it can be, or that it ought to be, expressed in any very precise language, and I do not at all share the view, which rather dominated the argument of this appeal, that a definition of the rule has now become, as it were, graven on tables of stone and that those tables consist of the speech of LORD ATKIN in Compania Naviera Vascongado v. Cristina S.S. (1). For myself, I think that the range and purpose of our rule is expressed as well as may be in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS, 3rd ed., p. 215:

"The court has . . . no jurisdiction to entertain an action or other proceeding against (1) any foreign sovereign . . . An action or proceeding against the property of [a foreign sovereign] is . . . an action or proceeding against such person."

This is the rule which SCRUTTON, L.J., quoted with approval ([1924] P. 243) in The Jupiter (5). The rule, so expressed, leaves open the question what is an action "against the property of a foreign sovereign" in any particular case. But I am afraid that the abundant argument that we had in this case as to the application of the words "of which he is in possession or control", as used by LORD ATKIN ([1938] 1 All E.R. 721), in the Cristina case (1), shows that even his summary leaves open as many questions as it settles. In fact, this is not a field in which the law can be set at rest by any neat combination of words. But the rule as expressed in DICEY'S CONFLICT OF LAWS has this advantage. It does make clear that the property of a sovereign enjoys no immunity in legal proceedings except so far as those proceedings amount in one way or another to a suit against the sovereign. If the sovereign is actually named as a party to a suit, the proceedings identify themselves. Even then, I think that it is going too far to say that such a suit must necessarily be arrested. It may depend on the purpose for which the sovereign is made a party. But certainly a special difficulty begins when he is not actually named, but the suit is one which may result in a judgment or order that will affect his interest in some piece of property. Even to say that much begs one important question, for it assumes that he has a valid interest in that property, whereas a stay of proceedings on the ground of immunity has normally to be granted or refused at a stage in the action when interests are claimed but not established, and, indeed, to require him to establish his interest before the court (which may involve the court's denial of his claim) is to do the very thing which the general principle requires that our courts should not do. The Parlement Belge (2) is a leading case on this branch of the law, but it does not offer much help on the particular aspect of it with which your Lordships are now concerned because it was common ground throughout the case that the ship was the public property of the kingdom of Belgium. What the plaintiffs objected to in that case was the staying of an action in rem about the ship, having regard to the uses to which she was put by her sovereign owner. Once it was settled that those uses did not disqualify the owner from taking advantage of the general rule, it was easy to show that the court's order for the arrest of the ship, if made, would be in substance an order against the sovereign.

But the principle recognised in The Parlement Belge (2) has been carried much further since then. It has been applied even when the sovereign had not claimed, let alone proved, that he was the owner of the property which was the subject of the action. It has been regarded as sufficient to stay the proceedings (i) that he had de facto possession of the property (The Gagara (6), The Jupiter (5), the Cristina case (1)), or such rights of direction and control, without possession, as arise from requisitioning (The Broadmayne (7)), and (ii) that the nature of the proceedings is such that, if successful, they would result in an order of the court affecting that possession or those other rights. The Cristina case (1) is, of course, a decision of this House. In it the other decisions that I have referred to, all unanimous decisions of Courts of Appeal, were reviewed and, as I think, approved. In my opinion, they constitute a principle wide enough in application to be conclusive of the present appeal.

The special feature that we have to deal with is that the company's action is not an action in rem. It does not come from the Court of Admiralty, but it is an action for trover or detinue, the basis of which is our common law of tort. Decisions of our courts as to how to apply the principle of immunity to such a case are curiously lacking. Apart from the Admiralty cases, of which I have noticed a few, the other line of authority is to be traced in decisions of the Court of Chancery. These decisions depend essentially on the existence of a trust fund or other item of trust property within the area of jurisdiction of the Chancery courts. Given the trust fund or property, there is a trust to be administered by the court, and it was evidently the belief of the judges who were responsible for the equity jurisdiction that they had a responsibility for administering, and in due course determining, the rights to such property, even though a foreign sovereign might be known to be a possible or certain claimant to an interest in it. I do not see any other explanation of the decision of LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., in Lariviere v. Morgan (8) that does not to some extent threaten the principle that has been well established in the Admiralty cases, and it is, in effect, the explanation of it that was given by LORD CAIRNS, L.C. (L.R. 7 H.L. 430) when the same case (Morgan v. Lariviere (8)) was before your Lordships' House. Perhaps there is no real analogy between the actual possession or rights that existed in the Admiralty cases and the possible claim or interest envisaged by the Chancery cases. Perhaps it is enough to say that the Courts of Chancery treated trust property within their jurisdiction as a domestic responsibility to an extent that would not have commended itself to the Court of Admiralty when dealing with a ship which was found to be within the reach of its process. The Chancery decisions are well known and of long standing, and it is, I think, easier to treat them as a separate branch of our general law of sovereign immunity, or as an exception from the main principle, than to accept the cogency of the explanation of LORD LANGDALE, M.R. (6 Beav. 39) in Duke of Brunswick v. King of Hanover (9) that to make a foreign sovereign a party to administration proceedings does not "compel" him to take part in them, for it merely gives him "an opportunity to come in to . . . establish his interest." But I do not think that this line of authority is of any direct relevance in this appeal. Here there is no trust property and no trust. In my view, the Admiralty decisions and the principles to be extracted from them have much more bearing on the present case.

Now, what is the situation of fact here and what does this suit seek to get the court to do? We know that the bars of gold entered this country from the possession of the Tripartite Commission and that the bank hold them merely to the order and at the disposition of that commission. In those circumstances, I regard the gold as in the possession of the commission for the purpose of the rule that we are considering. The property of a sovereign State, which is an abstraction, must be in the physical possession of some actual person, and I do not see any distinction of substance in a matter of this kind between the possession of a servant of the State and the possession of its bailee when the bailment is of such a nature as that of the bank in this case. Indeed, I think that the commission's "possession and control" of the gold bars in the hands of the bank amounted to a form of property more substantial than that which His Majesty's government acquired by requisitioning the Broadmayne. Yet the Broadmayne was held to be exempt from arrest by virtue of His Majesty's immunity: see The Broadmayne (7).

The suit began as a claim in detinue. That means that the court was going to be asked, or, at any rate, could be asked, to make an order on the bank to hand over the bars to the company. Such an order would unquestionably interfere with the commission's possession of them and compel the commission, if it wished to recover possession, to come to court and try to get them back from the company. I cannot feel any doubt that such a suit offends against the principle of sovereign immunity. But then the company, through its counsel, has said that it is willing, if necessary, to drop its claim in detinue and proceed with its action on the basis that it is a claim for conversion only, with the result that the company will seek to obtain a judgment for damages against the bank and no more. The company says that no principle of immunity can be offended merely by mulcting the bailee in damages. How far this argument goes I am not clear. Every servant who insists on his master's title to property in his physical possession is liable to be sued for damages for conversion by the rightful owner, and there would be no such thing as the immunity of a foreign sovereign from suits "against his movable property" in this country except suits in rem against ships. I have found much more difficulty than the learned judges in the courts below in dealing with this point. They felt it to be an obvious proposition that, if the court could not make a direct order on the bank to hand over the bars (and I agree that it could not), it was impossible that it could have any jurisdiction to award damages for a failure to do that very thing. I do not feel altogether satisfied that this is convincing logic, but, when I consider the real nature of a claim for damages for conversion, I come to the same conclusion. Subject to the payment of costs and special damages (if there are any), an action for damages for conversion can always be stayed if the defendant offers to hand over the property in dispute. In that sense a suit for damages for conversion is an attempt to use the court's process to interfere with the existing possession of the chattel, the title to which is in dispute. If the defendant continues to resist and damages are awarded against him, he may keep the chattel and pay the damages, but, if he does, he becomes entitled, if he is a bailee, to set up the plaintiff's title to the goods, which he has thus paid for, against his own bailor. In other words, the court's judgment in the personal action against him would materially affect the existing right of his bailor in respect of the possession and disposal of the chattel. The result of a judgment in damages has thus some analogy to a sale by the court of a chattel which is in the possession or under the requisition of a foreign sovereign. If the sale cannot be ordered in the one case because to order it would be to use the court's process against the sovereign, then the judgment cannot be rendered in the other. It is for that reason that I am of opinion that the action must be stayed so far as it seeks to impose liability on the bank in respect of the fifty-one gold bars which it still retains. This reasoning does not apply to the thirteen bars which have been disposed of. This is an accidental feature of the case which can only be attributed to the bank's own error. But your Lordships must, I think, take the facts as you find them, and, so far as they are known to us, no reason appears why an action against the bank for damages for conversion of these thirteen bars should be regarded as trenching on the sovereign immunity of the governments which the commission represents. I agree, therefore, that, as to these thirteen bars, the action ought to be allowed to proceed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, there can be no question but that a foreign sovereign who is cited to appear in the courts of this country either directly, as where he is made a party, or indirectly, as in the case of a writ in rem against a ship, where in the absence of appearance a judgment in rem good against all the world will result, must take the earliest opportunity to challenge the jurisdiction by entering a conditional appearance and moving to set aside the writ. Where, however, as in the present case, a properly constituted action disclosing a cause of action against a defendant within the jurisdiction is launched, the foreign sovereign cannot be prejudiced by the defendant entering an appearance and defending the action. As soon, however, as it is made to appear to the court that by such action it is being asked to exercise its territorial jurisdiction over property in the possession or under the control of a foreign sovereign, the court will decline jurisdiction and stay the proceedings. Before this stage is reached, it will often be necessary for discovery to be had, and the present case is, in my opinion, one in which discovery was much to be desired. I mention this as the procedure adopted in this case should not, in my opinion, be regarded as a precedent to be followed in future cases of a like nature. Your Lordships, however, having been supplied with a copy of the bank account and certain further correspondence, are now fully seized of all the materials necessary to a proper decision on the present appeal.

My Lords, I agree that the relationship between the Bank of England and the three governments created by the correspondence and the delivery of the sixty-four gold bars was that of bailee and bailors, the bailment being for safe custody and immediately determinable at the will of the bailors. I further agree that as regards the fifty-one bars remaining in the hands of the bank this relationship still exists unaffected by the disposal of the thirteen bars which were sold or by any errors by the bank's subordinate officials in the manner in which the remaining bars were dealt with. The case—so far as the fifty-one bars are concerned—is accordingly restored to the position in which it was when it came before JENKINS, J., when it was assumed by both sides that the relationship was that of bailor and bailee. On this basis both SOMERVELL, L.J., and COHEN, L.J., would have reached the same conclusion as JENKINS, J.

There has, I think, been a tendency in argument on this appeal to approach LORD ATKIN's second proposition ([1938] 1 All E.R. 721) in the Cristina case (1), which was not necessary to the actual decision of that case, as if it was a statutory definition limiting the circumstances in which the courts of this country would refuse jurisdiction in cases where a foreign sovereign is not directly or indirectly impleaded. I think that LORD ATKIN's language must be considered and interpreted in the light of previous authorities and of the speeches of the other members of your Lordships' House in the Cristina case (1) and of LORD ATKIN himself ([1939] 1 All E.R. 722), in The Arantzazu Mendi (3). The principle being based on the avoidance of the exercise of a jurisdiction which would offend the dignity or impinge on the independence of a foreign sovereign, I cannot think it would be right to place on the word "possession" as used by LORD ATKIN ([1938] 1 All E.R. 721) any specially narrow or restricted meaning or to confine it to actual physical possession by the sovereign himself or his servants. The particular subject-matter involved in this case could hardly have been placed anywhere else than in a bank, save possibly in the vaults of an embassy. Such considerations as this, viewed in the light of the principle underlying the doctrine of immunity, lead me to the conclusion that in this context the word "possession" must include the right to immediate possession of chattels which have been in the actual physical possession of a foreign sovereign or his servants and are deposited for safe custody with a bailee in this country.

The part of the case which has given me most difficulty, but as to which none of the judges in the courts below appears to have felt any doubt, is that which relates to the precise form of relief for which the company is now asking, viz., damages only for detainue or conversion based on the failure to return the bars on demand. The company has now abandoned all claim to the return of the specific goods or for an injunction and is content to rely only on the claim for damages. It is said that this relief can be afforded to the company without in any way affecting the rights of the three governments to possession of the gold bars and that the doctrine of immunity was designed for the benefit of foreign sovereigns and not for the protection of persons resident within the jurisdiction who choose to enter into contractual relations with foreign governments. Sharing, as I do, the disinclination expressed by LORD MAUGHAM in the Cristina case (1) and by SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in the present case to extend the doctrine of immunity beyond the limits already recognised, this is an argument which has seemed to me to require anxious consideration. I have, however, been persuaded to the view that—attractive as this submission is—to accede to it would really be an infringement of the principle of immunity. A defendant who satisfies a judgment in damages representing the value of goods detained, or in damages for their conversion, acquires thereby such title to the goods as was vested in the plaintiff whose judgment has been satisfied. Such a judgment in the present case would, accordingly, require the bank to do that which would materially alter the rights of the three governments, vis-à-vis the bank, to the gold bars and enable the bank in its own right to do that which it otherwise could not have done, i.e., to contest its bailors' title. The fact that any such action by the bank in the present case might be highly improbable cannot affect the question of principle involved, and it seems to me that a judgment which would have this effect must be an infringement of the foreign sovereign's right to immediate possession of the bailed chattels and thus amount to a violation of the right to immunity.

As to the thirteen gold bars which the bank has sold, wholly different considerations apply. It is conceded that the doctrine of immunity would not extend to afford any protection to the purchasers of the bars. The bank by its own act has put an end to the bailment which alone afforded the protective umbrella of immunity. No case has, therefore, been made out for staying the company's action in so far as it is confined to a claim for damages for conversion of the thirteen bars sold by the bank since the issue of the writ—the bank being content to treat such sale as if it had occurred before action brought and not requiring the company to issue a fresh writ. For the reasons previously stated I would stay all further proceedings with regard to the remaining fifty-one bars. My Lords, save that I prefer to base myself on the three governments' right to immediate possession rather than on their control of the bars, I find myself in complete agreement with the reasoning of the judgment of JENKINS, J.

Appeal allowed in regard to the fifty-one bars still with the bank and dismissed in regard to the thirteen bars sold by the bank.

BURGESS v. JARVIS AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning, L.J.J., and Roxburgh, J.), February 11, 19, 1952.]

Town and Country Planning—Enforcement notice—Need to specify both date on which notice takes effect and period within which restoration must be carried out—Town and Country Planning Act, 1947 (c. 51), s. 23 (2) (3).

In 1936 the first defendant built a block of sixteen houses in contravention of existing planning control and let one of them to the plaintiff. In 1951 the planning authority served on the first defendant, on the plaintiff, and on the other occupiers of the houses an enforcement notice which was purported to be given under s. 23 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, as applied by s. 75 (1) of that Act, requiring the demolition of the houses and restoration of the land to its original condition "within five years after the date of the service of this notice." On a claim by the plaintiff against the first defendant and the local authority for a declaration that the enforcement notice was invalid and an injunction,

HELD: on the true construction of s. 23 (2) and (3), the enforcement notice should specify both the period (not less than twenty-eight days) at the expiration of which the notice took effect, and the period within which the particular steps for restoring the land had to be taken, and, as the latter period only had been specified, the notice was invalid.

FOR THE TOWN AND COUNTRY PLANNING ACT, 1947, s. 23 (2) (3), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 25, p. 525.

APPEAL by the first defendant from an order of PARKER, J., in chambers, made on Oct. 12, 1951, whereby he granted an injunction restraining the first defendant from demolishing a house, of which he was owner and the plaintiff was tenant, until an order under s. 289 of the Public Health Act, 1936, as applied to an enforcement notice under s. 23 (1) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, had been made.

In 1951 the local planning authority served on the first defendant an enforcement notice requiring him to demolish the house, which, with fifteen other houses, had been built in 1936 by the first defendant in contravention of planning control, and to restore the land to its former condition within five years of the service of the notice. On receipt of the notice the first defendant gave the plaintiff notice to quit, stating that he intended to demolish the house.

The Court of Appeal allowed the plaintiff to join the local authority as a defendant and to amend his writ so as to claim against both defendants that the enforcement notice was invalid on the ground that it did not specify any period of the expiration of which it should take effect as required by s. 23 (3) of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, and, alternatively, that the notice specified only one period as that at the expiration of which the notice should take effect and within which the notice should be complied with, which was contrary to the requirements of s. 23 (2) and (3) of that Act.

P. M. O'Connor for the first defendant.

MacKenna, Q.C., and King Anningson for the plaintiff.

Thesiger, Q.C., and H. J. Baxter for the local authority.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This appeal raises an important point, but, as I have come to a clear conclusion on it, no useful purpose will be served by not giving judgment now.

The plaintiff was the tenant and the first defendant was the landlord of one of a block of sixteen houses built by the first defendant in 1936. Those houses were erected in contravention of an interim development scheme. We are not concerned with the precise state of the law before the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, on the construction of which Act this appeal depends and which, by s. 75 (1), gave power to issue enforcement notices in respect of development before the Act in contravention of previous planning control provided that they were served within three years of the appointed day (July 1, 1948). Therefore, as is argued, the enforcement notices issued in this case were bad, it may be that that matter cannot now be put right.

On May 19, 1951, the Sevenoaks Rural District Council, who have been joined as defendants, served an enforcement notice under s. 23 (1) of the Act of 1947 on the first defendant and on the occupiers of these houses. The first defendant did not challenge that notice, nor did he exercise the right, though a limited right, of appeal which exists under the Act of 1947. Instead he served notices to terminate the tenancies, and notified all the tenants that he intended to demolish the houses at the end of July, 1951. The plaintiff then issued the writ in these proceedings claiming an injunction against the first defendant to restrain him from demolishing the house which the plaintiff was occupying under a weekly tenancy protected by the Rent Acts. The matter came before PARKER, J., in chambers who granted an injunction to restrain the first defendant from demolishing the house unless and until an order was made pursuant to s. 289 of the Public Health Act, 1936, as applied by regulations made under s. 24 (5) of the Act of 1947. When the case came on before us it was intimated on behalf of both the first defendant and the plaintiff that it was desired by the plaintiff to take a new point which had not been argued before the judge, and which, if successful, would decide the issue. That was that the enforcement notice served on the first defendant was invalid in that it did not contain the provisions and terms required by the Act of 1947. We were told that everyone desired the court to decide the point. This court does not, generally speaking, encourage points being taken here which have not been taken below, in particular when they involve the adding of a new party, in this case the Sevenoaks Rural District Council. We came to the conclusion, however, that, as this raised an important point on the construction of a statute and it was obviously of interest to everyone that a decision should be obtained on it so far as this case and other cases are concerned, we should adopt the procedure which we were asked to adopt.

By s. 75 (1) of the Act of 1947 the provisions of the Act with respect to enforcement notices are made applicable, subject to the limitation period to which I have referred, to breaches of planning legislation committed before the Act. Section 23 provides:

“(1) If it appears to the local planning authority that any development of land has been carried out after the appointed day without the grant of permission required in that behalf under this Part of this Act, or that any conditions subject to which such permission was granted in respect of any development have not been complied with, then, subject to any directions given by the Minister, the local planning authority may within four years of such development being carried out, if they consider it expedient so to do having regard to the provisions of the development plan and to any other material considerations, serve on the owner and occupier of the land a notice under this section. (2) Any notice served under this section (hereinafter called an 'enforcement notice') shall specify the development which is alleged to have been carried out without the grant of such permission as aforesaid or, as the case may be, the matters in respect of which it is alleged that any such conditions as aforesaid have not been complied with, and may require such steps as may be specified in the notice to be taken within such period as may be so specified for restoring the land to its condition before the development took place, or for securing compliance with the conditions, as the case may be; and in particular any such notice may, for the purpose aforesaid, require the demolition or alteration of any buildings or works, the discontinuance of any use of land, or the carrying out on land of any building or other operations. (3) Subject to the provisions of the next following sub-section, an enforcement notice shall take effect at the expiration of such period (not being less than twenty-eight days after the service thereof) as may be specified therein: Provided that—(a) if within the period aforesaid [the period to be specified under sub-s. (3)] an application is made to the local planning authority under this Part of this Act for permission for the retention on the land of any buildings or works, or for the continuance of any use of the land, to which the enforcement notice relates, the notice shall be of no effect pending the final determination of that application, and if such permission as aforesaid is granted on that application, the notice shall not take effect; (b) if within the period aforesaid an appeal is made to the court under the following provisions of this section by a person on whom the enforcement notice was served, the notice shall be of no effect pending the final determination or withdrawal of the appeal. (4) If any person on whom an enforcement notice is served under this section is aggrieved by the notice, he may, at any time within the period mentioned in the last foregoing sub-section, appeal against the notice to a court of summary jurisdiction for the petty sessional division or place within which the land to which the notice relates is situated; and on any such appeal the court (a) if satisfied [on certain matters] . . . shall quash the notice to which the appeal relates; (b) if not so satisfied, but satisfied that the requirements of the notice exceed what is necessary for restoring land to its condition before the development took place, or for securing compliance with the conditions, as the case may be, shall vary the notice accordingly; (c) in any other case shall dismiss the appeal: Provided that where the enforcement notice is varied or the appeal is dismissed, then, without prejudice to the provisions of para. (a) of the proviso to sub-s. (3) of this section, the court may, if they think fit, direct that the enforcement notice shall not come into force until such date (not being later than twenty-eight days from the determination of the appeal) as the court think fit."

Sub-section (5) provides for an appeal to quarter sessions. Section 24, which deals with sanctions, provides by sub-s. (1):

"If within the period specified in an enforcement notice, or within such extended period as the local planning authority may allow, any steps required by the notice to be taken (other than the discontinuance of any use of land) have not been taken, the local planning authority may enter on the land and take those steps and may recover . . . any expenses reasonably incurred by them on that behalf . . . ”

Section 24 (3) provides that where, by virtue of an enforcement notice, any use of land is required to be discontinued, any person who without permission uses the land or permits the land to be used in contravention of the notice is guilty of an offence.

In my opinion, the effect of s. 23 is that there are two periods, each of which has to be specified in the notice. The first in point of time, though it comes later in the section, is the period under s. 23 (3), that is, the period at the expiration of which the enforcement notice takes effect. The second, which arises under s. 23 (2), is the period, also to be specified, within which the specified steps for restoring the land, and so on, have to be taken. It is plain that the second of those periods does not start until the first has expired and the notice has taken effect. That seems to me the plain meaning of the words, and, if one considers them in their context, the reason for the first period is obvious. The first period is that during which the notice can be challenged, permission can be asked for, and any person aggrieved can appeal. The owner or occupier or both may want to appeal, and one, therefore, would expect a period for appeal during which the notice is ineffective. That period must be not less than twenty-eight days. It may be prolonged if there is an appeal under the provisions which I have read, and the date of taking effect is suspended. If the appeal is dismissed, the notice takes effect subject to a power in the proviso to s. 23 (4) enabling the court to say that it shall not come into force until a further date, not being later than twenty-eight days. It is unnecessary to consider for what precise purpose that proviso was inserted, because it does not, to my mind, affect the general construction.

That being, as I think, the general effect of these provisions, I turn to the notice. After recitals which are not disputed we come to the point on which the argument arises:

“ Now therefore the rural district council of Sevenoaks do hereby give you notice in pursuance of their powers as local planning authority under s. 23, s. 24 and s. 75 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, to:—Demolish the aforementioned sixteen houses and restore the land to its condition before the aforementioned operations took place within five years after the date of the service of this notice.”

It will be seen that only one period is specified. Counsel for the local authority submits that the Act does not require two periods to be mentioned; that the words “ take effect ” in s. 23 (3), when the section is looked at as a whole and read in conjunction with s. 24, mean the moment of time after which sanctions can be taken. He said that in the case of the present notice no offence is committed by anyone until after the expiration of five years, which, therefore, is the date when the notice takes effect, and that it is wrong to treat the taking effect as on the expiration of a preliminary period for the purpose of appeal. In that view it follows that, as he submits, an appeal could be brought, or remission sought, under sub-s. (3) at any time up to the end of the five years. Having given what I think is the natural meaning of these words, I will give other reasons why I find it impossible to accept that argument. One reason why the period within s. 23 (2) is different from the period within s. 23 (3) is that the period in sub-s. (3) is qualified by the words “ not being less than twenty-eight days ”. If there was only one period one would expect that qualification to appear in the earlier sub-section. If the period intended to be specified under sub-s. (3) was the same as the period to be specified under sub-s. (2), under ordinary drafting principles it would be referred to in sub-s. (3) by reference so as to make it clear that there was only one period to be specified. For another reason one would need very strong words to produce the result to which the argument of counsel for the local authority leads. It is obvious that the period of five years is the period within which the demolition is to take place. I agree there is no sanction unless there has been a failure to do it within that period. In a case where both an owner and an occupier are involved, one gets a most anomalous state of affairs if the right of appeal (say) by the occupier remains available right up to the end of the period within which the landlord is called on to demolish, because, on this construction, when the house was half demolished there would still be notionally a right of appeal.

For these reasons, in addition to what, after all, is the guide in these matters, namely, the meaning of the words in their ordinary significance, I think the submission of counsel for the local authority fails. The section requires two periods, and, in particular, it requires the period to be specified at the expiration of which the notice is to take effect. It is at the end of that period, which is an uncertain date because of the possibility of an appeal, that the period, conveniently referred to as the "period for compliance", should begin. As the notice given in the present case did not comply with the provisions of s. 23, as construed, I think it is invalid and inoperative.

For these reasons I think the order made by the learned judge must be varied, and the appeal allowed in the respect which I have indicated.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. In my opinion, s. 23 (3) of the Act of 1947 clearly imports that an enforcement notice must allow at least twenty-eight days after service before it takes effect. It must not be so framed as to take effect at once. The reason is so that the owner or occupier may be given time to apply to the planning authority for permission to retain the house or to appeal to the justices. If he makes his application or appeals within twenty-eight days, the notice does not take effect until the matter is determined. The question is whether the present notice satisfies the requirements of the Act. Counsel for the local authority argued that this notice only takes effect at the end of five years after service, viz., on May 19, 1956. I cannot take that view. The notice requires the owner to demolish sixteen houses "within five years after the date of service of this notice." A similar notice was served on each of the occupiers of the houses. Looking at the wording of the notice, it is clear that it took effect at some time before the expiration of five years, because the owner was required to act within that time. If the notice takes effect before the end of five years, when does it take effect? The only possible date is the date on which it is served, because, unless it took effect then, the owner would not have the benefit of the full five years allowed to him to do the work. The result is, therefore, that this notice took effect at once. It did not allow the occupier the minimum of twenty-eight days before it took effect. It ought to have specified from which date it took effect, and that period should be a minimum of twenty-eight days after service of the notice. It did not specify any period. It was, therefore, invalid.

ROXBURGH, J.: I agree that this enforcement notice is invalid, because it does not specify the date on which it is to take effect. Counsel for the local authority submitted that, if the notice specified a period within which the work required was to be done, then no further date need be specified, because the notice took effect at the moment of the expiry of the period within which the work was to be done. Such a conclusion seems to me impossible if the work required to be done is other than a metaphysical operation, with which this Act is not concerned.

Order varied.

GARRARD v. SOUTHEY & CO. AND ANOTHER. DAVEY ESTATES, LTD., Third Parties.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Parker, J.), February 18, 19, 20, 1952.]

Master and Servant—Duty of master—Provision of safe appliances—Servant “lent” by employers to occupiers of factory—Materials, tools and equipment provided by occupiers—Work controlled by factory foreman.

Electrical contractors agreed with the occupiers of a factory that two of their employees should work at the factory on certain electrical installations. The contractors continued to employ the men, paying their wages, stamping their insurance cards, and retaining the sole right to dismiss them. The electricians worked exclusively at the factory, used the canteen there, and conformed to the hours of work observed in the factory. They were supplied by the occupiers of the factory with all materials, tools, plant, and equipment, except for certain special tools which were their own property, and their work was supervised by a foreman employed by the occupiers, who required the men to follow practices customary at the factory instead of those of the contractors. One of the electricians was injured through a piece of defective plant.

HELD: the occupiers of the factory and not the electrical contractors owed the injured electrician the common law duty of a master to his servant to provide proper plant and equipment, and, therefore, were liable to him for breach of that duty.

- (2) Holt v. Rhodes (W.H.) & Son, Ltd., [1949] 1 All E.R. 478; 2nd Digest Supp.

ACTION for damages (against both defendants) for negligence and/or breach of their duty at common law to take reasonable care to provide proper plant and equipment for the plaintiff to work with, (against the first defendants) for breach of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and (against the second defendants) for breach of duty under the Factories Act, 1937. The first defendants brought in the second defendants as third parties, and the second defendants counterclaimed against the first defendants for an indemnity and brought in the third parties against whom also they claimed an indemnity.

Early in 1949 the second defendants took over a factory and workshop at Boreham Wood, Elstree, with the intention of converting it into an assembly shop. This entailed, inter alia, re-wiring the factory for electric light and power to bring electricity to the benches and plant which were to be installed. In March, 1949, Mr. Hamley, their plant engineer, being averse from employing temporary staff, approached Mr. Southey, a partner in Southey & Co., the first defendants, who carried on business as contractors installing electrical installations, with a view to obtaining two electricians and their mates to assist in the reconstruction. On Mar. 23, 1949, Mr. Southey gave Mr. Hamley a written quotation setting out the basis on which he would let the second defendants have the men, and on or about Mar. 27 Mr. Hamley by telephone accepted the terms, asked for the men as soon as possible, and promised a formal order in due course. There had been a similar arrangement between the parties in 1948. On Mar. 28 two of the first defendants' employees began work with the second defendants and early in April the plaintiff and his mate also began work. On Apr. 20 the second defendants issued a formal order to the first defendants and on Apr. 26 the first defendants accepted the order.

The plaintiff and the other electrician and their mates remained in the employment of the first defendants, who paid their wages, stamped their insurance cards, and had the sole right to dismiss them from the employment, but they worked exclusively at the second defendants' factory except on one or two occasions when Mr. Southey required them for an urgent job. They booked in (they did not "clock in") at the second defendants' office in the mornings and booked out in the evenings, used the canteen, fell into the ways of the second defendants' employees, and conformed to their hours of work. They were to be supplied by the second defendants with all the materials, tools, plant, and equipment they required, but they took certain of their own tools. They were put in charge of Mr. Forrester, the second defendants' head foreman of the maintenance department. Mr. Forrester was a highly skilled electrician who had under him electricians employed by the second defendants engaged on maintenance work in the other shops and about thirty other tradesmen including a carpenter and a gasfitter doing reconstruction work. The plaintiff and the other electrician from the first defendants were skilled electricians, but they had no experience in installing power in factory premises so Mr. Forrester supervised their work. He was not there all the time because he had to act as foreman in charge of other workmen, but he told them what to do, and went a long way in telling them how to do it and he kept a strict eye on them. He left them to do the lighting installation, a matter of tubing and wire, with standard fittings, but he told them how to carry out the power installation and what wire, switches, and fuses to use. He made them employ the second defendants' practice and method of wiring, in particular in joining cables in boxes instead of looping from one point to another which was the practice of the first defendants. On one occasion he required a fuse board to be fastened by bolts into the wall instead of being fixed by plugs. He checked over their work and made them re-do it if it did not conform to his ideas. A

On Apr. 20, 1949, at 9.30 a.m. the plaintiff took a pair of builder's trestles which he found in the middle of the factory premises and which, without his knowing it, belonged to the third parties, a firm of building contractors working at the factory, and used them to get some electric tubing and wire along a girder. In getting down he held on to the top rung of the trestle. The tenon of the rung had completely rotted away at one end and it came away in his hand and he fell backwards and was injured. The first defendants contended that the duty of a master to his servant to provide proper plant and equipment was owed to the plaintiff by the second defendants, while the second defendants contended that it was owed to him by the first defendants. PARKER, J., stated the facts, said that the first question to determine was who, at the time of the accident, was the master of the plaintiff and the person who would owe him the duty to provide proper plant and equipment, and continued: The question has arisen many times, usually where an employee who has been lent has negligently injured a third party. The question is, then: Who is liable for his negligence—the general employer or the person to whom he has been lent? In Mersey Docks & Harbour Board v. Coggins & Griffith (Liverpool), Ltd. (1) a crane and a driver had been lent and the driver in operating the crane had injured a third party. VISCOUNT SIMON said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 348): G

"It is not disputed that the burden of proof rests upon the general or permanent employer—in this case the board—to shift the prima facie responsibility for the negligence of servants engaged and paid by such H employer so that this burden in a particular case may come to rest on the hirer who for the time being has the advantage of the service rendered. And, in my opinion, this burden is a heavy one and can only be discharged in quite exceptional circumstances."

He lays down the test which he thinks should be applied in those circumstances, thus (ibid.):

"I would prefer to make the test turn on where the authority lies to direct, or to delegate to, the workman, the manner in which the vehicle is driven. It is this authority which determines who is the workman's superior."

LORD PORTER says (ibid., 351):

"Many factors have a bearing on the result. Who is paymaster, who can dismiss, how long the alternative service lasts, what machinery is employed—all these questions have to be kept in mind. The expressions used in any individual case must always be considered in regard to the subject-matter under discussion, but among the many tests suggested I think that the most satisfactory by which to ascertain who is the employer at any particular time is to ask who is entitled to tell the employee the way in which he is to do the work upon which he is engaged. If someone other than his general employer is authorised to do this he will, as a rule, be the person liable for the employee's negligence. But it is not enough that the task to be performed should be under his control, he must also control the method of performing it. It is true that in most cases no orders as to how a job should be done are given or required. The man is left to do his own work in his own way, but the ultimate question is not what specific orders, or whether any specific orders, were given, but who is entitled to give the orders as to how the work should be done. Where a man driving a mechanical device, such as a crane, is sent to perform a task, it is easier to infer that the general employer continues to control the method of performance since it is his crane and the driver remains responsible to him for its safe keeping."

LORD UTHWATT says (ibid., 354):

"To establish the degree of control requisite to fasten responsibility upon him [the hirer] the hirer must in some reasonable sense be shown to have authority to control the manner in which the workman does his work, the reason being that it is the manner in which a particular operation (assumed for this purpose to be in itself a proper operation) is carried out that determines its lawful or wrongful character. Unless there be that authority the workman is not serving the hirer, but merely serving the interests of the hirer, and service under the hirer in the sense I have stated is essential. Whether there is or is not such service in any particular case is a question of fact, the object being to ascertain the broad effect of the arrangement made."

A case in which the workman himself was injured was Holt v. W. H. Rhodes & Son, Ltd. (2). A crane and a workman were lent to stevedores for the discharge of a ship, and, while working for those stevedores, the workman was injured. In an action against both his general employers and the stevedores to whom he had been lent, he claimed that there had been a breach of the duty of master to servant to provide a safe system of working. That case is of little assistance because the county court judge did not make any findings with regard to the relationship between the plaintiff and the stevedores, but it does show that the Court of Appeal, who sent the case back for a new trial, thought that on the evidence there might possibly be a finding that at the material time the relationship of master and servant existed between the plaintiff and the stevedores.

I am not altogether convinced that the approach is necessarily the same in a case where a workman who has been lent has injured a third party as in a case where, as here, the workman has himself been injured. As LORD SIMONDS pointed out in the Mersey Docks & Harbour Board case (1) where, as in that case, a workman and a crane have been supplied, it is the duty of the general employers to provide a proper crane and a skilled driver, and, that being their duty, it would require exceptional circumstances to fix the responsibility for the accident caused by the unskilful act of the driver on to some other person. On the other hand, in a case like this it would be strange if the person to whom the employee was lent, who was himself the occupier of the factory and was himself providing all the tools and equipment and advising on the system of working, could, as it were, fix the responsibility for providing safe plant and equipment on the general employer, who would have no control over the workman. Again, it seems to me that a distinction is to be drawn between cases such as the Mersey Docks & Harbour Board case (1) where a complicated piece of machinery and a driver are lent, and cases where labour only, and labour not necessarily of a highly skilled character, is lent. In the former case it is easy to infer that the general employer does not intend to permit the hirer to have control over his valuable bit of machinery in the sense of being able to tell the workman how to work it. On the other hand, when it is a matter of not very highly skilled labour, it seems to me much more easy to infer that the hirer should have control not merely in the sense of being able to tell the workman what he wants doing, but also of deciding the manner of doing it. However that may be, applying the strict test laid down in the Mersey Docks & Harbour Board case (1) and recognising the heavy burden, referred to in that case, which rests on the general employer to shift the responsibility to the particular employer, it seems to me that what Mr. Forrester did went far beyond a matter of general control. He was entitled to tell, and did tell, the plaintiff how to do the work.

I should have added that it was argued on behalf of the second defendants that the conclusive test in these cases was who had the power to dismiss, which, undoubtedly, in this case remained solely in the first defendants, but, as I read the cases, it is nowhere suggested that that is the conclusive test or sole test. All the matters referred to by LORD PORTER in the Mersey Docks & Harbour Board case (1) have to be taken into consideration.

HIS LORDSHIP held that the second defendants were in breach of the duty which they owed to the plaintiff as a master to his servant, but not in breach of any duty under the Factories Act, 1937, because on the evidence no persons were employed on manual labour on any of the manufactures and processes the carrying on of which, by s. 151 (1), would have made the premises a factory. He assessed the damages at £682 12s. 6d. and gave judgment for the plaintiff against the second defendants for that sum. He held that the first defendants were not liable to the plaintiff for breach of any duty owed by a master to his servant, and that, assuming that electrical installation came within the operations to which the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), applied, the first defendants were not undertaking such an operation. He, therefore, dismissed the plaintiff's action against the first defendants. He also dismissed the first defendants' claim against the second defendants. He held further that the second defendants were not entitled to any indemnity in respect of their liability to the plaintiff from the first defendants or from the third parties by virtue of conditions in their agreements and dismissed the second defendants' counterclaim and third party proceedings.

Judgment accordingly.

BURNELL v. DOWNHAM MARKET URBAN DISTRICT COUNCIL.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), January 17, 18, 21, February 22, 1952.]

Rates—Rateable occupation—Playing field vested in local authority—Acquisition by deed—Trust for perpetual use by public—Restriction on user by public ancillary to management—Cricket and football pitches and tennis courts let to clubs—Temporary exclusion of public.

A A playing field was purchased by moneys provided by public subscription and a grant from the Ministry of Education and was conveyed to the local authority by deed on trust "for the perpetual use thereof by the public for the purposes of exercise and recreation pursuant to the provisions of the Open Spaces Act, 1906." The conveyance was recorded by the Charity Commissioners under the Settled Land Act, 1925, s. 29 (4). The field, which was managed by the authority, consisted of football and cricket pitches, tennis courts and a garden of remembrance. In consideration of a yearly rent a federation of football and cricket clubs was granted permission to use the pitches for organised matches. Access was open to the public at all times, subject to the closing of the entrance during the first part of football matches for about forty hours per year. The tennis courts were available to the public at a charge, during the season, until 6 p.m., after which hour they were let by the season to clubs the members of which had exclusive use of them. The cost of the upkeep exceeded the total receipts, the excess being paid out of rates. On the question whether the local authority were liable for rates in respect of their occupation of the field,

D HELD: (i) the powers of disposal of land given to local authorities by s. 29 of the Settled Land Act, 1925, and s. 42 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947, were exercisable as trustees and could, therefore, only be exercised, if at all, in conformity with the trusts on which the local authority held the land, and, accordingly, the local authority could not be regarded as otherwise than bound for the foreseeable future to hold the field on the trusts declared in respect of it in the conveyance.

E (ii) although the trusts were imposed by deed they were, in effect, statutory trusts inasmuch as the conveyance, by virtue of s. 10 of the Open Spaces Act, 1906, operated to impose on the land the statutory obligations specified therein, and, having regard to these restrictions, the real occupiers were the public for whom the local authority were merely custodians or trustees.

Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council ([1897] A.C. 625), applied.

G (iii) the question whether there was free and unrestricted use by the public was one of degree, and, therefore, a matter of fact to be determined and, in the absence of some misdirection, conclusively determined, by the Lands Tribunal; on the facts the tribunal was entitled to hold that such limited exclusion of the public as the council's arrangement with the clubs involved was properly ancillary to their management of the field as an open space within the meaning of the Open Spaces Act, 1906; and, therefore, the council were not in such occupation of the field as rendered them rateable in respect of it.

CASE STATED by Lands Tribunal.

The respondent council owned a hereditament comprising a playing field at Downham Market, Norfolk, which was assessed at £10 gross value, and £9 rateable value. On Feb. 25, 1951, a local valuation court of the West Norfolk (No. 2) Local Valuation Panel directed that the assessment should be deleted from the list, holding that the hereditament was not rateable because there was no rateable occupation by the council. The valuation officer appealed to the Lands Tribunal which, on Aug. 28, 1951, dismissed the appeal. The valuation officer appealed. C

Sir Arthur Comyns Carr, Q.C., Maurice Lyell and P. R. E. Browne for the valuation officer. D

Rowe, Q.C., and D. G. A. Lowe for the respondent council.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22. SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., read the following judgment of the court. By a conveyance dated Dec. 31, 1946, and expressed to be made between Radio Garage Co., Ltd., of the one part, and the urban district council of Downham Market (hereafter referred to as "the council"), of the other part, after reciting that the council was desirous of buying the premises expressed to be thereby conveyed to hold the same in trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation pursuant to the provisions of the Open Spaces Act, 1906, or some or one of them, there was conveyed to the council in fee simple the piece of land, rather more than seven acres in extent, called "the cricket field", which is the subject of the present appeal. By cl. 3 of the conveyance the council declared that they "will hold the premises hereby conveyed on the trusts following, that is to say, on trust for the perpetual use thereof by the public for the purposes of exercise and recreation pursuant to the provisions of the Open Spaces Act, 1906." The question is whether the council ought properly to be rated in respect of this field on the ground that they are in beneficial occupation of it, or, at least, are in occupation of it for rating purposes. E

The Lands Tribunal answered the question negatively. As appears from the Case Stated, the tribunal found that the land in question was acquired at the end of the 1939-45 war as a war memorial. The decision to acquire it was made at a public meeting at which it was proposed that a suitable form of memorial would be a recreation ground for the use of the public, part of which would be laid out as a garden of remembrance. Subscriptions were called for, and, with the aid of a grant from the Ministry of Education, the sum of £6,000 was raised. This sum of money was spent on buying the land, laying it out, and equipping it as a playing field. The findings of the tribunal also recited that it was decided that the playing field should be owned and managed by the council and that the F land was conveyed by the then owners to the council by the conveyance already mentioned, such conveyance being in fact recorded in the books of the Charity Commissioners for England and Wales pursuant to the provisions of the Settled Land Act, 1925. According to further findings, the way in which the field is laid out and used is as follows. At the western side there is a football pitch. During the winter season the pitch is roped off, becoming, in the summer, part of the cricket out-field. There is a cricket table of special turf, roped off except when used. There is a separate concrete practice wicket, and, in the north-eastern corner, a wooden pavilion thirty-six feet by seventeen feet. Near thereto is a gravel car park which can be used free of charge by persons using the playing field. In the northern part of the field are two hard tennis courts wired off, and there is also a putting green, which, however, is falling into disuse. Finally, at the southern end of the field, separated by an evergreen fence, is the garden of remembrance, less than half an acre in extent, where members of the public can sit quietly. As regards management, the tennis courts are let by the season to nine clubs, each having the exclusive use of a court for so many hours after 6 p.m. during the season. At all other times the courts are available to the public at a rate of 2s. 6d. per hour for each court. On Feb. 6, 1951, the council also made an agreement with a body known as the Federation of Downham Town Football and Cricket Clubs, and this agreement has, naturally and properly, assumed considerable importance during the present case. By the agreement the council granted to the federation permission to use the cricket and football pitches and the dressing rooms in the pavilion for the purpose of organised matches according to a fixture list submitted to and approved by the council during a term of two and a half years from Feb. 1, 1951, the federation paying for such privilege a sum of £85 per annum. The agreement contained the following clause:

“The federation may close the entrance to the field on such dates as are set out in the list of fixtures for the purpose of making a charge for admission to the field and may also make collections on the field on these dates, the closing of the entrance to be subject, however, to granting rights of access to users of the tennis courts, putting green and any other amenities provided by the council on the field.”

The practical effect of this clause is found to be as follows in the Case:

“Access is open to the public at all times subject to the exercise by the federation of the rights contained in para. 3 of the agreement of Feb. 6, 1951. In practice, the entrance is closed during the first half of football matches, but not during cricket matches. The closure lasts for about an hour and a quarter for each football match, a total of about forty hours in any year.”

It is finally found in the Case that a groundsman is permanently employed by the council and paid by the council, that the expenditure on the field for the year ended Mar. 31, 1950, amounted to £427 17s. 6d. (including the groundsman's wages) and that the income for the same year amounted to £189 18s. 6d., the excess being paid out of the rates, but that the intention is to restrict the amount of the excess to what can be covered by a rate of 4d. or 5d. in the £. On these facts the conclusion of the tribunal was that “the council in the circumstances of the present ownership and use of the land was not in beneficial occupation of the land and was not liable to any rate.”

The question for determination may be briefly and conveniently stated by reference to the decision of the House of Lords in the well-known Brockwell Park case, Lambeth Overseers v. London County Council (1). In that case the park in question had been acquired by the respondent council pursuant to powers in a local Act which laid on them the duty, after acquisition, to hold the park and every part thereof as a park for the perpetual use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation. The House of Lords held that the respondent council was not rateable in respect of it. At the beginning of his opinion LORD HALSBURY, L.C., said ([1897] A.C. 629):

"I do not think there is here a rateable occupation by anybody. The 'public' is not a rateable occupier . . ."

He had already referred to the private Act of the London County Council (ibid., 629)

" . . . which cast upon them the perpetual obligation to maintain and preserve it [the park] when purchased, as a park for the perpetual use of the public for exercise and recreation."

At the end of his speech LORD HALSBURY, L.C., summed the matter up in these words (ibid., 630):

"Once it has been found, as in this case, that the occupation cannot as a matter of law be a beneficial occupation, there is an end of the question. I say as a matter of law, because that it does not give a beneficial occupation as matter of fact is nothing to the purpose. Here there is no possibility of beneficial occupation to the county council; they are incapable by law of using it for any profitable purpose; they must allow the public the free and unrestricted use of it."

LORD HERSCHELL's opinion was to the same effect (ibid., 632):

" . . . I am not satisfied that the county council are occupiers of this park for rating purposes, though the legal possession is, no doubt, vested in them. They seem to me to be merely custodians or trustees to hold it and manage it for the use of the public."

The question before this court is whether on its facts the present case falls within the principle of the Brockwell Park case (1), and, in particular, the statement of that principle which we have quoted from the speeches of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD HERSCHELL. We have not so far referred to the terms of the Open Spaces Act, 1906, pursuant to the provisions of which, as will be recalled, the council declared themselves trustees of the field for its perpetual use by the public for the purpose of exercise and recreation. The relevant sections are those numbered 7, 9, 10 and 15, together with the definition of "open space" in s. 20. Section 7 contains a power for corporations and other persons to convey to any local authority any land for the purpose of the same being preserved as an open space for the enjoyment of the public under the Act. Section 9 contains corresponding power for local authorities to acquire open spaces, and to undertake the care, management and control thereof. By s. 10 it is provided that a local authority who have acquired any estate or interest in an open space shall hold and administer the open space in trust to allow, and with a view to, the enjoyment thereof by the public as an open space within the meaning of the Act and under proper control and regulation and for no other purpose, and shall also maintain and keep the open space in a good and decent state. By s. 15 a local authority may, with reference to any open space, make bye-laws for the regulation thereof and of the days and times of admission thereto and for the preservation of order and prevention of nuisances therein. Finally, by s. 20, the expression "open space" is defined to mean any land

"whether inclosed or not, on which there are no buildings or of which not more than one-twentieth part is covered with buildings, and the whole or the remainder of which is laid out as a garden or is used for purposes of recreation, or lies waste and unoccupied."

Before stating our conclusion on the main argument presented to us (which involves some consideration of the scope and effect of the Brockwell Park case (1) and which, as we think, turns very largely on the effect of the manner in which the field is in fact used and managed by the council) it is convenient first to deal with two other grounds on which, according to counsel for the valuation officer, the present case is distinguishable from that of the Brockwell Park case (1). The first turns on the use by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., of the word "perpetual". In the Brockwell Park case (1) the London County Council was enjoined by the relevant local Act to hold such land and every part thereof as a park and preserve the same for the "perpetual" use thereof by the public for exercise and recreation. It does not appear that there was any power under the local Act or otherwise for the London County Council in any circumstances to dispose of the park or otherwise change its use, and there is no doubt that LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in his speech expressly referred to and relied on this obligation of permanence. We find it, however, impossible to think that LORD HALSBURY, L.C., intended to lay it down that this characteristic of permanence, as an obligation for all eternity, was essential to the conclusion that the London County Council was not rateable in respect of the park. As appears in subsequent cases, it has always been recognised that any statutory power or duty is liable to be altered by Parliament itself by some later Act, general or special. So much, of course, counsel for the valuation officer conceded. He contended, nevertheless, that the general powers of disposition conferred on local authorities by modern statutes in respect of all land held by them is something altogether different in kind from the possibility of change by future legislation and have, as it were, swept away any characteristic of permanence in cases otherwise comparable with the Brockwell Park case (1) whatever may have been the sense in which LORD HALSBURY, L.C., used the word "perpetual". Though he referred to s. 163, s. 164 and s. 165 of the Local Government Act, 1933, counsel did not rely on that statute. He did, however, rely on the tenant for life's powers of sale and other disposition under the Settled Land Act, 1925, vested in local authorities by virtue of s. 29 of that Act, and he relied more particularly on the wide terms of s. 42 of the Town and Country Planning Act, 1947. Having regard, however, to the general tenor and purpose of the Town and Country Planning Act and to the safeguards introduced by s. 42 (2) of that Act, the general powers in that Act cannot, in our judgment, fairly be regarded for present purposes as doing more than applying the modern method of bringing about changes in the use of land vested in local authorities and dedicated in their hands to purposes of the kind here in question in substitution for the older method of special amending legislation. Nor can the Settled Land Act powers be regarded, in our judgment, for present purposes as doing more than providing appropriate conveyancing machinery if and when a local authority, in the proper exercise of its duties, comes to dispose of its land. For, in any case, such powers are powers to be exercised as trustees and can, therefore, only be exercised, if at all, in conformity with the trusts upon which the local authority may hold the relevant land. Notwithstanding these modern statutory powers, therefore, we feel no doubt that the council cannot now be regarded as otherwise than bound for the foreseeable future to continue to hold this field on the trusts declared in respect of it under the deed of 1946. Certainly we think there is no ground on which it can be said (as was said by LORD HEWART, C.J., in London Playing Fields Society v. Essex (S.W. Area) Assessment Committee (2)) that the present trusts and uses affecting the field might be merely transitory.

The second point is of the same character, and rests on the fact that in the present case the trusts declared, albeit by reference to the Open Spaces Act, 1906, are declared and established only in, and by the terms of, a voluntary deed. Counsel for the valuation officer did not suggest that any distinction could be drawn between a case where a public body acquired or held land for public uses pursuant to a statutory duty so to do and a case in which such a body held land similarly under a mere statutory power. He contended, however, that the principle of the Brockwell Park case (1) has never been, and should not now be, extended to a case where, as here, the trusts arose out of, and only out of, the deed of the parties to it, and in support of this proposition he relied on London Playing Fields Society v. Essex (S.W. Area) Assessment Committee (2) and Carnegie Dunfermline Trustees v. Dunfermline Assessor (3). The present case is, we think, entirely different from London Playing Fields Society v. Essex (S.W. Area) Assessment Committee (2) where the obligations of the society as to the user of the land rested only on its covenant with the other parties to the deed which those other parties could at any time release. In the present case the council declared themselves trustees in perpetuity, and they could not by any means, otherwise than by a statute or by the exercise of statutory power, be effectively released from their obligations under the trust, either by the other party to the deed of conveyance or by other person or combination of persons. It is true that in Carnegie Dunfermline Trustees v. Dunfermline Assessor (3) a comparable trust created by deed as distinct from statute was held on this ground not to exclude liability to assessment. We are by no means satisfied that this Scottish decision should be followed in England, as we have difficulty in appreciating why the reasoning in the Brockwell Park case (1) should not be equally applicable to the trustees of land held for like purposes under a valid charitable trust irrevocably created by deed. We find it unnecessary, however, to express any concluded opinion as to the validity or scope of the distinction sought to be drawn by counsel for the valuation officer, for it is, in our view, plain that the trusts here in question are in effect statutory trusts, inasmuch as the conveyance in the present case operated by virtue of s. 10 of the Open Spaces Act, 1906, to impose on the land the statutory obligations prescribed by that Act to which we have already referred—in short, the duty of allowing it to be used by the public for the purposes of recreation.

We turn, then, to the main question in the case. As appears from the passages from the opinions of LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD HERSHELL which we have quoted, the basis of the decision of the House of Lords in the Brockwell Park case (1) was clearly, in our judgment, that, having regard to the restriction imposed on the land by the special Act and to the facts of the case, the real occupiers were the public and the sole interest of the London County Council was as “custodians or trustees” for the public. We have already stated our view that the present case is not distinguishable from the Brockwell Park case (1) on the ground of any impermanence in the uses and trusts now affecting the playing field in question. Nor, in our opinion, are the restrictions imposed by the Open Spaces Act, 1906, materially different from those imposed by the special Act in the Brockwell Park case (1) and there held to have the effect of excluding the London County Council from rateable occupation. If, therefore, the matter is judged solely by reference to the terms and legal effect of the statutory restrictions, this case is in effect concluded in favour of the council by the Brockwell Park case (1).

It remains, however, to consider whether the facts regarding the actual user of the land in the present case involve such a departure from the obligation succinctly described by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in the phrase “they must allow the public the free and unrestricted use of it” as to justify the conclusion that, whatever their legal obligations in the matter may be, the council have in fact assumed the character of rateable occupiers of the land in question. It is not suggested that “free and unrestricted use” by the public means that the public, that is, any member of the community who chooses so to do, must be free to go on the land at any time of the day or night. A right for a local authority, or for any other body charged with the duty of holding and managing an open space or park for the public use, to close such a place at night, for example, must clearly be ancillary to, if not, indeed, essential for, good regulation. The terms of the Open Spaces Act, 1906, themselves indicate that a right of closure as such is not inconsistent with dedication for public recreation. In the Brockwell park case (1) itself there were certain portions of the land from which the public was necessarily excluded—those portions occupied by a keeper's lodge, the bandstand, and a refreshment building. These exclusions are the manifestations of the duty and exercise of management, and their total area compared with that of the whole park was negligible. In the later case of Liverpool Corpn. v. West Derby Assessment Committee (4), a similar question of rateability arose as regards the plaintiff corporation's occupation of a park of eighty-nine acres. By their local Act and bye-laws made thereunder the corporation were empowered to close the park for not more than seven days in any year, and, on these occasions, to make charges for admission. The power had, in fact, been exercised from time to time, though rarely, for the purpose of fetes in aid of a local hospital. On these occasions the corporation did not themselves make any charge for admission, but the persons who were permitted to use the park did so. It was argued that these facts distinguished Liverpool Corpn. v. West Derby Assessment Committee (4) from the Brockwell Park case (1), but this court found no difficulty in concluding that the Liverpool Corporation's power of exclusion and its exercise were merely ancillary to the dedication of the land as a public park: see per FLETCHER MOULTON, L.J. ([1908] 2 K.B. 667).

In the present case it is said that, whatever be in strictness the trusts and duties imposed on the council, they are, in fact, so managing the field that the public is to a substantial extent excluded from its use for the purposes of recreation. If he may, perhaps, have deliberately over-stated it, yet counsel for the valuation officer put his case effectively and not unfairly when he said that the council was using the field to all intents and purposes for the benefit of a number of athletic clubs. And if that summary of the situation is justified, then, according to the argument, the case falls outside the scope of the Brockwell Park decision (1) and becomes analogous to the London Playing Fields Society v. Essex (S.W. Area) Assessment Committee (2), and to North Riding of Yorkshire County Valuation Committee v. Redcar Corpn. (5), where it was held that a local authority, who owned a considerable area near the foreshore and used and managed it substantially as an amusement park, were rateable in respect of their occupation of it.

It cannot, we think, be denied that the incidents of the council's management of the field in question involve a somewhat greater degree of exclusion of its free and unrestricted use by the public than was the case of the park occupied by the corporation in Liverpool Corpn. v. West Derby Assessment Committee (4). Still, in our judgment, the question is one of degree and, therefore, a matter of fact to be determined, and, in the absence of some misdirection, conclusively determined, by the Lands Tribunal. We accept the submission of counsel for the council that in modern times provision for some form of organised athletics, the spectacle of which may be enjoyed by the public, is not inconsistent with a duty to provide for recreation by the public, and in the present case the sum total of the extent to which members of the public are excluded from free entry into the field forms a minute fraction of the total hours of daytime throughout the year. As we have already stated, we do not think the use by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., of the words "free and unrestricted use" involve the proposition that any member of the public can at all times, when the field or open space is not wholly closed in accordance with proper regulation and good management, gain access to the field at his will without payment. Put another way, we think that the tribunal was entitled on the facts of this case to conclude that such limited exclusion as the council's arrangements with the cricket and football clubs and the tennis clubs involved is properly ancillary to their management of the field as an open space within the meaning of the Open Spaces Act, 1906. We will assume in favour of the valuation officer that the matter should be decided by reference to the user in fact rather than by reference to the trusts imposed on the council, but we think that the same conclusion results. We add, however, that, in our judgment, the arrangements which the council have made do not involve any departure from strict compliance with the trusts to which they are subject.

There remains one further question. In the course of their speeches in the Brockwell Park case (1) both LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD HERSCHELL undoubtedly expressed themselves as basing their conclusions not only on their view that the London County Council were mere trustees and custodians for the public, but also (applying a recognised test for rateability) on the fact that, having regard to the statutory restrictions attaching to that park, no tenant would in any circumstances give anything at all for the privilege of an occupation which could not provide the capacity to earn more than the rent which such a tenant would be called on to pay. In the present case it was argued alternatively on behalf of the council that, even though the council could not be regarded as mere custodians for the public, still, in the circumstances, no tenant could ever be found to pay a penny piece for the privilege of a tenancy of the field in question, and, accordingly, that its rateable value must be nil. This argument is but an expansion of the forceful phrase of BOWEN, L.J., in an earlier case—West Bromwich School Board v. West Bromwich Overseers (6) (13 Q.B.D. 943)—“struck with sterility”. For our part, we agree with the view expressed by DARLING, J., in Liverpool Corpn. v. West Derby Assessment Committee (4), that, however attractive and apposite such language may have been on the occasion that it was used, it is somewhat dangerous to rely on it, at least without a careful consideration of its true significance. In the Brockwell Park case (1), having regard to the terms of the relevant statute, we think that LORD HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD HERSCHELL, in referring to the fact that no tenant would pay anything for the right of occupying the land, were really expressing in a different way the same point involved in their conclusion that, in truth, the public were the occupiers, for the absolute duty to use and manage the park for the “free and unrestricted use of the public” attached in whatever hands the estate or interest in the land was vested. If, however, it is once conceded in the present case that the council are not mere trustees or custodians for the public, and once it is also conceded that they are not bound to hold and manage the field for the purposes of recreation by the public, it seems to follow that the restrictions affecting the land must be regarded as so qualified that we are not for ourselves satisfied that it could be fairly said “no one would pay a penny piece for the privilege of becoming its tenant”. It must now be taken as well settled to be no answer to a claim to rateability that land is held on such terms that its owner cannot in fact derive any pecuniary benefit thereout. We prefer, therefore, to express no view on this branch of the council’s argument, but to rest our conclusion on the view we have earlier expressed, namely, that on the facts of the present case the tribunal was entitled to conclude, as it did, that the council were mere trustees or custodians for the public, and, accordingly, that the real occupiers for present purposes are the public themselves.

Appeal dismissed.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), February 27, 1952.]

Will—Joint tenancy or tenancy in common—Gift of specified property to testator's two sons "on condition that they agree to pay in equal shares" to testator's widow "for the remainder of her life . . . 10s. per week."

By a home-made will, made on Mar. 31, 1936, the testator gave to his two sons, W.L.N. and J.H.N., certain specified property " (or if sold during my lifetime such balance of the proceeds of such sale as is in my possession at the date of my death) . . . on condition that they agree to pay in equal shares to my wife . . . for the remainder of her life after my decease the sum of 10s. per week." The testator died on May 21, 1937, being survived by his wife and two sons. On Jan. 1, 1951, J.H.N. died, and the question arose whether the gift to the sons created a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common.

HELD: as the effect of the condition attached to the gift was to create a personal obligation on each of the sons, the language of the condition was sufficient to indicate that the interest of the two sons in the property was a tenancy in common, and not a joint tenancy.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine the nature of the beneficial interests of the testator's two sons in specified property given to them on condition that they agreed to pay in equal shares a certain sum to the testator's widow each week for the remainder of her life.

By his will, made on Mar. 31, 1936, the testator appointed his two sons, William Leonard North and John Henry North, executors thereof, and, subject to the payment of his debts and funeral expenses, he gave the specified property to them on the condition above stated and the residue of his estate to his wife. The testator died on May 21, 1937, leaving his wife and two sons surviving him. John Henry North died on Jan. 1, 1951, and the question arose whether William Leonard North held the legal estate of the property in question on trust as to one moiety for the personal representative of John Henry North.

Bathurst for the plaintiff, William Leonard North.

J. A. Brightman for the defendant, the personal representative of John Henry North.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: The question which I have to decide arises on a home-made will, the relevant part of which is contained in the bequest by the testator to his two sons, William Leonard North and John Henry North, of two properties, which are specified,

" . . . (or if sold during my lifetime such balance of the proceeds of such sale as is in my possession at the date of my death) in each case subject to any mortgage that may be charged on such property at the date of my death . . . "

If the matter stopped there, no doubt, it would be very difficult to come to any other conclusion than that on its true construction that provision in the will created joint tenancies in favour of the two sons, because up to that point it is difficult to discover any context which could produce the result that, as opposed to joint tenancies, there was a tenancy in common. The will goes on in these words:

" . . . on condition that they agree to pay in equal shares to my wife Mary Emily North for the remainder of her life after my decease the sum of 10s. per week."

The debate has turned on the question whether the language of that condition is sufficient to provide the necessary context to conclude that the interest of the sons is a tenancy in common instead of a joint tenancy. In Robertson v. Fraser (1) LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., said (6 Ch. App. 699):

" I cannot doubt, having regard to the authorities respecting the effect of such words as ' amongst ' and ' respectively ', that anything which in the slightest degree indicates an intention to divide the property must be held to abrogate the idea of a joint tenancy, and to create a tenancy in common. Perhaps it would have been well if the courts had held that in bequests, as in partnerships, every community of interest was to be considered a tenancy in common."

Having regard to the context in which those words were used in that judgment, in my view, LORD HATHERLEY, L.C., was intending his remarks to be of general application, and they were designed to do no more than to state what he regarded as an existing well-established general rule.

The question then arises: Do these words " on condition that they agree to pay in equal shares to my wife " constitute a sufficient pointer to the conclusion that the gift creates a tenancy in common ? It being conceded that their effect is to create a personal obligation on each of the sons, counsel for the defendant pointed out that, if any other conclusion were arrived at than that the interest of the sons in the property was a tenancy in common, the odd result would arise that on the death of one of them—and it is the death of John Henry North that has raised this question—the interest in the property would be vested solely in the survivor, whereas the estate of the deceased would be or might continue to be liable to make one half of the weekly payment to the widow. That appears to me to be a result which enables me to say that on the true construction of this will the interest of the two sons in the property in question was a tenancy in common and not a joint tenancy.

As counsel for the defendant rightly remarked, it is very seldom that, in a case involving the construction of a will, authorities are of any direct help apart from the expression of some general principle, but it so happens that his researches have led to his citing to me Kew v. Rouse (2), decided in 1685, in which the facts are almost on all fours with the facts in this case. The report is as follows (1 Vern. 353):

" The plaintiff's wife, whose administrator he is, and the defendant's wife were the two daughters of Elizabeth Wise, who being possessed of a term for years, in April, 1679, devised that term and all her interest therein unto her two daughters, they paying yearly to her son £25 by quarterly payments, viz., each of them £12 10s. yearly out of the rents of the premises during his life, if the term so long continued. The plaintiff's wife being dead, the defendant claims the whole by survivorship; and whether it was a joint tenancy or a tenancy in common was the question. The Lord Chancellor conceived it clearly to be a tenancy in common; for that £25 per annum was to be paid by the two daughters equally in moieties; and decreed an account of the moiety of the profits to the plaintiff, as administrator to his wife."

The only possible suggested ground of distinction was that in the devise the direction to pay was to pay out of the rents of the premises, but that does not appear to me to form a sufficient ground for any attempted distinction between that case and the case now before me because in both cases the obligation was a personal obligation on each of the devisees. Indeed, from the very short report of the ground on which the Lord Chancellor based his decree it would not appear that he necessarily rested any weight on the circumstance that the £25 was to come out of the yearly rents. The language of the report is "for that £25 per annum was to be paid by the two daughters equally in moieties". If, therefore, any authority were required to support the conclusion to which I arrive as a matter of construction and plain common sense, it is to be provided by that case. Therefore, I propose to answer the question in the sense that on the true construction of the will the interest of the two sons was a tenancy in common, not a joint tenancy.

Justices—Husband and wife—Maintenance—Discharge of order—Adultery—Sexual intercourse by former wife after dissolution of marriage—No evidence that alleged intercourse occurred with married man—Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895 (c. 39), s. 7.

On Mar. 28, 1947, the wife was granted by justices a maintenance order against her then husband. On Jan. 9, 1950, the marriage was dissolved, but the maintenance order was allowed to stand. On Dec. 7, 1951, the husband applied to the justices to discharge the order on the ground of his former wife's adultery with a named man, but he adduced no evidence that this man was married at the time of the alleged adultery.

HELD: unless it were proved that the man with whom the former wife was alleged to have committed adultery was married at the material time, any sexual intercourse which might have occurred between them could not constitute an act of adultery, and, therefore, the maintenance order would continue in the former wife's favour.

APPEAL by the husband against the dismissal on Dec. 7, 1951, by the Stoke-on-Trent justices of his application to discharge an order for maintenance made in favour of his wife on Mar. 28, 1947.

M. E. Holdsworth for the husband.

Fife for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a husband's appeal from the dismissal by the justices for Stoke-on-Trent on Dec. 7, 1951, of his application to discharge a maintenance order in favour of the wife made on Mar. 28, 1947, on the ground of his desertion. The marriage between the spouses was dissolved by decree absolute on Jan. 9, 1950, on the ground of the husband's adultery, there being no prayer for the exercise of the discretion on the part of the wife. Notwithstanding the decree absolute, the maintenance order has been allowed to stand by virtue of the decision in Bragg v. Bragg (1), which settled that the mere fact that a marriage has been dissolved does not automatically discharge a subsisting order.

The present application was based on an allegation that the wife had committed adultery with a named man. The justices ruled, in effect, that, though there had been opportunity, there was no evidence of guilty affection, and they dismissed the application. It now appears, however, that there was a more fundamental reason for the dismissal of the application, namely, that there was no evidence that at the material time the man in question was married. In other words, the case was put on the ground that because the wife had been a wife, because a wife can commit adultery, and because an order in favour of a former wife can be kept alive under the authority of Bragg v. Bragg (1), it follows as a matter of law that a former wife, as if she were a wife, can commit adultery even with a single man. In the recent case of Abson v. Abson (2) it was proved that the paramour was a married man and it was sought to argue that because a wife had been divorced she could not commit adultery, even if she was having sexual relations with a married man. We took the view that, whether or not that argument was acceded to, the wife should be left to whatever rights she had in the Divorce Court.

I am not prepared to accede to the view that a husband can establish adultery against his former wife by proof that she has had sexual intercourse with a man without proving that that man was married at the material time. For that reason we have not thought it necessary to consider the weight of the evidence which was adduced to show that sexual intercourse took place between these persons. This appeal, therefore, fails and must be dismissed.

KARMINSKI, J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

TYMANS, LTD. v. CRAVEN.

[[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), February 13, 14, 22, 1952.]

Company—Registration—Restoration to register—Validation of acts done on its behalf before restoration—Application for new tenancy under Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951—Companies Act, 1948 (c. 38), s. 353 (6).

On Nov. 10, 1950, a company was struck off the register under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 (5). On July 23, 1951, an application was made on behalf of the company under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, Part II, for the grant of a new tenancy of a shop. In the circumstances of the case the last day on which such an application on behalf of the company could have been made was July 24, 1951. On Oct. 15, 1951, on the company's application to the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster, the company's name was restored to the register under s. 353 (6) of the Act of 1948, the order, following the words of the sub-section, providing that, on an office copy of the order being delivered to the registrar, "the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off". On Oct. 31, 1951, the company's application under the Act of 1951 was heard, but the county court judge held that the Vice-Chancellor's order did not have a retro-active effect, and that, the time for making such an application having expired, the company could not ratify the application made on its behalf during the period of its dissolution. He, therefore, dismissed the application. On appeal, HELD (JENKINS, L.J., dissentiente): the effect of the provision in s. 353 (6) that the company should be "deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off" was not only that the corporate existence of the company was preserved, but was also retro-active so that at the date of the hearing of the application on Oct. 31, 1951, the company was to be regarded as never having been dissolved and it was not open to the landlord to object that no application had been made on behalf of the company on July 23, 1951, merely by reason of the company's having been struck off the register.

Morris v. Harris ([1927] A.C. 252), distinguished.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The final words of s. 353 (6) can properly and usefully be regarded as intended to give the court, where justice requires and the general words [by which the company is deemed to have continued in existence] would or might not themselves suffice, the power to put both the company and third parties in the same position as they would have occupied in such cases if the dissolution of the company had not intervened.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs, Tymans, Ltd., from an order of His Honour JUDGE FRASER HARRISON made at St. Helens and Widnes County Court on Oct. 31, 1951, dismissing an application purporting to have been made by the company for the grant to it by the landlord, Walter Craven, of a new tenancy of a lock-up shop under the provisions of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, on the ground that he had no jurisdiction to entertain the application.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 22. The following judgments were read.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This appeal raises a short question of the construction of a few words in the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 (6):

"... the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off . . ."

The phrase is of respectable ancestry, being derived from earlier legislation relating to limited liability companies since before the beginning of the present century, but it has never been the subject of judicial interpretation, save, incidentally, in Morris v. Harris (1).

The facts are simple and undisputed. On July 23, 1951, an application in proper form was made in the appellant company's name for the grant of a new tenancy of certain premises pursuant to the provisions of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951. July 23, 1951, was the last day but one on which such an application on the part of the company might in the circumstances be made. The respondent, Craven, is the person entitled to the premises subject to such rights as the company may have under the Act as his previous tenant. At the date of the application the name of the company had, in fact, been struck off the register pursuant to s. 353 (5). The company had, therefore, on that date been dissolved and was non-existent. The hearing of the application in the company's name did not take place till Oct. 31, 1951. In the meantime, on an application duly made to the Vice-Chancellor of the County Palatine of Lancaster pursuant to s. 353 (6), an order had been made (in the absence, in fact, of Mr. Craven, who had had no notice of the application) restoring the company's name to the register. The form of the order followed the language of the sub-section and contained a declaration that on an office copy of the order being delivered to the registrar

Nothing on the present appeal turns on the condition nor on the form of the order, which contained no special terms affecting the present question. On the application coming before the learned county court judge, Mr. Craven took the point that the order made by the Vice-Chancellor did not have retro-active effect, nor did it enable the company effectively to ratify the application made in its name during the period of its dissolution, since the time for making such an application expired on July 24. This question was tried as a preliminary issue by the judge, who accepted Mr. Craven's contention and dismissed the company's application accordingly.

If the words which I have quoted stood alone, the question, as a matter of plain English, would appear at first sight to be simple. A limited liability company cannot act, save through agents. At the time of the making of the application the company's agents—its directors—had no authority so to act because (but only because) the company had been struck off the register and did not, therefore, exist. But the words I have quoted provide clearly, on the face of them and without qualification, that

"the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off."

On the hypothesis, therefore, which the statute requires, it would appear to follow that on the hearing of the application on Oct. 31, 1951, Mr. Craven's objection could no longer be taken, for the ground of that objection—viz., that on July 23, 1951, the company's name had been struck off the register—had, by the terms of the statute and the order made thereunder, been taken away. But the sub-section does not end with the quoted phrase. After a semi-colon it continues

“ . . . and the court may by the order give such directions and make such provisions as seem just for placing the company and all other persons in the same position as nearly as may be as if the name of the company had not been struck off.”

The argument of Mr. Craven is that the addition of this further and (as it is said) expository sentence substantially qualifies the effect of the phrase that precedes it, so that the latter does no more than preserve the continuance of the company's corporate existence without validating ex post facto any acts done in the company's name during the period of its temporary dissolution. In accepting this view, the county court judge applied, and relied on, the speech of LORD BLANESBURGH in Morris v. Harris (1) already noticed.

The last named case was concerned with the effect, not of s. 353 (or its predecessor), but with the predecessor of s. 352. It will, therefore, be convenient at this stage to set out the relevant parts of both s. 352 and s. 353. Section 352 (1) provides:

“ Where a company has been dissolved, the court may at any time within two years of the date of dissolution, upon an application [as there specified] make an order, upon such terms as the court thinks fit, declaring the dissolution to have been void, and thereupon such proceedings may be taken as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved.”

The second sub-section is immaterial for present purposes. Section 353 (1) provides:

“ Where the registrar of companies has reasonable cause to believe that a company is not carrying on business or in operation, he may send to the company by post a letter inquiring whether the company is carrying on business or in operation.”

Sub-section (2) makes provision for the sending by the registrar of a second letter if no answer is received by him to the first; and by sub-s. (3):

“ if the registrar either receives an answer to the effect that the company is not carrying on business or in operation or does not . . . ”

receive an answer to his second letter, he is authorised to take certain further administrative steps. Sub-section (4) makes the section applicable to the case of a company in the course of being wound-up where the registrar has reasonable cause to believe there is no liquidator acting, or where, the company's affairs having been fully wound up, no returns have been made as therein mentioned. By sub-s. (5):

“ At the expiration of the time mentioned in the notice [referred to in sub-s. (3)] the registrar may . . . strike [the company's] name off the register, and shall publish notice thereof in the Gazette and on the publication in the Gazette of this notice the company shall be dissolved.”

Sub-section (6) provides:

“ If a company or any member or creditor thereof feels aggrieved by the company having been struck off the register, the court on an application made by the company or member or creditor before the expiration of twenty years from the publication in the Gazette of the notice aforesaid may, if satisfied that the company was at the time of the striking off carrying on business or in operation, or otherwise that it is just that the company be restored to the register, order the name of the company to be restored to the register, and upon an office copy of the order being delivered to the registrar for registration the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off; and the court may by the order give such directions and make such provisions as seem just for placing the company and all other persons in the same position as nearly as may be as if the name of the company had not been struck off."

This sub-section first appeared in substantially the same form in the Companies Act, 1880, s. 7, the only material difference being that in the earlier Acts up to and including the Act of 1908 the words "and thereupon" appeared immediately before the general words here in question in lieu of the present phrase

"and upon an office copy of the order being delivered to the registrar for registration."

The difference in the terminology between the latter part of s. 353 (6) and that at the end of s. 352 (1) (which was first introduced into the legislation in 1907) is marked, and has been, naturally, much relied on by counsel for the company who has also sought support for his argument in Morris v. Harris (1). The difference in form and language is, indeed, in my judgment, of the highest importance, and it is derived, at least in part, from the fact that the two sub-sections are dealing with different and distinct sets of circumstances. Section 352 (1) is applicable to cases where, under one or other of the earlier provisions of the Act (s. 274, s. 290 and s. 300) the company has been dissolved as a consequence of winding-up, either compulsory or voluntary. Ex hypothesi, there can be no question of the company having since dissolution conducted trading or business operations. An obvious purpose of the sub-section is to enable proper provision to be made in regard to some asset or liability newly come to light or for some other reason not taken into account in the winding-up. Section 353 (6) applies, on the other hand, where (subject to one qualification) there has been no winding-up. The qualification arises from sub-s. (4) of the section which makes it applicable to the case of a winding-up where the registrar has cause to believe that there is no liquidator acting, or that the winding-up has not properly proceeded, but those special circumstances have the practical result that the qualification is really not a qualification at all, for, ex concessis, the winding-up has not been completed, and the company has not, therefore, been dissolved as a consequence of liquidation. Section 353 (6) is, no doubt, primarily directed to the case where a formal end has been put to a company which has in practice become defunct or lapsed into inanition. But the earlier provisions of the section provide an effective sanction for failure to comply with the statutory obligations on a limited liability company as to making returns, etc. The section is, therefore, specifically directed (and the sub-section in its original form in the Act of 1880 was exclusively applicable) to cases, like the present, where a company which has failed in the performance of its statutory duties had, nevertheless, continued to trade and to transact business and, necessarily as a consequence, entered into numerous engagements with third parties.

Morris v. Harris (1) (on which, as I have already said, the county court judge relied, and to which both parties before us have turned for succour) raised the question whether the words in s. 223 (1) of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, the statutory predecessor of s. 352 of the Act of 1948 "... declaring the dissolution to have been void" had, as it were, full retro-active effect so as to enable the respondent to claim against the liquidator of a resuscitated company a sum awarded to him during the period of its dissolution. The Court of Appeal (reversing the decision of ROMER, J.) so held; but the House of Lords, by a majority of three to two, came to an opposite conclusion in what must be admitted to have been a point of serious doubt. The basis of the opinion of the majority of the noble Lords was that the final words of the sub-section introduced by the words "and thereupon" were expository of the preceding generalisation, and that these two introductory words "and thereupon" showed that the consequences flowing from the company's re-animation and specified in the final words of the sub-section only took effect from the date of the order of restoration. Three passages, one from the speech of LORD SUMNER, and two from the speech of LORD BLANESBURGH, being those relied on by the county court judge and by counsel for Mr. Craven in this court, must be cited. LORD SUMNER said ([1927] A.C. 257):

"The next question turns on the language and effect of s. 223 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908 [the predecessor of s. 352 of the Act of 1948]. It deals with the case of a company which has been dissolved, and that at an ascertained or ascertainable date . . . Nor, again, is the phraseology of s. 242 [the predecessor of the present s. 353] followed, whereby, when the registrar has reasonable cause to believe certain things and has taken certain action, ending in the erasure of the company's name from the register and a publication of the fact in the Gazette, the company thereupon 'shall be dissolved'. Under this section, when the court intervenes by order to modify this result, 'the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence, as if its name had not been struck off', and then the court can give directions to replace the company and all parties affected in an 'as you were' position."

LORD BLANESBURGH said (ibid., 267):

"First of all, a company treated as defunct by the registrar in the circumstance stated in s. 242, may by him be struck off the register under that section, 'and the company will be dissolved.' It must be noted that in this case the dissolution takes place without any previous winding-up, and may be effected without anyone interested in the company in fact being aware of it."

The noble Lord then sets out s. 242 (6), which is in the same terms (so far as material) as the present sub-section, and he put in italics what I have called the general words and the final sentence. He continued (ibid.):

"My Lords, this section first appeared in company legislation in s. 26 of the Companies Act, 1900.* It was before the legislature when s. 223 was first enacted in 1907. It will appear in a moment how significant is the fact that the provisions of s. 242 (6), which I have italicised, are not repeated in s. 223."

That section is not concerned with a dissolution of a company following a winding-up by the court, or one following a voluntary winding-up, the second and third of the events which may precede a dissolution. LORD BLANESBURGH then discusses the history of s. 223 of the Act of 1908 and states the inferences which he derives from its terms. He adds finally (ibid., 269):

"And now is made apparent the reason for the difference in phraseology and effect between s. 223 and s. 242 (6). A dissolution under s. 242, as I have said, is preceded by no winding-up, and the section had to envisage a dissolution which might have taken place without the knowledge of anyone concerned in the company. Hence the wide powers given to the court by sub-s. (6). Section 223, on the other hand, is confined to cases where the dissolution succeeds the complete winding-up of the company's affairs and cannot take effect at all except at the instance or with the knowledge of the liquidator, the company's only executive officer. The legislature has not seen fit to make provision for validating any intermediate acts done on behalf of such a company so dissolved."

The argument for Mr. Craven in the present case is that the very different words of s. 353 (6) must be similarly construed, with only this difference, that the final words of the sub-section here in question, though similarly "expository" of the preceding generality, empower the court making the order of restoration to give, quoad any particular transaction or series of transactions, appropriate directions so as to make the restoration retro-active as regards that transaction or series of transactions. I agree with counsel for Mr. Craven that, if the effect of the sub-section is not retro-active, but only enables the company from the date of the Vice-Chancellor's order to ratify acts done during the period of inanition in its name, the result does not enable the company to succeed, for, as I have already stated, the last date available to the company for making an application under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, was July 24, 1951, and on that date (on this view of the matter) the company was non-existent and is not to be deemed to have been otherwise. On the other hand, I cannot accept the argument which counsel for Mr. Craven first put forward, that s. 353 (6) was retro-active to the extent of validating what he called "internal" acts done in the company's name but not "external" acts, that is, acts done, or purporting to be done, in relation to third parties. The line between the two kinds of activity would not, as it seems to me, always be easy to draw, but, beyond (or, perhaps, in part, because of) that difficulty, I have found it impossible to formulate the qualification that would have to be read into the general words of the sub-section, or to find any satisfactory basis for holding that those general words were in this sense retro-active to a limited extent only. In my judgment, if Mr. Craven is entitled to succeed it must be on the ground that the (very different) wording of s. 353 (6) has (in the absence of some special directions given under the power contained in the final sentence) the same effect as the language of s. 352 (1), i.e., that the general words serve only (in the absence of such direction) to preserve the continued corporate existence of the company, without more, so as only thereby to circumvent those calamitous consequences which would otherwise flow from the hiatus in the company's life and which LORD BLANESBURGH regarded with such horror, but did not exactly specify, for example (as I take it) that the company would have to be regarded as being for the second time incorporated.

In my judgment, the wording of s. 353 (6) is not apt to achieve the same result as that which flows from the language of s. 352 (1). The final sentence of the former, following the semi-colon, cannot, as I think, properly be regarded as "expository" of that which precedes, as is the case with the final sentence of s. 352 (1), which, by the introductory "and thereupon", denotes the consequences which, on the making of the order of restoration, flow from that fact, viz., that from the date of the order (but not before) "such proceedings may be taken as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved."

Section 353 (6) contains no statement at all of any such consequences; the final sentence confers a special power to add where necessary to the order of restoration special directions designed to achieve something wholly different, viz., a putting back of the clock, an achieving of what LORD SUMNER called an "as you were position" between the company and third parties. Yet the consequences expressed in the last sentence of s. 352 (1) must in any event (I assume) be deemed to flow from an order under s. 353 (6). If the latter sub-section was intended to achieve, in law, the same result as the former (though with the addition implicit in the power to give special directions) it seems to me (to say the least) a strange and misleading piece of draftsmanship that such widely different formulae should have been chosen. And I attach, for myself, considerable significance to the absence of the words "and thereupon" or any similar language. If on the power contained in the final words of the sub-section in question to insert special directions in the order of resuscitation depended the validation of all the multifarious engagements into which the dissolved company might have entered during the period of its statutory suspense (a period which might have lasted for twenty years), what would be the appropriate procedure? Prima facie, all the third parties concerned would have to be given an opportunity of making representations to the court, a proceeding which I find it well nigh impossible to contemplate. On the other hand, some sensible content must be given to the final words of the sub-section, and this problem at first seemed to me to create a difficulty in the company's way. Without, however, attempting to define the scope of the words exhaustively, counsel for the company was able to give instances in answer to the question put to him. During the period of the company's suspended animation, the company, as well as third parties, might well have abstained from taking those steps—a step in an action, or the exercise of some contractual right—for which the proper time might have in the meantime expired. In my judgment, the final words of the sub-section can properly and usefully be regarded as intended to give to the court, where justice requires and the general words would or might not themselves suffice, the power to put both company and third parties in the same position as they would have occupied in such cases if the dissolution of the company had not intervened. More generally the final words of the sub-section seem to me designed not, by way of exposition, to qualify the generality of that which precedes them, but rather as a complement to the general words so as to enable the court (consistently with justice) to achieve to the fullest extent the “as you were position”, which, according to the ordinary sense of those general words, is prima facie their consequence.

As appears from the passages which I have cited from the speeches in Morris v. Harris (1), the majority of their Lordships derived considerable support for their view of the qualified effect of the general words in what is now s. 352 (1) from the contrast between the language of that sub-section and the language now under discussion. I find it difficult to regard such reasoning as consistent with the suggestion that the general words in s. 353 (6) are as qualified as those of s. 352 (1). Their Lordships seized rather on the characteristics of the latter sub-section which were different and distinct from those of the former as deliberately intended, especially since the predecessor of s. 352 first made its appearance considerably later in date than did the predecessor of s. 353, to give to s. 352 (or its forerunner) a more limited effect. It is true that both LORD SUMNER and LORD BLANESBURGH appear to have placed special emphasis on the final sentence of what is now s. 353 (6), though LORD BLANESBURGH'S italics extended not only to that final sentence, but also to the preceding generalisation. But the House was concerned only with the effect of the words now contained in s. 352 (1), and was not called on to examine or precisely to construe the language which is the subject of the present appeal.

It may be said that on any view the sub-section is not very happily drafted. It contemplates, for example, that the application for an order for restoration may be made by the company at a time when the company had been dissolved and is non-existent: see the note in PALMER'S COMPANY PRECEDENTS, 15th ed., vol. 1, at p. 1159. But, as I have already stated, the sub-section is in terms directed to the case (like the present) when during the period, possibly of long duration, of the company's dissolution, many acts will have been done and many engagements entered into by individuals purporting to act as directors or officers of the company and in its name. In this regard the sub-section operates in reference to circumstances wholly different from the circumstances relevant to an order under s. 352, and such as make it at least reasonable and sensible to expect that the re-animation of the company should be retro-active in its effect. Whatever, then, might have been the situation if the present application had come before the county court judge before the order of restoration—and in such event it is possible (though I do not so decide) that the Vice-Chancellor could, had he thought it just after hearing Mr. Craven, have included some special direction to his order under the final words of the sub-section—it seems to me that on Oct. 31, 1951, it was no longer open to Mr. Craven to allege the non-existence of the company on the preceding July 23, for, by the terms of the sub-section, the company had then to be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had never in fact been struck off the register.

I have expressed my conclusion, contrary to that entertained by the county court judge, with the greater diffidence having regard to the dissenting judgment of JENKINS, L.J., which I have had the advantage of reading. But I am comforted by the support of HODSON, L.J., and by the intimation of a like opinion expressed by the learned editors of the last two editions of BUCKLEY ON THE COMPANIES ACTS, 12th ed. (1949), p. 705; 11th ed. (1929) p. 596) and, according to his preface to the 11th ed., LORD WRENBURY (who participated, though he formed one of the minority, in the House of Lords case of Morris v. Harris (1)) was able to give some assistance in that editing. In my judgment, the appeal should be allowed, and the case remitted accordingly to the county court judge for determination of the company's application on its merits.

JENKINS, L.J.: It is common ground that under the relevant provisions of the Act of 1951 the latest date on which an application by the company for the grant of a new tenancy of the shop in question could be made was July 24, 1951, and that any application made after that date would be irremediably out of time and wholly ineffective for the purpose of founding proceedings under the Act. It is also common ground that in November, 1950, the Registrar of Companies, pursuant to the provisions of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353, struck the name of the company off the register and published notice thereof in the LONDON GAZETTE, whereupon the company was dissolved as provided by sub-s. (5) of the same section. Nor is it disputed that the company, having been thus dissolved, remained in a state of dissolution down to Oct. 15, 1951, on which date an order was made by the Vice-Chancellor of the Palatine Court of Lancaster restoring the name of the company to the register under the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 (6). The application which the learned county court judge had before him was an application purporting to have been made by the company on July 23, 1951, and was admittedly a nullity at the time when it was made, inasmuch as the company was then in a state of dissolution or, in other words, non-existent. The statutory period within which an application for the grant of a new tenancy of the shop in question was capable of being made under the Act of 1951 having expired on July 24, 1951, and no valid application (which is as much as to say no application at all) for that purpose having been made within that period, the result, prima facie, was that thereafter Mr. Craven became and remained free to deal with his interest in the shop as he chose, discharged once and for all from the possibility of being compelled to grant a new tenancy to the company under the relevant provisions of the Act of 1951. It is, however, contended on the part of the company that this conclusion is displaced by the circumstance that the purported application of July 23, 1951, originally fixed for hearing on Sept. 6, 1951, was adjourned by consent and not in fact heard by the learned county court judge until Oct. 31, 1951, by which time the learned Vice-Chancellor had already made the order of Oct. 15, 1951, restoring the company's name to the register. Admittedly, if the application had been heard by the learned county court judge at any time before Oct. 15, 1951, or (to be strictly accurate) at any time before the delivery to the Registrar of Companies for registration of an office copy of the Vice-Chancellor's order of that date, he would have had no option but to dismiss it. But it is argued by counsel for the company that on the true construction of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 (6), the effect of the learned Vice-Chancellor's order when perfected by delivery for registration (as counsel for Mr. Craven concedes it to have been before Oct. 31, 1951) was ex post facto to convert the invalid application of July 23, 1951, into a valid application duly made by the company on the same date, and consequently into a valid application duly made by the company within the time allowed by the relevant provisions of the Act of 1951. It follows (says counsel for the company) that on Oct. 31, 1951, the learned county court judge, by force of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 (6), and the order made thereunder had before him a valid application made within due time for the grant of a new tenancy, which he should have heard and determined on its merits instead of dismissing it, as he did, on the ground of a supposed want of jurisdiction. Of course it also follows, if counsel for the company is right, that Mr. Craven, who under the Act of 1951 was at risk of being compelled, in derogation of his common-law rights, to grant a new tenancy if, but not unless, application was duly made on or before July 24, 1951, might in the result be compelled to do so upon an application which, so far from being duly made within the prescribed period, in fact was at the date of its purported making, and thereafter for more than two months beyond the expiration of the prescribed period remained, a mere nullity, and for the first time acquired validity on the making and delivery for registration of the order of Oct. 15, 1951.

As this, to my mind, strange and startling result is said to flow expressly, or by necessary implication, from the language of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 (6), that sub-section had better be read in full.

“If a company or any member or creditor thereof feels aggrieved by the company having been struck off the register, the court on an application made by the company or member or creditor before the expiration of twenty years from the publication in the Gazette of the notice aforesaid may, if satisfied that the company was at the time of the striking off carrying on business or in operation, or otherwise that it is just that the company be restored to the register, order the name of the company to be restored to the register, and upon an office copy of the order being delivered to the registrar for registration the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off; and the court may by the order give such directions and make such provisions as seem just for placing the company and all other persons in the same position as nearly as may be as if the name of the company had not been struck off.”

It will be seen (i) that the effect of the making and delivery for registration of an order under the sub-section is expressed to be that the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off; and (ii) that the sub-section goes on to provide that the court may by the order give such directions and make such provisions as seem just for placing the company and all other persons in the same position as nearly as may be as if the name of the company had not been struck off. No such directions or provisions were made by the learned Vice-Chancellor's order in the present case. It will further be observed that an application under the sub-section may be made at any time before the expiration of twenty years from the publication in the Gazette of the striking off of the company's name from the register.

Counsel for the company fastens on the provision that

and argues thus: If the company in the present case had continued in existence, and not been struck off, the application purporting to have been made by the company on July 23, 1951, would have been an application in fact made by the company on that date, and thus would have been a valid application duly made by the company within the time prescribed by the Act of 1951. Therefore (he submits), sub-s. (6), if not expressly, at all events by necessary implication, provides not merely that the company is to be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off, but also (as a necessary consequence of, or corollary to, that hypothesis) that the company is to be deemed further to have made, as a valid act of its own, the purported application of July 23, 1951, on the date of its purported making. I do not think the conclusion is warranted by the premise. The purported application at the time of its making was in fact wholly invalid, because it was not, and could not be, validly made by or on behalf of the company, inasmuch as the company was then in a state of dissolution or, in other words, non-existent. True it is that the company is to be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off. But the hypothesis enjoined in these terms does not alter the vital circumstance that the purported application was not in fact made by or on behalf of the company. Moreover, the company could clearly have continued in existence without making any such application, and the hypothesis of its continued existence, therefore, by no means requires that it should be deemed to have done so.

I have so far stated the argument on the Companies Act, 1948, s. 353 (6), with reference to this particular case. But in general terms the submission of counsel for the company comes to this, that, whenever a company has been dissolved under the provisions of s. 353, an order under sub-s. (6) restoring its name to the register at any distance of time up to twenty years has the automatic, indiscriminate, and retrospective effect of validating all acts and things purporting to have been done by or on behalf of the company during its state of dissolution without any protection for the rights of other persons. Speaking for myself, I decline to attribute any such effect to sub-s. (6) in the absence of clear words requiring me to do so, and for my part I can find no such words in the language of the sub-section. The retrospective import of the provision that the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off is, to my mind, amply satisfied by the necessity of restoring the company to its original corporate status and preserving its identity as the same company and the same legal person as was previously dissolved. Otherwise obvious difficulties as to incorporation, membership, share capital, and so forth, would arise, and if the resuscitated company was brought into being as a legal entity distinct from the dissolved one, claims by and against the resuscitated company in respect of the pre-dissolution dealings of the dissolved company would not be maintainable. I see no justification for holding that the notional continuation of the company's existence retrospectively brought about by the sub-section does any more than restore and preserve for reasons such as I have mentioned the corporate existence and identity of the company. If that is right, I cannot see that it follows by necessary implication from the language used, or as a legal consequence of the hypothetical state of facts which the sub-section requires to be assumed, that all acts purporting to have been done by or on behalf of the company during the period of its dissolution are to be deemed by force of the section to have been, and to be, valid acts of the company. It would be difficult, indeed, to define with any degree of precision the scope of this suggested validation. While in a state of dissolution the company is non-existent. It can do nothing. It can have no directors, managers, agents or members. When an order is made for restoration of the company's name to the register, whose acts done in the meantime are to qualify for automatic validation as acts of the company? The answer, I suppose, must be the acts of any person or persons who, if the company had not been in a state of dissolution, would have had authority to bind the company in those particular matters. But how are the persons answering this hypothetical description to be identified? Dissolution for a period of, perhaps, as much as twenty years is envisaged. Cases may occur in which a company has been struck off the register, but all the necessary procedure as to the appointment of directors, general meetings, and so forth, is, nevertheless, carried on as if it had not been struck off. In such cases there would be no difficulty in identifying the persons who, if the company had not been struck off, would have had power to bind it. I conceive, however, that such cases would be rare. There may also be cases in which directors in office at the time of the striking off would, but for that event, have remained in office during the whole of the period of dissolution. Here, again, no difficulty would arise. But there must inevitably be many cases in which, during the whole or some part of the period of dissolution, the business of the defunct company was being carried on de facto by some person or persons without even a hypothetical vestige of authority, it may be to the grave detriment of pre-dissolution creditors. It would seem, therefore, that the suggested automatic validation of acts purporting to have been done by or on behalf of the company while in a state of dissolution must either extend even to acts of such de facto and wholly unauthorised managers as I have mentioned, or else be limited to the acts of persons answering a test of hypothetical authority by no means easy either to formulate or to apply. These considerations reinforce my conclusion that an order under sub-s. (6) does not automatically validate acts purporting to have been done by or on behalf of the company while dissolved.

Some reliance was placed in argument on the inconvenience which might result in the case of a company the business of which has in fact been carried on after its striking off if an order under sub-s. (6) does not have the effect of validating transactions taking place between striking off and restoration to the register. This argument (though, to my mind, balanced by the considerations against automatic validation to which I have already adverted) would have some force were it not for the concluding provision of sub-s. (6). That provision, to my mind, not only refutes the argument based on inconvenience, but also makes it reasonably plain that the provision as to the continued existence of the company does not have the validating effect contended for by counsel. For the company even if that effect might, as a matter of construction, have been attributed to it standing alone and divorced from the context provided by the remainder of the sub-section. It will be remembered that the concluding provision of sub-s. (6) is to the effect that the court may, by the order restoring a company's name to the register, give such directions and make such provisions as seem just for placing the company and all other persons in the same position as nearly as may be as if the name of the company had not been struck off. The argument of counsel for the company, as I understood it, necessarily involves the corollary that, by force of the provision that the company is to be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off, the company and all other persons are automatically placed in the same position as if the name of the company had not been struck off, and that, accordingly, no room is left for any exercise of the discretionary jurisdiction conferred on the court for placing the company and all other persons as nearly as may be in that position. The concluding provision of the sub-section thus becomes to all intents and purposes otiose and inoperative. Counsel for the company showed considerable ingenuity in suggesting circumstances in which a useful purpose might have been served by the concluding provision in conjunction with the provision as to the continued existence of the company when given the construction and effect for which he contends. Nevertheless, he failed to satisfy me that the true construction and effect of the sub-section read as a whole is not simply that an order made under it: (i) operates to restore and preserve the original corporate status and identity of the company as if its name had not been struck off the register; (ii) may at the discretion of the court provide for the validation of acts purporting to have been done by or on behalf of the company while it has been in a state of dissolution so far as the court considers it just so to do, having regard to the rights and interests of all parties concerned; but (iii) does not, in the absence of any such provision as is mentioned in (ii) above, have the effect of validating any such acts. We were told that, as a matter of practice, orders made under sub-s. (6) do not generally contain any such directions or provisions as are mentioned in the concluding lines of the sub-section. But this cannot affect the question of construction, and (it may fairly be added) it is probably true to say that in a majority of cases under sub-s. (6) the company is defunct de facto as well as de jure and the order for restoration is sought by some aggrieved creditor.

We were referred to only one authority bearing at all closely on the point at issue, viz., the House of Lords case of Morris v. Harris (1). In that case a company was dissolved at the conclusion of a voluntary liquidation for the purposes of reconstruction. The dissolution was later declared to have been void by an order made under the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, s. 223, which corresponds to s. 352 of the present Act. The question was whether this order had the effect of making binding on the company an arbitration award pronounced against the company between the date of its dissolution and the date of the order. The House by a majority (VISCOUNT DUNEDIN, LORD SUMNER and LORD BLANESBURGH, LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE and LORD WRENBURY dissenting) held that the order did not have this effect. The case has been relied on by both parties in the present appeal, but, to my mind, it tells strongly in favour of Mr. Craven. It turned, as I have said, on s. 223 of the Act of 1908 corresponding to s. 352 of the present Act. The relevant words of that section are:

"... the court may at any time within two years of the date of the dissolution ... make an order, upon such terms as the court thinks fit, declaring the dissolution to have been void, and thereupon such proceedings may be taken as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved."

The terms of the provision which the House had to consider were thus materially different from those of s. 353 (6) of the present Act or of the corresponding s. 242 (6) of the Act of 1908. But in the course of the speeches a contrast was drawn between s. 223 (1) and s. 242 (6) of the Act of 1908 which applies equally as between s. 352 (1) and s. 353 (6) of the present Act. Counsel for the company submits that the terms in which this contrast was drawn indicate that their Lordships regarded an order under s. 242 (6) of the Act of 1908 (and hence would have regarded an order under s. 353 (6) of the present Act) as automatically validating acts purporting to have been done by or on behalf of a restored company while it was in a state of dissolution. I do not agree. LORD SUMNER, after referring to s. 223 of the Act of 1908 and discussing its terms, said ([1927] A.C. 257):

"Nor, again, is the phraseology of s. 242 followed, whereby, when the registrar has reasonable cause to believe certain things and has taken certain action, ending in the erasure of the company's name from the register and a publication of the fact in the Gazette, the company thereupon 'shall be dissolved.' Under this section, when the court intervenes by order to modify this result, 'the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence, as if its name had not been struck off', and then the court can give directions to replace the company and all parties affected in an 'as you were' position. The words 'to have been void', in s. 223, appear, it is true, so far as they go, to have some retrospective effect, and tend to some extent to support the respondent's argument. On the other hand, the remaining words, which define the order, point rather to a declaration removing a bar to such action as might otherwise have been taken, than to one validating past proceedings, taken since the dissolution through ignorance or disregard of it and consequently invalid. The remaining words, 'and thereupon such proceedings may be taken, as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved', seem to me to point conclusively in the same direction. They describe an authority given to the parties concerned to do, 'thereupon' and accordingly thereafter, things which they might have done but obviously had not done theretofore, and, but for the order, could not have done after the dissolution. I think these words do not affect the validity or the contrary of steps taken during that interval. They must still depend on the facts existing and the rights arising before and independently of the order."

Then LORD BLANESBURGH said (ibid., 267):

"My Lords, the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908, makes the dissolution of one of its companies possible in three different events. First of all, a company treated as defunct by the registrar in the circumstance stated in s. 242, may by him be struck off the register under that section, 'and the company will be dissolved.' It must be noted that in this case the dissolution takes place without any previous winding-up and may be effected without any one interested in the company in fact being aware of it. Sub-section (6) of s. 242 accordingly provides . . . [and his Lordship then read the section, italicising its terms from this point,] 'and thereupon the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off; and the court may by the order give such directions and make such provisions as seem just for placing the company and all other persons in the same position as nearly as may be as if the name of the company had not been struck off.' My Lords, this section first appeared in company legislation in s. 26 of the Companies Act, 1900. It was before the legislature when s. 223 was first enacted in 1907. It will appear in a moment how significant is the fact that the provisions of s. 242 (6), which I have italicised, are not repeated in s. 223."

The same learned Lord further said this (ibid., 268):

"In these circumstances, I cannot myself doubt that both the words of s. 223 empowering the court to make an order 'declaring the dissolution to have been void', and the following words expository of the result, 'and thereupon such proceedings may be taken as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved', were in each case designedly chosen to produce the precise result which my noble and learned friend has attributed to them. It is true that a declaratory order under the section unqualified in terms does, and it was in my judgment essential, if many difficulties which readily occur to the mind were to be avoided, that such an order should have the effect of restoring to the revived company its corporate existence as from the very moment of the dissolution thereby declared 'to have been void'. But the expository words which follow carefully and, as I think, advisedly refrain from adding that such an order is to have the effect of restoring to the company from the same moment, not its corporate existence only, but its corporate activity also. On the contrary, these expository words import, as I think, that it is only after the order has been made—it is 'thereupon' but not before—that any active consequences are to ensue. I think, my Lords, that the terms in which these consequences are described are exhaustive and emphatic. They are intended to show that an order under the section made, it may be, as long as two years after a dissolution which up to that moment was completely effective, is not at once and as of course to ratify acts done during the interval, which, if done at all, must necessarily have been acts of mere usurpation, by a liquidator or other pretended agent with no office knowingly done on behalf of a company which had no existence. On consideration, it appears, I think, clear that automatically to validate such acts as being the acts of a duly constituted officer on behalf of a duly incorporated company might involve consequences too disastrous to be even envisaged. These are avoided by the terms of the section. The company is restored to life as from the moment of dissolution but, continuing a convenient metaphor, it remains buried, unconscious, asleep and powerless until the order is made which declares the dissolution to have been void. Then, and only then, is the company restored to activity. And now is made apparent the reason for the difference in phraseology and effect between s. 223 and sub-s. (6) of s. 242. A dissolution under s. 242, as I have said, is preceded by no winding-up, and the section had to envisage a dissolution which might have taken place without the knowledge of any one concerned in the company. Hence the wide powers given to the court by sub-s. (6). Section 223, on the other hand, is confined to cases where the dissolution succeeds the complete winding-up of the company's affairs and cannot take effect at all except at the instance or with the knowledge of the liquidator, the company's only executive officer. The legislature has not seen fit to make provision for validating any intermediate acts done on behalf of such a company so dissolved."

It seems to me reasonably plain that in these passages their Lordships were not treating an order under s. 242 (6) of the Act of 1908 as having the effect of automatically validating acts done while the restored company was in a state of dissolution, but were contrasting the presence in s. 242 (6) of a power for the court (as LORD SUMNER put it) with the absence of any such power in s. 223 (1). In view of what LORD BLANESBURGH said (ibid., 269) about the possibly disastrous consequences of automatic ratification, I cannot but think he would have made some comment on the automatic ratification produced by an order under s. 242 (6) if he had thought such an order would produce that result. Further, I think his contrast (ibid., 268) between "corporate existence" and "corporate activity" is no less applicable to s. 242 (6) (now s. 353 (6)). I should add that LORD WREN-BURY in his dissenting judgment (ibid., 263) uses language which by no means indicates that he would not have taken a different view on the entirely different facts of the present case.

"to replace the company and all parties affected in an 'as you were' position"

Even if, contrary to my view, an order under s. 353 (6) does automatically validate acts purporting to have been done by or on behalf of the company while dissolved, I think it would be wrong in principle to regard such validation as extending to making retrospectively effective an application such as the one here in question, which could not have been effectively made by the company at the date of the order of restoration, because the time allowed for making it had by then already expired. In other words, I think the effect of any statutory ratification brought about by s. 353 (6) must at all events be limited by the principle stated in Dibbins v. Dibbins (2), which should be applied with reference to the facts as they stand at the date when the order of restoration is perfected by delivery for registration. For these reasons I would dismiss the appeal.

HODSON, L.J., stated the facts, read s. 353 (6) of the Act of 1948, and continued: It is conceded that the words in s. 353 (6) "the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence as if its name had not been struck off" have some retro-active effect, but the respondent, Mr. Craven, contends that their force is insufficient to bring to life such an application as was made by the applicants to the county court. It is necessary to compare s. 352 (1) with s. 353 (6). The last words of s. 352 (1) are markedly different from the words here to be considered. In particular, the words

"thereupon such proceedings may be taken as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved" are to be noticed. The predecessor of s. 352, viz., s. 223 of the Companies Act, 1908, was considered by the House of Lords in Morris v. Harris (1). The House by a majority held that the section did not validate proceedings during the interval between dissolution and avoidance under that section: see LORD SUMNER's speech ([1927] A.C. 257). LORD SUMNER said (ibid.):

"The next question turns on the language and effect of s. 223 of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. It deals with the case of a company which has been dissolved, and that at an ascertained or ascertainable date. It provides for an order, which it empowers a court to make in all such cases, on such terms as the court may think fit (and therefore also without terms, if the court so thinks fit) 'declaring the dissolution to have been void.' Pausing here, I remark that the order is not expressed to be one setting anything aside or declaring that the dissolution is to be deemed not to have taken place and thus reversing the actual language of s. 195, or declaring the dissolution to be void. Nor, again, is the phraseology of s. 242 followed, whereby, when the registrar has reasonable cause to believe certain things and has taken certain action, ending in the erasure of the company's name from the register and a publication of the fact in the Gazette, the company thereupon 'shall be dissolved.' Under this section, when the court intervenes by order to modify this result, 'the company shall be deemed to have continued in existence, as if its name had not been struck off', and then the court can give directions to replace the company and all parties affected in an 'as you were' position. The words 'to have been void', in s. 223, appear, it is true, so far as they go, to have some retrospective effect, and tend to some extent to support the respondent's argument. On the other hand, the remaining words, which define the order, point rather to a declaration removing a bar to such action as might otherwise have been taken, than to one validating past proceedings, taken since the dissolution through ignorance or disregard of it and consequently invalid. The remaining words, 'and thereupon such proceedings may be taken, as might have been taken if the company had not been dissolved', seem to me to point conclusively in the same direction. They describe an authority given to the parties concerned to do, 'thereupon' and accordingly thereafter, things which they might have done but obviously had not done theretofore, and, but for the order, could not have done after the dissolution. I think these words do not affect the validity or the contrary of steps taken during that interval. They must still depend on the facts existing and the rights arising before and independently of the order."

Section 242 of the Act of 1908 is the predecessor of s. 353 of the present Act. The respondent, Mr. Craven, relies on the words of LORD SUMNER

"and the court can give directions to replace the company and all parties in an 'as you were' position" as tending to support the view that an "as you were" position is not created unless the court gives special directions under powers conferred by the last four lines of sub-s. (6). LORD BLANESBURGH also drew attention to the difference in the language of the two sections, and pointed out that the section which corresponds to s. 352 had to do with companies which had been wound-up either compulsorily or voluntarily. These are dealt with by s. 279, s. 290 and s. 300 of the present Act. The section which corresponds to s. 353, on the other hand, dealt with dissolution when there had been no winding-up, which might have taken place without the knowledge of anyone concerned in the company. LORD BLANESBURGH did not consider the precise effect of an order under the last-mentioned section, but, in my opinion, says nothing inconsistent with the view that an order under what is now s. 353 (6) brings about an "as you were" position as contended by the company. Both of their Lordships were concerned to show that on a comparison of the two sections of the Act of 1908 the retro-active effect of an order under s. 223 was less than that of an order which might be made under s. 242, but went no further in considering s. 242 than was necessary for the purpose of construing s. 223.

Some difficulty is presented by the last four lines of s. 353 (6) of the Act of 1948, which might seem to be mere surplusage if the preceding words are completely retro-active. Mr. Craven, accordingly, contends that the retro-active effect of the earlier part of the sub-section is confined to internal acts of the company, leaving external matters in the shape of the company's relationship with third parties unaffected in the absence of a special order under the last part of the section. He suggests other lines of demarcation, one between acts done in the ordinary course of business and acts done outside that course, and another between acts which a company can ratify and those which it cannot ratify in accordance with the ordinary laws of agency. These various lines of demarcation cannot be said to be based on any words contained in the sub-section itself, although the distinction between internal and external activity finds some support from the language of LORD BLANESBURGH in Morris v. Harris (1) when he drew a distinction between the corporate existence and the corporate activity of the company in considering the effect of an order under what is now s. 352.

For my part, I think the words of s. 353 (6) are clearly designed to produce an "as you were" position, and think that the latter part of the sub-section is complementary and intended to provide for cases where provision is necessary in order to clarify an obscure position or give back to the company an opportunity which it might otherwise have lost. An example of this would be a case where a company had lost an opportunity of obtaining a concession or renewing a lease during the interval between its dissolution and an order under the sub-section. A provision in the order could deal with such a case. That the last four lines of the sub-section do not cut down the retro-active effect of that which precedes them is, to my mind, indicated by the introductory words "and the court may by the order". The directions and provisions to be made by the order would naturally be supposed to make good what had previously been stated, viz., that the company should be deemed to have continued in existence as if the name had not been struck off. Finally, there is in s. 353 (6) no language comparable with the words "thereupon such proceedings may be taken", etc., in s. 352. In my judgment, the appeal should be allowed and the matter referred back to the county court judge to hear the application on its merits.

Appeal allowed.

VAMVAKAS v. CUSTODIAN OF ENEMY PROPERTY AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Ormerod, J.), February 11, 12, 13, 14, 27, 1952.]

Enemy—Non-enemy alien resident in enemy territory—Residence not voluntary—Vesting of property by Board of Trade in Custodian of Enemy Property—Right to confer power of sale—Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939 (c. 89), s. 2 (1) (b), s. 7 (1) (b) (c) (d).

A Greek subject resident in Roumania when it was declared enemy territory in February, 1941, according to his evidence, was unable to leave during the 1939-45 war. In May, 1942, the Board of Trade made an order under s. 7 (1) (b) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, vesting three thousand gold sovereigns, which were held by a bank in England on behalf of the Greek subject, as enemy property in the Custodian of Enemy Property and giving him power to sell them. In June, 1942, the Custodian caused the sovereigns to be sold for £5,887 10s., the price then ruling, and held the proceeds until 1949 when he paid that sum to the Greek subject. In an action by the Greek subject against the Custodian for the return of the sovereigns or for their value, or, alternatively, for damages for conversion, HELD: (i) "resident" in s. 2 (1) (b) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, meant, not voluntarily resident, but de facto resident, and, as the Greek subject was in fact resident in enemy territory at the time of the Board of Trade's order, he was an "enemy" and his property was enemy property within the meaning of that enactment whether or not his residence was voluntary.

Re Hatch ([1948] 2 All E.R. 288), applied.

(ii) the Board of Trade had the right where it made such a vesting order, to prescribe a power of sale under s. 7 (1) (d), such a right not being impliedly excluded by s. 7 (1) (c) which was intended to give the right to prescribe a power of sale where it was unnecessary or impracticable to vest the property in the Custodian.

Re Münster ([1920] 1 Ch. 268), explained.

(iii) the vesting order made by the Board of Trade, therefore, was valid.

ACTION for delivery up of three thousand gold sovereigns deposited on the plaintiff's behalf with the Westminster Bank, London, in 1937, or their value, and alternatively for damages for their conversion.

On May 22, 1942, the Board of Trade made an order under s. 7 (1) (b) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, vesting the sovereigns in the Custodian of Enemy Property and giving him power to sell them. On June 30, 1942, in pursuance of a direction from the Custodian, the bank sold the gold sovereigns and paid £5,839 5s., the proceeds (less expenses), to the Custodian. On Jan. 11, 1949, the bank, on behalf of the plaintiff, applied to the Board of Trade for release of the plaintiff's assets and in due course it received on his behalf the sum of £5,839 5s., but not his holding of sovereigns. The plaintiff claimed the return of the sovereigns, their value, or damages for their conversion on the ground that: (i) he was not an enemy, and the sovereigns were not enemy property, within the meaning of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (b) and s. 7 (8) (a), his residence in enemy territory at the time not having been voluntary, and (ii) the Board of Trade, in making a vesting order under s. 7 (1) (b) of the Act, had no power to confer a power of selling the property on the Custodian.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 27. ORMEROD, J., read the following judgment. The plaintiff, a Greek subject living in Athens, claims from the defendants delivery up of three thousand gold sovereigns deposited by him with the Westminster Bank, London, in 1937, or, alternatively, damages for their conversion, and any further requisite relief.

The claim arises in these circumstances. In 1937 the plaintiff lived at Rafina, a suburb of Athens, with his wife and family, and carried on the business there of a general merchant which required him to spend much of his time in other European countries, particularly Roumania, where his brother carried on a similar business in Bucharest. In 1937 he arranged that his brother should transfer to his credit at the Westminster Bank, Foreign Branch Office, London, the three thousand gold sovereigns the subject of this action. In August, 1939, the plaintiff contracted to supply five hundred horses to the Greek army, and, in consequence, went to Bucharest, taking his wife and children with him, and lived there at the brother's house. Until October, 1947, he spent all his time in Roumania, with the exception of short visits to Greece in October, 1939, April, 1940, and September, 1940. The horse contract was completed about Oct. 10, 1940, but the plaintiff then concerned himself with the charter of a ship to take petrol from Roumania to the Greek army. This ship appears to have made three voyages on the plaintiff's behalf, the last being about February, 1941. According to the plaintiff, the horse contract was financed partly by himself and partly by his brother, and the petrol contract was financed by his brother and he did the technical work. Also, during the time he was engaged on the petrol contract he was disposing to Roumanian peasants and others about three hundred surplus horses which the Greek army authorities had not accepted. In October, 1940, Italy declared war on Greece. German troops began to gather on the Roumanian frontier, and Germans in civilian clothes began to infiltrate into Roumania. A revolution took place in Roumania in December, 1940, and January, 1941, which resulted in General Antonescu and the Iron Guard being in control of the country. On Feb. 15, 1941, Roumania was declared to be enemy territory within the meaning of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 2 (1), and shortly after this the Greek consulate in Bucharest was closed. The plaintiff says that, before the consul left, he advised the plaintiff and other Greek subjects in Bucharest to "lie low", to use the plaintiff's words. On Apr. 6, 1941, Germany declared war on Greece, and from that date the plaintiff was unable to leave Bucharest and was not allowed to carry on any business. He lived as best he could with his wife and family in two rooms in Bucharest and was, he says, in constant fear of arrest. He was imprisoned in August, 1941, by the Roumanians for a period of six weeks without any charge being brought against him, and in 1944 he was arrested by the Germans, but escaped after six or eight weeks' imprisonment. His evidence is that when Axis troops were concentrating on the frontier in November and December, 1940, it would have been suicide to try to get through, but that in any event he was morally obliged to remain in Bucharest as he had assumed the responsibility for the petrol transaction. He agreed in cross-examination that from June 3, 1937, to Sept. 30, 1940, he had only spent a total of five months in Greece. It was his business to go backwards and forwards. He did not spend all his remaining time in Roumania, but that country was his "centre of movement". On Sept. 5, 1941, the Westminster Bank made a return to the Custodian of Enemy Property showing that they held the three thousand gold sovereigns in question on behalf of the plaintiff, whose address was given as Bucharest. On May 22, 1942, the Board of Trade, in pursuance of powers contained in s. 7 (1) (b) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, made an order vesting the sovereigns in the Custodian of Enemy Property and giving the Custodian power to sell them. On June 19, 1942, the Custodian directed the Westminster Bank to sell the sovereigns to the Bank of England, and an account dated June 30, 1942, shows that this was done for the sum of £5,887 10s., the price then ruling. The proceeds of sale, less expenses, were paid by the Westminster Bank to the Custodian and held by him.

The plaintiff was able to return to Athens from Roumania in October, 1947, and on Jan. 11, 1949, through the Westminster Bank applied to the Controller-General, Administration of Enemy Property Department of the Board of Trade, for the release of his assets. The sum of £5,839 5s., the proceeds of the sale of the gold, and a small balance on his current account, less certain fees and charges, was paid to his credit at the Westminster Bank, but he was unable to obtain the restoration of his holding of gold sovereigns. He now claims from the Custodian and from the Bank of England the return of the sovereigns or their value or damages for their conversion on the following grounds: (i) that he was not an enemy, nor were the sovereigns enemy property, within the meaning of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, s. 2 (1) (b) and s. 7 (8) (a); and (ii) that in any event the Board of Trade, in making a vesting order under s. 7 (1) (b) of the Act, could not confer a power to sell the property.

On the first ground it is contended for the plaintiff that the word "resident" in s. 2 (1) (b) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, which defines "enemy" as "any individual resident in enemy territory," must mean "voluntarily resident", and, as the plaintiff at the relevant time was unable to leave Roumania, he could not be regarded as resident in enemy territory, and, therefore, as an "enemy" within the meaning of the section. It was argued that the Act of 1939 repealed the existing legislation which was contained in the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, and the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, and that the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1914, contained no definition of "enemy", but in the preamble of the amending Act of 1914 "enemies" were defined as "... persons and bodies of persons resident or carrying on business in any country with which His Majesty is for the time being at war . . ."

This, said counsel for the plaintiff, should be construed as meaning nothing more than a statement of the common law definition of the word "enemy". In Porter v. Freudenberg (1) LORD READING, C.J., includes in his definition of enemy ([1915] 1 K.B. 869):

"... a British subject . . . who is voluntarily resident . . . in hostile territory . . ."

and this definition has been followed and approved in a number of cases both in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords, particularly in the Sovfracht case (2). It is argued that, as the words in s. 2 (1) (b) of the Act of 1939 are substantially the same as the words in the preamble to the amending Act of 1914, they should have the same effect and be construed as meaning "voluntarily resident". I cannot accept this contention. There is no doubt on the authorities that at common law an individual to be an enemy in these circumstances must be voluntarily resident in hostile territory. But the circumstances in which the question of enemy status may arise at common law are substantially different from those arising under the statute. At common law the question most frequently arising is the right or liability of the individual to sue or to be sued, whereas under the statute the principal consideration is the administration of property in this country belonging to individuals resident in hostile territory, lest that property should be used to the advantage of the enemy.

In Re Hatch (3) ROXBURGH, J., says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 292):

"As the Trading with the Enemy legislation has to be applied and acted on during war and under warlike conditions it would be surprising if 'residence' meant anything more complicated than de facto residence irrespective of circumstances, for it would, in most cases, be impossible to investigate the circumstances during a war."

Counsel for the plaintiff contends that in cases of doubt the Board of Trade may specify the individual concerned as an "enemy" by virtue of s. 2 (2) of the Act of 1939, but, in my opinion, that cannot be the object of the subsection. If it were, it would require to be invoked in a very large number of cases, if not in every case, and would, indeed, render any other definition of "enemy" unnecessary. I have come to the conclusion that I should accept the view of ROXBURGH, J., that "residence" in this context means "de facto residence irrespective of circumstances". If this be right, then I am satisfied that the plaintiff must be regarded as coming within the statutory definition of "enemy". His evidence is that he regarded it as his duty to remain in Bucharest at least until February, 1941, when Roumania was declared to be enemy territory, and that afterwards he accepted, no doubt wisely, the advice of the consul to "lie low" and not take the risk of attempting to leave the country and return to Greece. It may well be, as he says, that after the declaration of war by Germany on Greece in April, 1941, it was impossible for him to leave. He was, in my opinion, none the less de facto resident in Roumania during the relevant period. It is unnecessary, in view of the conclusion to which I have come, to consider whether the Custodian would in any event be protected by the provisions of s. 7 (3) of the statute.

It is further contended on behalf of the plaintiff that, even though the Board of Trade had the power to make an order vesting the gold in question in the Custodian, there was no power under the statute to include in that order a power of sale. The power to make vesting orders of enemy property is given to the Board of Trade by s. 7 (1) of the Trading with the Enemy Act, 1939, which provides that the Board of Trade may by order

"(b) vest in the prescribed custodian such enemy property as may be prescribed, or provide for, and regulate, the vesting in that custodian of such enemy property as may be prescribed; (c) vest in the prescribed custodian the right to transfer such other enemy property as may be prescribed, being enemy property which has not been, and is not required by the order to be, vested in the custodian."

"Enemy property" is defined by s. 7 (8) (a) to be

"... any property for the time being belonging to or held or managed on behalf of an enemy or an enemy subject."

The plaintiff's contention is that paras. (b) and (c) of s. 7 (1) are mutually exclusive. The Board of Trade may vest the property in the Custodian, but may not at the same time give the Custodian a power of sale, or they may, without vesting the property, vest in the Custodian a right to transfer it. Section 7 (1) (d) provides that the Board of Trade may confer on the Custodian

"... such rights, powers, duties and liabilities as may be prescribed as respects (i) property which has been, or is required to be, vested in a custodian by or under the order, (ii) property of which the right of transfer has been, or is required to be, so vested . . .”

It is contended by the plaintiff that the powers conferred by para. (d) do not extend the powers conferred by para. (b) or para. (c), but only provide for such ancillary powers as may be necessary to carry out orders made under (b) and (c) respectively.

It is interesting to look at the provisions in the earlier statutes. The Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1914, s. 4 (1), provides:

“The High Court or a judge thereof may . . . by order vest in the Custodian any such real or personal property as aforesaid . . . and may by the order confer on the Custodian such powers of selling, managing and otherwise dealing with the property as to the court or judge may seem proper.”

The Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, s. 4 (1), confers this power on the Board of Trade. Why, then, should the statute of 1939 limit the powers of the Board of Trade to prescribe a power of sale only in cases where a vesting order has not been made? Counsel for the plaintiff contends that the reason for this is to be found in the decision of RUSSELL, J., in Re Münster (4), which dealt with the right of the Special Commissioners to assess the Custodian to supertax as agent or receiver for Prince Münster, an enemy. In dealing with the objection that the Custodian's contention involved the existence of a period of time during which there was no beneficial owner of the property, RUSSELL, J., said ([1920] 1 Ch. 279):

“That is quite true, but it is the result of a statute which, in my judgment, causes the beneficial ownership to be and remain in statutory suspense or abeyance during the period in question, during which period the Custodian has certain limited powers of dealing with the property.”

This decision was followed in Re Gourju's Will Trusts (5), a case dealing with the payment to a widow residing in enemy territory of the income of a trust fund in this country. SIMONDS, J., says ([1942] 2 All E.R. 607):

“He [the Custodian] does not receive such money as agent for the enemy. He has certain limited powers of dealing with it, but apart from that the beneficial ownership is to be regarded as in statutory suspense . . .”

Counsel for the plaintiff contends that the effect of these decisions is that, once a vesting order is made, the beneficial ownership of the property is in suspense and remains in suspense until the signing of a peace treaty or a general release of enemy property. It is to be noted that Re Münster (4) deals with the liability of the Custodian to be assessed to supertax on the income of enemy property vested in him, and is in no way concerned with the right of the Custodian to sell such property. The case was decided when the Trading with the Enemy Amendment Act, 1916, was in force, and, if counsel for the plaintiff's contention is correct, would render s. 4 of that Act, so far as it related to powers of sale, of no effect, as the Board of Trade would have the power to order a sale of the legal estate only, while the beneficial ownership would remain in suspense until the happening of the specified future event.

In my opinion, the true effect of Re Münster (4) is that, although the beneficial ownership of property vested in the Custodian is in suspense, the power of sale is not thereby altered. On a transfer of the property by the Custodian, the beneficial ownership once again attaches to it, but the purchase price remains in the hands of the Custodian under the same conditions as the property for which it has been transferred, including, of course, the suspension of the beneficial ownership. I do not accept, therefore, the contention that the power of the Board of Trade to prescribe a power of sale has been limited because of Re Münster (4), and I do not accept the contention that the Board of Trade may not prescribe a power of sale under s. 7 (1) (d) in cases where a vesting order has been made. In my view, the object of s. 7 (1) (c) is to give the right to the Board of Trade to prescribe a power of sale in cases where for any reason it is unnecessary or impracticable to vest the property in the Custodian and the paragraph is not intended to exclude the right to prescribe such a power of sale when a vesting order is made.

The plaintiff further contended that, even if the Custodian had power to sell the property in question to the Bank of England, the beneficial ownership was still in suspense, and that on a general release of enemy property it would vest in him. This contention was, of course, based on Re Münster (4), and, in view of the opinion I have already expressed, it is unnecessary for me to deal with the question further. It follows, therefore, that there must be judgment for the defendants. Judgment for the defendants.

RODGERS v. MINISTRY OF TRANSPORT AND ANOTHER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Lord Goddard, C.J.), February 20, 1952.]

Highway—Trunk road—Improvement—Widening and levelling—Construction of “lay-by”—Powers of Ministry of Transport—Right of driver to park vehicle on grass verge of highway—Highway Act, 1864 (c. 101), s. 48.

Lorry drivers stopping at a café for refreshment made a practice of driving off a trunk road and on the verge, churning it up and obliterating a footpath. The Ministry of Transport, in whom the powers and duties of a highway authority in respect of the road were vested by the Trunk Roads Act, 1936, as extended by the Trunk Roads Act, 1946, sched. I, acting through the county council, constructed something like a “lay-by”, levelling and making good the grass verge and the area where the footpath had been and curving the footpath so that it no longer ran across the space made good. In proceedings by an owner of adjoining property to restrain the Ministry and the council from providing a parking place,

HELD: (i) the verge was part of the highway and lorry drivers were entitled to drive and to leave their vehicles on it during a temporary stop for a legitimate purpose, e.g., for refreshment, and, therefore, if in consequence of the works they were to drive over the verge, they would not be doing anything illegal.

(ii) the Ministry had not exceeded their statutory powers by constructing a car park, but had “levelled” or “widened” the road in accordance with the powers contained in the Highway Act, 1864, s. 48, and, therefore, there was no ground for restraining the construction of the “lay-by.”

FOR THE HIGHWAY ACT, 1864, s. 48, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 11, p. 156.

ACTION for an injunction and a declaration.

The plaintiff was the owner and occupier of a house and land, Marling Manor, near Cobham, Kent, abutting on the northern boundary of the London to Canterbury and Dover main road (Watling Street), a metalled road forty feet wide with grass verges and footpath, and near to its junction with White Hill Lane which branched off to the north. At the junction was Marling Cross Café which was constantly used by lorry drivers wishing to obtain refreshment. Drivers stopping at the café made a practice of driving their lorries off the road and on the grass verge at the side, churning it up and obliterating the footpath. By virtue of the Local Government Act, 1888, s. 11 (1), the Local Government Act, 1929, s. 29 (1) (2), the Road Traffic Act, 1930, s. 53, and the Trunk Roads Act, 1936, as extended by the Trunk Roads Act, 1946, sched. I, all the powers and duties of a highway authority in respect of the London to Canterbury road were vested in the first defendants, the Ministry of Transport. Being unsuccessful in their efforts to prevent the damage to the grass verge and footpath or to induce the proprietor of the café to provide a parking ground for customers, the Ministry, through the second defendants, the Kent County Council, curved the footpath so that it avoided running across the piece of land which had become ploughed up, and made it into a hard path with a kerb to prevent vehicles driving on it. They also levelled and made good the grass verge and the area where the footpath had been, and made something like a "lay-by", which vehicles could enter at one end and leave at the other.

The plaintiff sought an injunction restraining the defendant county council by their servants and agents (i) from providing or constructing a parking place for vehicles on the grass verge opposite the frontage of the plaintiff's land, (ii) from utilising or authorising the use of any part of the verge as a parking place for vehicles, and (iii) from doing any work in respect thereof, and ordering them to reinstate the verge to the state and condition in which it was before July 16, 1951. She also asked for a declaration that the defendant Ministry were not, and never had been, entitled to provide or construct a parking place for vehicles on the grass verge or to use, or authorise the use of, any part of the verge as a parking place for vehicles.

LORD GODDARD, C.J.: The first point is whether a lorry driver is doing anything illegal or wrong in driving a vehicle on the grass verge of a highway. He might be doing something which would be punishable under the Highway Acts if he drove on the footpath, but, in my opinion, he is not doing anything wrong if he drives his lorry on the grass verge at the side of the road so as to be out of the way of traffic using the highway. Indeed, that is a proper thing to do because other vehicles will not then have an obstructed road. The right of the public to use the highway is a right to pass and re-pass along it, and they have no right to use it for any other purpose. In Harrison v. Duke of Rutland (1) Harrison did not like grouse shooting and he walked up and down the Duke's moors in Derbyshire and kept opening and closing his umbrella to frighten off the grouse. He was held to be using the highway for scaring the birds and not for passing and re-passing. There is no suggestion that the lorry drivers in the present case used the road for any purpose other than for passing and re-passing, though they do stop—and why should they not?—at the café.

The question is whether the Ministry did something illegal in creating this "lay-by". It is said that the Ministry thereby have created a car park, having no power so to do, but "car park" is not a term of art in the law. No doubt, a place has been created where cars will stop, but they have a right to stop. So far as I know, provided he does not drive on the footpath, no one suggests that a driver cannot drive a lorry on the verge of the road which is part of the highway. I cannot assent to the proposition that the Ministry have done anything illegal because they have put the footpath and kerb in such a place that the footpath is now clear of the part of the verge on which the lorries drive. Possibly some of the lorries may get on the verge lower down and in front of the plaintiff's house, but even then they will not be trespassing. They will be on a part of the highway which is the verge.

The relevant enactments seem to me to be perfectly clear. By s. 47 of the Highway Act, 1864:

“A highway board may make such improvements as are hereinafter mentioned in the highways within their jurisdiction, and may . . .”, then follow certain other powers. By s. 48:

“The following works shall be deemed to be improvements of highways:
(1) The conversion of any road that has not been stoned into a stoned road:
(2) The widening of any road, the cutting off the corners in any road where land is required to be purchased for that purpose, the levelling roads, the making any new road, and the building or enlarging bridges.”

Whether it is looked on as levelling or as widening the road—undoubtedly it is widened—I am certain that what was done here was within the Minister's statutory powers. It is said that the work done invites people to use the space as a parking ground. What can be said is that the county council, acting for the Ministry, have carried out works which will protect the footpath so that it will remain unaffected by the passage of lorries over it, and have strengthened and levelled a place where lorries can stand so as not unduly to obstruct the road during the short time drivers require for refreshment. I cannot find that in so doing the Ministry have done anything they had no power to do. I certainly cannot find that the fact that the lorries call at the café for refreshment causes an obstruction of the highway. They do not obstruct the highway merely by temporary call for a legitimate and proper purpose such as getting a meal while on the road, provided they do not stop in a place where the mere presence of a stationary vehicle would create an obstruction. The Ministry have done their best to abate the trouble of which the plaintiff complains, and if, as she fears, the lorry drivers are not content with pulling up at the place made but drive down the verge in front of her house they will not, in my view, be doing anything illegal, since I cannot subscribe to the idea that a lorry driver may not drive on the verge of the road, which is part of the highway, if he so pleases. The action is misconceived and I give judgment for the defendants with costs.

BAGLEY v. WINSOME (NATIONAL PROVINCIAL BANK, LTD., Garnishee).

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.),
February 19, 1952.]

Execution—Garnishee order—Debt “owing or accruing”—Deposit account—Money repayable only on production of deposit book—R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1—County Court Rules, Ord. 27, r. 1.

A judgment debtor had a sum of money in a deposit account with a bank, the contract between the bank and the debtor being subject to the conditions (a) that fourteen days' notice should be given of a withdrawal, and (b) that money could be withdrawn only on a personal application by the debtor at the bank and on production of the deposit book. On Jan. 11, 1952, a notice of withdrawal given by the debtor expired, and, on the same day, the judgment creditor issued a garnishee summons against the bank. The debtor did not apply, personally or at all, for repayment of the money and it was still with the bank.

HELD: as the judgment debtor had failed to comply with all the terms of the contract of deposit, he could not obtain payment from the bank of the money in his deposit account, and the judgment creditor could not be in a better position than the debtor; therefore, the sum standing to the credit of the debtor's deposit account was not a debt “owing or accruing” to him from the bank, within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, and the County Court Rules, Ord. 27, r. 1, and it was not a proper subject of garnishee proceedings.

APPEAL by the judgment creditor from an order of His Honour JUDGE THOMAS, at the Mayor's and City of London Court, dated Jan. 29, 1952. A garnishee summons having been issued by the judgment creditor against the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., in respect of the judgment debtor's deposit account with the bank, the bank disputed its liability. The learned judge held that the deposit account was not a proper subject-matter of garnishee proceedings.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: This appeal has raised a question of some difficulty and interest in regard to what are commonly known as garnishee proceedings. The proceedings in this case have taken place in the county court according to the appropriate terms of the County Court Rules, Ord. 27, but it is convenient to state that, as learned counsel have both agreed, the matter does not fall to be in any way differently decided on that account from the way in which it would be decided in a case where the proceedings occur under R.S.C., Ord. 45.

The point may be formulated in very brief terms. Under the rules, whether of the Supreme Court or of the county court, the creditor who has obtained judgment has available to him, as one form of executing his judgment, what is called attachment of debts by means of garnishee procedure, the subject-matter of which is described in both R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, and the County Court Rules, Ord. 27, r. 1, as, debts "owing or accruing" from a third party to the judgment debtor. The question in this case is whether a sum deposited with National Provincial Bank, Ltd., on deposit account by the judgment debtor, in respect of which at the material date (i.e., the date of service of the garnishee summons) a notice of withdrawal had been given by the judgment debtor and had expired, is, within the formula, a debt "owing or accruing" from National Provincial Bank, Ltd., to the judgment debtor. The judgment creditor obtained a judgment for a sum which, with costs, amounted to £50 odd. The summons which has given rise to this problem was issued on Jan. 11, 1952, that being the date on which the notice of withdrawal given by the judgment debtor expired. It is well known (and references to this effect may be found in the text-books) that contracts relative to what are now called deposit accounts may vary between one banking house and another. The contract which was in operation between the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., and the judgment debtor provided, so far as material, as follows:

"Sums of £1 and upwards paid into this account will bear interest at the current rate. The interest will be credited yearly on Dec. 31 and it is requested that this book be either brought or sent to the bank in January in order that the interest may be recorded therein."

The reference to "this book" is a reference to the fact that these terms are written in the book in which the sums deposited, the interest, and other particulars, are recorded. To continue with the terms of the contract:

"Personal application must be made and this book produced at the bank when any money is withdrawn. All withdrawals are subject to fourteen days' notice."

It, therefore, follows, that the bargain between the bank and the customer in this case was that the bank would credit the customer with interest on the sums deposited, as stated in the terms which I have read, and would only be liable to pay the whole or any part of the sums deposited on two conditions being satisfied—(i) that fourteen days' notice should be given of any withdrawal, i.e., of any claim to repayment, and (ii) that when the time came for repayment the depositor should attend personally and produce the deposit book. The notice of withdrawal in the present case had been given and had expired at the relevant date, so that, beyond doubt, the first condition was satisfied. But it appears that, notwithstanding, the judgment debtor has not presented himself, armed with his deposit account book, at the relevant branch of the National Provincial Bank, Ltd., and, therefore, the sum deposited still remains with the bank. In those circumstances, is the sum standing to the credit of the judgment debtor with the bank a debt "owing or accruing" from the bank to him? Unless it is, plainly it is not a proper subject of this form of execution.

We have been referred to a number of cases which throw some light, on some occasions a little indirectly and on other occasions of a rather tantalising character, on the problem, but it is certain that, in any previous case, so far as the researches of counsel have been able to discover, this particular matter has never been decided. It is convenient to start with a reference to the decision of this court in Webb v. Stenton (1). In that case an explanation, which I am prepared to adopt and apply, was given of the meaning of the phrase, "debts owing or accruing". The creditor there claimed by this procedure of execution to get possession of the income of a trust fund, held by trustees, in which the judgment debtor had a limited interest. The facts do not matter, but the members of this court made it plain that by the formula, "debts owing or accruing," was meant debts which were then owing, debts due in praesenti, whether or not they were immediately payable. Thus, a debt which had accrued due, but was not payable for, say, a month or until some future date, was within the phrase, "debts owing or accruing." Such a construction of the phrase enables a judgment creditor in garnishee proceedings to garnishee a debt which is payable over a number of instalments.

I turn to a consideration of the present case. It has for a long time been well established that this form of execution is available in the case of a current account with a banker. Until 1921 it was not apprehended that there was any problem involved, having regard to the contract between banker and customer, in such circumstances, but in that year there came to be decided, again in this court, Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (2). The problem of the true nature of garnishee proceedings in relation to current accounts was indirectly raised, for the question was whether the plaintiffs, Joachimson (a firm), could say that a cause of action had accrued against the defendant bank in regard to the repayment of an account in the absence of a demand made by the customer, and the Court of Appeal held that in the case of a current account a cause of action did not arise until the demand had been made. In the course of the argument the attention of the court was drawn to the question how, if that were so, were the well established garnishee proceedings in relation to current accounts to be justified, since, at any rate, in nine cases out of ten, no demand for payment would have been made at the time when the garnishee proceedings occurred. It was, I think, a serious problem, but the three members of the court (BANKES, WARRINGTON and ATKIN, L.JJ.), were undaunted by that consideration in the conclusion at which they arrived in the particular case, and said in effect: "The service of the garnishee summons should be taken as operating as a demand, and that will avoid the difficulty." Although it was not strictly necessary for them to decide the point, I think they clearly indicated that the answer to the point was as I have stated it, and, as counsel for the judgment creditor in his reply indicated, I think that the later decision of this court in Rekstin v. Severo Sibirsko &c., Co. Bank for Russian Trade (3) shows that such a view must now be taken as accepted: see, e.g., the judgment of SLESSER, L.J., in Rekstin's case (3).

Counsel for the judgment creditor in the present case contends that, if the service of a garnishee summons can operate as a demand by the judgment debtor, there is no logical reason why it should not be taken as operating as satisfaction of any other conditions such as those which apply in the case of a deposit account. I cannot accept that argument. It seems to me that the two conditions with which we are concerned in this contract—the notice, on the one hand, and the personal application with the production of the deposit book, on the other hand—are of a somewhat different character. The deposit book is the document of title to the deposit account. As other cases have illustrated, delivery of it to a third person may operate as an effective donatio mortis causa. At the same time I think it is an unnatural and wrong use of language to suggest that where, as here, a notice of withdrawal has been given, there remains only a contingent debt. If the service of the notice of withdrawal can be regarded as a demand for payment, still the bank is entitled to rely and insist on the contract which only obliges it to pay on satisfaction of the other condition. That condition may or may not be satisfied at some indefinite future time, and in the meantime the judgment creditor cannot, as it seems to me, be in a better position than the party to the contract with the bank, namely, the judgment debtor. I am not, therefore, satisfied that in such a case as the present, on the facts that I have stated, the deposit account can and should be treated, in consequence of the decision in Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (2), as a debt "owing or accruing" within the meaning of the relevant rules.

There have been other cases in which some oblique references have been made to the case of a deposit account. I cannot refrain from a brief reference to one of the earliest, Atkinson v. Bradford Third Equitable Benefit Building Society (4), for it was in that case that LORD ESHER, M.R., pointed out (25 Q.B.D. 380) that the case of money paid into a deposit account would be very different from the case he was there considering, that of money lent to a building society, and he went on to whet the appetite, without satisfying it, by saying (ibid.):

"... we shall know how to deal with it [i.e., the case of a deposit account] when it comes before us."

It did not come before the court in LORD ESHER's day, but it has come before the court now. Atkinson's case (4) was one on which it is worth pausing for a moment more. The terms of the contract with the building society to which money had been lent required that notice of a certain length of time should be given before the lender could withdraw his money, and that, when applying for the money, the lender should attend personally, or send written authority, and produce his investor's book. Notice of withdrawal was given by the lender, but he died on Jan. 14, 1879, the day on which the money became payable. On May 3, 1889, the plaintiff obtained letters of administration to the lender's estate, and on May 18, 1889, commenced an action against the society to recover the money. The building society pleaded that the claim was then barred by the Limitation Act, 1623, s. 3. The answer of the court was (inter alia) that the condition as to the production of the book by the lender or by some person with his written authority was a condition precedent to the right to receive back the money, and, as this condition had not been complied with, the statute had not begun to run at the time when the society said that it had. That case is, therefore, not entirely dissimilar from the case of a deposit account, for it showed that the special terms of the contract govern the obligation of the banker or borrower of the money to repay. It is possible to imagine other cases of a similar character. A man may lend to a company money on, say, an unsecured debenture, under which the company would only be liable to pay on the satisfaction of certain contractual terms or conditions. Until those terms or conditions have been satisfied, it would, I think, be very difficult to say that such a debt has arisen as is contemplated by R.S.C., Ord. 45, r. 1, and the County Court Rules, Ord. 27, r. 1.

O'Driscoll v. Manchester Insurance Committee (5) illustrates the opposite conclusion, for it was a case where a doctor, under certain contractual arrangements which need not be elaborated, became entitled to a certain share of an insurance pool under the National Insurance Act, 1911, the share being calculated and made payable at certain specified intervals. At the relevant date the doctor was entitled to a certain share, though its precise amount had not fallen to be computed, and it was, therefore, a case of a debt debitum in praesenti but solvendum in futuro, and, therefore, a debt within the formula that we find in the rules. The matter was stated shortly in this language by SWINFEN EADY, L.J. ([1915] 3 K.B. 512):

"It was not presently payable, the amount not being ascertained, but it was a debt to which the doctors were absolutely and not contingently entitled. The only question was as to the amount of the debt, the debt not being payable until the amount had been ascertained."

Counsel for the judgment creditor contended that, as a matter of principle, the case which is now before us should be treated as in pari materia with such a case as O'Driscoll v. Manchester Insurance Committee (5). The production of the book (he said) is a matter of mere formality. The judgment debtor has given notice to withdraw. The debt is now, in ordinary parlance, payable subject only to compliance on the part of the judgment debtor with conditions which the bank is entitled to enforce, but which amount to no more than a mere formality, for, if the judgment debtor had lost his deposit book, no doubt in the circumstances he would be able to recover payment in a court, notwithstanding. I concede that the distinctions between one class of case and another are apt to be somewhat narrow, but, still, reverting to O'Driscoll's case (5), it cannot be said in the case now before us that the only question remaining is that of amount. What is here outstanding is that the contract relating to the deposit requires certain things to be done before the bank is under an obligation to pay. I should assume from the negative results with which counsel's researches have met, as well as from reference to the text-books, that this form of execution has never been treated, during the long period when it has been available, as applicable to deposit accounts. I am much fortified in that view by the reference which counsel for the bank made to PAGET'S LAW OF BANKING. In the fifth edition, which was published in 1947, after the death of SIR JOHN PAGET [which occurred in 1938], it is stated quite clearly (ch. 6, p. 90 et seq.) that the case of a deposit account differs in this respect from the case of a current account, and that garnishee proceedings will not be available as a means of execution against a deposit account. At p. 92 it is stated:

"Apart from any question of the deposit being repayable on demand, at notice, or at a fixed period, it would seem clear that if the return of the receipt is by agreement of the parties, express or implied, made a condition precedent to withdrawal or repayment, garnishee proceedings will not lie against the deposit account."

In the corresponding passage from the first edition (1904) (ch. III, pp. 18, 19), the matter is a little more fully stated, but clearly to the same effect. That reference, I think, strongly reinforces the view that, over what is now a very long period, deposit accounts have not been regarded as liable to this type of execution.

I think that counsel for the judgment creditor is entitled to say that, before the Joachimson case (2), the distinction for this purpose between the deposit account and the current account may not, to say the least, have been clearly apprehended, but I am still of opinion, for the reasons which I have given, that it would not be right to say that the reconciliation of the decision in the Joachimson case (2) with the continuing practice of garnishee proceedings against current accounts involves today, for the first time, making that form of procedure available also against a deposit account. The judgment creditor is not, after all, left without remedy. There are other forms of execution, e.g., equitable execution by way of appointment of a receiver. I think that, on the whole and for the reasons which I have given, it would not now be right for this court to reverse a practice of such long standing. Moreover, I am not clear how far such a reversal would go and what other types of contract might then be held to be liable to a similar form of attachment and to what extent, as a consequence, third parties might be at serious risk. I, therefore, conclude that the decision of the learned judge was correct, and I think that this appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. Prima facie, it would be wrong in principle for garnishee proceedings to have the effect of putting the judgment creditor in a better position as against the garnishee than the judgment debtor himself would have been. That, so far as I can see, is exactly what we are being asked to do in the present case. The judgment debtor could not obtain payment from the bank of the money in his deposit account without making a personal application and producing his deposit book. It is now claimed that the bank, at the instance of the judgment creditor, should be compelled to make payment without compliance with those stipulations. That seems to me to be wrong in principle, and there is nothing in the authorities saying that we ought to hold otherwise. As to Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (2), approved in Rekstin's case (3), it is, to my mind, one thing to hold that a garnishee order nisi should be treated as equivalent to a simple demand by the judgment debtor in a case in which a simple demand is all that is necessary in order to make the garnishee immediately liable, and quite another thing to say that such an order is to be taken in substitution for, and as the equivalent of, such a condition or stipulation as the production of a deposit book. I agree that the appeal fails.

HODSON, L.J.: One of the terms of the contract between the debtor and the bank was that personal application must be made, and the deposit book produced, at the bank when money was withdrawn. That condition of the contract was not complied with. Counsel for the judgment creditor, in seeking to avail himself of garnishee proceedings in the county court, relied strongly on Joachimson v. Swiss Bank Corpn. (2). That case dealt with the relationship between banker and customer, and decided that, where money was standing to the credit of a customer on current account with a banker, in the absence of a special agreement a demand by the customer is a necessary ingredient in the cause of action against a banker for money lent. A distinction was drawn between the position of a bank and its customers, on the one hand, and the position of other debtors and creditors, on the other, the banker not being in the position of a debtor who was bound to find out the creditor and pay him the debt when due. The decision in that case in itself was, therefore, against the contention of counsel for the judgment creditor. However, counsel arguing the Joachimson case (2) pointed out that the decision at which the court arrived would, apparently, throw doubt on the validity of garnishee orders, and two members of the court (BANKES and WARRINGTON, L.JJ.) in clear terms ([1921] 3 K.B. 121 and 126), and the third member (ATKIN, L.J.) in less definite terms (ibid., 131), expressed the view that garnishee orders would nevertheless be good, because the service of the order nisi would operate as a demand and take the place of the demand of the customer. It could not be said that those observations were mere obiter dicta, because they were affirmed by a further decision of the Court of Appeal in Rekstin's case (3), where the point was directly raised. Therefore, it is argued that, since garnishee proceedings are not made inapplicable where certain terms of the contract have not been complied with between the customer and the bank, there is no reason why one particular term should be preferred to another. Counsel for the judgment creditor says: "As the garnishee order nisi takes the place of the demand, why should it not also take the place of the production of the deposit book?" I agree with SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., and JENKINS, L.J., that it is not right to take that further step. The authorities stop short of supporting the view that the contract between the customer and the bank should be treated as performed by the issue of the garnishee order where the step required by the contract, viz., the production of the book, has not been taken. The consequences of taking the further step contended for by the judgment creditor in this case would, I think, lead to great difficulties. I agree that this appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

KEINER v. KEINER.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Donovan, J.), February 27, 1952.]

Conflict of Laws—Contract—Law applicable—Deed executed by husband in United States—Husband resident in England—No assets in United States—Payments under deed in dollars—American law applied by deed to investment of funds—Rights of inspection exercisable in America.

By a deed executed in the State of New Jersey in the United States of America, a husband undertook to make certain payments to his wife from whom he was divorced. At that time both husband and wife were in New Jersey, but the husband was ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom and the wife in the United States. After the execution of the deed, and in consequence of it, the husband had no assets in the United States, the great bulk of his assets being in the United Kingdom. The deed provided that the payments should be made in dollars and incorporated the law of the State of New York or of New Jersey for the purpose of determining in what securities certain funds should be invested. It also created certain rights of inspection which in the normal course would be exercised in America. The husband fell into arrear with his payments and was sued by his wife in the High Court in England. In his defence he asserted that the law of the State of New Jersey was the proper law for determining the validity of the agreement. An order was made by consent for payment of £6,000 in respect of the arrears. The husband paid £2,000 in full, but when tendering the balance sought to deduct £2,754 for income tax on the whole £6,000, claiming to be entitled to do so under r. 19 and r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918.

HELD: having regard to the provisions of the deed (payment in dollars, incorporation of New Jersey law, and the right of inspection), and the assertion as to the law applicable by the husband in his pleading, the presumption that the deed was governed by the lex loci contractus was not displaced by the fact that the husband was at the time ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom and was left with no assets in the United States (the institution by the wife of proceedings in the English courts being immaterial), and the deed was governed by the law of New Jersey, and, therefore, the husband could not deduct income tax under English law by which they had not agreed to abide.

ACTION for a declaration and an injunction.

The plaintiff husband had fallen into arrears with payments which, by a deed made in New Jersey in the United States of America, he had undertaken to make to his wife, the defendant, and in proceedings brought by her in the High Court in England had consented to an order for payment of £6,000 in respect of the arrears. He paid £2,000 of that amount in full, but deducted income tax on the whole £6,000, when tendering the balance. Being threatened by the wife with execution for the sum deducted he brought an action for a declaration that the judgment obtained against him by the wife had been satisfied by the tender of the sum of £1,246 together with certificates of deduction of tax, and, alternatively, that he was entitled to satisfy the judgment by the payment of that sum. He claimed also an injunction to restrain the wife from proceeding to any execution on the judgment or otherwise to enforce it. He contended that the deed was governed by English law and that the deduction was properly made under r. 19 and r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The wife denied the right to make the deduction on the ground that the deed was governed by the law of the State of New Jersey.

Borneman for the wife.

DONOVAN, J.: Mr. Keiner, the plaintiff, was originally married to Mrs. Keiner, the defendant. The parties were divorced in or shortly before 1939. Under a deed which was executed on Jan. 7, 1939, the husband undertook to make certain payments to his wife. Those payments fell into arrear and in 1951 the wife sued her husband for the arrears in the High Court before McNAIR, J. In that action an order was made, by consent, for payment of £6,000 in respect of the said arrears. This sum was paid as to £2,000 in full shortly after the order was drawn up, but when he came to tender the balance of £4,000 the husband sought to deduct the sum of £2,754 for income tax on the whole £6,000, relying, as his authority for doing so, on r. 19 and r. 21 of the All Schedules Rules of the Income Tax Act, 1918. The wife, however, denying any such right on the part of the husband to deduct tax, threatened to levy execution for the sum of £2,754, whereupon the husband commenced this action, claiming, among other things, a declaration that he had satisfied the judgment. In her defence to the claim the wife pleaded that the proper law of this deed of Jan. 7, 1939, under which the payments become due to her, was the law of the State of New Jersey, so that the husband was not entitled to invoke All Schedules Rules 19 and 21 and deduct tax against her. A reply was delivered by the husband in which he claimed that the proper law of the contract was English.

It seemed to me, for reasons which will appear, that it was fundamental to the husband's case to show that the proper law of the contract was English law, and by agreement this issue has been dealt with first. Certain evidence was called about the husband's residence and resources which I accept and which is reflected in my findings of fact, which I can summarise in this way:—(i) at the time that the deed of Jan. 7, 1939, was executed both parties were in the State of New Jersey; (ii) the deed itself was executed and delivered in that State; (iii) at the time of such execution the husband was ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom and the wife was ordinarily resident in the United States of America; (iv) after the execution of the deed and in consequence of it, the husband had no assets in the United States of America, the great bulk of his assets being in the United Kingdom; (v) when the husband fell into arrears with his payments the wife sued him in the High Court here.

When a contract is made abroad prima facie the parties are taken to have intended the lex loci contractus to govern their rights under it, but this presumption can be rebutted by evidence of some contrary intention on their part. Counsel for the husband submits that such evidence can be found in the facts which I have numbered (iii), (iv) and (v) in the catalogue I have just read out, and he says these facts show that the parties intended English law to apply to the deed of Jan. 7. I cannot share that view. The payments under the deed were to be made in dollars; by cl. 2 the law, either of the State of New York or of the State of New Jersey, is specifically incorporated in the deed for the purpose of determining in what securities certain funds shall be invested; certain rights of inspection are created by cl. 4 which in the normal course would be exercised in America; and in the proceedings before McNAIR, J., the husband himself specifically asserted that the deed was governed by the law of New Jersey. The relevant words appear in para. 1 of his defence and they are these:

“By the law of the State of New Jersey, being the proper law for determining the validity of the purported agreement . . .”

In these circumstances I cannot accept the argument that the presumption that American law is the proper law of the contract—which presumption arises from the fact that it was executed in America—is rebutted by the circumstances to which counsel for the husband referred. In particular, the fact that the wife resorted to the English courts to enforce her rights is immaterial. She presumably had to do so because the husband was living here. I find that the law of the State of New Jersey governs this contract, and, once that conclusion is reached, I think the husband's claim must fail. For he seeks to say to the wife: “I can satisfy my obligation to pay you £6,000 by paying you £3,246 and deducting the balance as income tax.” She naturally asks: “Why is that?” and he replies: “Because English law, as represented by r. 19 and r. 21, or both, gives me that right”. Her answer to him is: “But your obligation towards me arises under the contract of Jan. 7, 1939, and both your obligations and mine, and your rights and mine, under that contract are interpreted and governed by American law, by which law we both agreed to abide. You cannot, therefore, diminish my right to get £6,000 by relying on some provision of English law by which we have not agreed to abide”. That assertion, to my mind, is unanswerable. It is erroneous to argue, as counsel for the husband does, that, being resident in the United Kingdom and paying the money from English sources, the husband is amenable to English law, and, therefore, is entitled to deduct the tax. The question at issue in this case is not what are the husband's rights and obligations vis-à-vis the Inland Revenue here. The question is: What are the rights and obligations of the parties inter se? These are to be ascertained by referring to the contract between them, in other words, to the rules by which they have both agreed to abide, and those rules are to be found in the contract itself as governed by the law of New Jersey. It may well be that if r. 21 applies to this payment—as to which I say nothing—the husband may find himself bound, vis-à-vis the Revenue here, to deduct and pay over tax on the payment, and yet have to pay the wife in full. That is not her fault. It arises, if at all, because the husband has chosen to come and live here. I think this case is the converse of the decision in Indian & General Investment Trust, Ltd. v. Borax Consolidated, Ltd. (1). Taking the view I do as to the proper law of the contract and the effect as between the parties of finding that the proper law of the contract is the law of the State of New Jersey, it is not necessary to canvass the interesting questions which would have arisen in this case otherwise, and which are indicated in the pleadings. In my judgment, this action must be dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.),

Profits Tax—Relief—Non-distribution relief—Companies ordinarily resident both within and outside the United Kingdom—Finance Act, 1947 (c. 35), s. 39 (1).

Income Tax—Residence—Dual residence—Company—Residence in countries where sufficient part of “superior and directing authority” is found.

The three taxpayer companies were ordinarily resident both in the United Kingdom and outside it. On the question whether profits tax was to be ascertained as if no net relevant distributions to proprietors had been made (i.e., whether non-distribution relief was to be given in respect of the whole of the profits and no distribution charges were to be made),

HELD: section 39 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, which provides that persons “ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom” shall be entitled to the relief stated must be construed as referring only to persons who were not also ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, and, therefore, the companies’ claims to have profits tax ascertained as if no net relevant distributions to proprietors had been made failed.

Per curiam: A finding that a company is a resident of more than one country ought not to be made unless the control of the general affairs of the company is not centred in one country, but is divided or distributed among two or more countries. The matter must always be one of degree, and residence may be constituted by a combination of various factors, but one factor to be looked for is the existence in the place claimed as a place of residence of some part of the superior and directing authority by means of which the affairs of the company are controlled: observation of SIR OWEN DIXON, J., in Koitaki Para Rubber Estates, Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (1940) (64 Commonwealth L.R. 19), approved and adopted. The question in any particular case whether or no the test is satisfied, whether such part of the “superior and directing authority” of a limited liability company is found in any country as will justify the conclusion that the company is really doing business there, and is, accordingly, there resident, is one of degree, and, therefore, one of fact, on which, if there be evidence to support it, the conclusion of the Special Commissioners will be final. Central management and control may be divided, and such division, being a matter of fact and degree in each case, is not denied by the circumstance that the supreme command, the power of final arbitrament, may be found to be, or to be predominantly, in one place.

APPEAL by the taxpayers, three companies, from an order of HARMAN, J., dated July 20, 1951, upholding the decision of the Special Commissioners of Income Tax that the companies were not entitled to have profits tax ascertained, by virtue of s. 39 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, as if no net relevant distributions to proprietors had been made.

The companies contended that, although they were admittedly ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom, they were also ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom, and that by reason thereof they fell within s. 39 (1). The Special Commissioners found that the expression in the sub-section "ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom" was not equivalent in its context to the expression "not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom", but they found against the companies on the question of fact of residence, holding that they were ordinarily resident only in the United Kingdom. HARMAN, J., dismissed the companies' appeals, holding, on the question of construction of s. 39 (1), that the words in the sub-section "ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom" were synonymous with the words "not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom" appearing in sub-s. (2). It was, therefore, unnecessary for him to decide the question of residence, but he expressed the view that the first two companies had an ordinary residence outside the United Kingdom, and that there was insufficient evidence to show whether that was so in the case of the third company. The companies appealed on the question of construction of s. 39 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, and the third company also on the question of residence.

Heyworth Talbot, Q.C., and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

Feb. 22. SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R., read the following judgment of the court. These are three appeals brought respectively by Union Corporation, Ltd., Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Co., Ltd., and Trinidad Leaseholds, Ltd., from three orders made by HARMAN, J., on July 20, 1951, dismissing their respective appeals from decisions of the Special Commissioners concerning the computation of their liabilities to profits tax. Each of the three taxpayer companies admittedly is, and has at all material times been, resident in the United Kingdom, but each of them also claims that it is, and has at all material times been, concurrently resident in a place outside the United Kingdom, namely, in South Africa as regards Union Corporation, Ltd. and Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Co., Ltd., and in Trinidad as regards Trinidad Leaseholds, Ltd.

Each of the three appeals raises the same two questions: (i) whether, on the assumption that a company is shown to have been ordinarily resident in a place outside the United Kingdom throughout a given chargeable accounting period, it is, on the true construction of s. 39 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, entitled to the benefit of that provision in the computation of its liability to profits tax, as having been "ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom" throughout the relevant chargeable accounting period within the meaning of s. 39 (1), notwithstanding that it was admittedly also ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom throughout the same period, and (ii) if the answer to the first question is in the affirmative, whether, having regard to the circumstances in which, according to the authorities, dual residence can as a matter of law properly be inferred, the company is on the facts of the case shown to have been throughout the relevant period ordinarily resident in the place outside the United Kingdom claimed as its second or concurrent place of residence.

The effect of the Special Commissioners' decision in each of the three cases was: (i) as regards the first question, that residence in a place outside the United Kingdom throughout a given chargeable accounting period would, if established, entitle the company to the benefit of s. 39 (1), notwithstanding the admitted fact of concurrent residence in the United Kingdom throughout the same period, but (ii) as regards the second question, that the test of dual residence in their view deducible from the authorities precluded them as a matter of law from holding that the company was on the facts of the case shown to have been ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom as claimed, concurrently with its admitted residence in the United Kingdom. The claims of the three companies to the benefit of s. 39 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, accordingly failed before the Special Commissioners.

The learned judge (who took the convenient course, also adopted in this court, of hearing the three cases together and combining them in a single judgment) differed from the Special Commissioners on both questions, but nevertheless arrived at the same result, for he held (in effect): (i) as regards the first question, that on its true construction s. 39 (1) did not apply to a company ordinarily resident in a place outside the United Kingdom throughout a given chargeable accounting period if it was also ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom during the same period, or, in other words, that the condition of residence outside the United Kingdom required by s. 39 (1) postulated absence of residence in the United Kingdom, and, accordingly, was not satisfied in a case of dual residence by proof of residence in a place outside the United Kingdom concurrently with residence in the United Kingdom, and (ii) as regards the second question (on which he thought it right to express his view, although his decision on the first question concluded the appeals against all three companies, and made it strictly unnecessary for him to do so) that the Special Commissioners had misapprehended the effect of the authorities as regards the circumstances in which dual residence can as a matter of law properly be inferred, and that, judged by the true test deducible from the authorities when properly understood, the facts as found by the Special Commissioners in the cases of Union Corporation, Ltd., and Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Co., Ltd. sufficed to establish the dual residence in South Africa as well as in the United Kingdom claimed by them respectively, but that as regards Trinidad Leaseholds, Ltd. the facts so far found were not sufficient to warrant the same course, and he would, had he reached a different conclusion on the first question, have thought it necessary to remit the case to the Special Commissioners for further consideration.

We are now invited to reverse the learned judge's decision on the first question, and to adopt his views on the second. On the part of Trinidad Leaseholds, Ltd. we are asked to go further and to hold its claim to dual residence established on the facts as already found, dispensing with the remission to the Special Commissioners which the learned judge would have thought it necessary to direct. It is unnecessary for the purposes of the present appeals to discuss in any detail the intricacies of the profits tax legislation. The tax was first imposed by the Finance Act, 1937, under the name of national defence contribution as a tax at a uniform rate on profits, whether distributed or not, sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2) of the charging section (s. 19 of the Act of 1937), as amended by the Finance Act, 1942, s. 36 (1), and sched. IX, being in these terms:

"(1) There shall be charged, on the profits arising in each chargeable accounting period falling within the years of charge to the national defence contribution from any trade or business to which this section applies, a tax (to be called the 'national defence contribution') . . . (2) Subject as hereafter provided, the trades and businesses to which this section applies are all trades or businesses of any description carried on in the United Kingdom, or carried on, whether personally or through an agent, by persons ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom."

The tax, originally introduced for a period of five years, was continued indefinitely by s. 36 (1) of the Finance Act, 1942. Its name was changed to profits tax by s. 44 of the Finance Act, 1946.

A radical alteration in the character of the tax was made by the Finance Act, 1947, which introduced an entirely new feature in the shape of discrimination between distributed and undistributed profits. By s. 30 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947, as amended by s. 7 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, the rate of profits tax was increased to twenty-five per cent. By s. 30 (2) of the Finance Act, 1947, as amended by s. 7 (2) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, relief was granted at the rate of fifteen per cent. on the amount of any excess of profits chargeable to tax for any chargeable accounting period over the amount of profits distributed for that period. Conversely, by s. 30 (3) of the Finance Act, 1947, as amended by s. 7 (2) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, an additional charge at the rate of fifteen per cent. was made on the amount of any excess of profits distributed for any chargeable accounting period over the profits chargeable to tax for that period.

The broad effect of the provisions thus briefly summarised was, therefore, to charge profits tax at the rate of twenty-five per cent. on distributed, and ten per cent. on undistributed, profits; and these were the rates in force during the periods relevant to the present appeals. By s. 31 of the Finance Act, 1947, trades or businesses carried on by individuals, partnerships of individuals, and persons acting as personal representatives, were exempted from the tax, and its scope (save in certain special cases probably rare in practice) was thus in effect limited to trades or businesses carried on by corporate bodies. The Act also contains elaborate provisions, which need not for the present purpose be considered in detail, but to which some further reference is made hereafter, for exempting from further liability to tax profits received by way of distribution by one profits-tax paying concern from another (termed in the Act "franked investment income"), and for excluding the appropriate proportion of any franked investment income in computing the amount of any taxable distribution made out of profits which include franked investment income.

Reference should now be made to s. 39 of the Finance Act, 1947, and as the first question in these appeals turns on the true construction of sub-s. (1) of this section, while its remaining provisions have been relied on in argument as aiding one way or the other in the solution of that problem, it had better be read in full.

"(1) Where the person carrying on a trade or business is ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom throughout a chargeable accounting period, the profits tax payable by that person shall be ascertained as if no net relevant distributions to proprietors had been made in the case of that person for that period. (2) Where a trade or business is carried on by a body corporate and, throughout a chargeable accounting period, both the following conditions are fulfilled, that is to say—(a) that that body corporate is ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom; and (b) that another body corporate which is not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom controls, directly or indirectly, not less than one half of the voting power in the first-mentioned body corporate, distributions to that other body corporate shall be left out of account in determining, in relation to the first-mentioned body corporate, the net relevant distributions to proprietors for that period. (3) Where the franked investment income of a person includes income received from a body corporate ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom to which sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2) of this section applies, the preceding provisions of this Part of this Act relating to the determination of the net relevant distributions for any period by reference to the gross relevant distributions therefor shall have effect subject to the following modification, that is to say, that any reference therein to the profits for the period (not being a reference to profits computed without abatement and including franked investment income) shall be construed as a reference to the first-mentioned profits increased by the said income received from the said body corporate."

The first question to be determined depends on the construction of the word "outside" in s. 39 (1). The companies contend that the word has a wide meaning which does not exclude other residence inside the United Kingdom, whereas the Crown contends for a narrower construction, making residence outside the United Kingdom exclusive of residence inside the United Kingdom. It was conceded that for present purposes the word "ordinarily" adds nothing to the word "resident". Having regard to the language chosen by Parliament in s. 39 the question is not an easy one, but, apart from a special context, we think that the word "outside" has naturally an exclusive meaning, and in its ordinary application has a negative import as opposed to the positive import which the word "inside" possesses. When, however, it is attached to such a word as "residence", and when it is remembered that a person may be resident in two places at the same time, the purely negative import of the word "outside" is not so obvious. Nevertheless, we agree with HARMAN, J., in thinking that the exclusive is still the prima facie meaning of the word. To speak of residence inside the United Kingdom is to make a positive assertion of fact. To speak of residence outside the United Kingdom is merely to contradict the fact of residence inside the United Kingdom, without any positive assertion of any other particular residence. The research of counsel was directed to finding examples of the use of similar words in a taxing statute when it could be said with certainty that the word "outside" had been used in the exclusive or purely negative sense. No satisfactory illustration was given, except one taken from r. 12 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D. Here it is conceded that the phrase "persons resident outside the United Kingdom" must necessarily connote

the exclusion of persons residing inside the United Kingdom. When we come to the particular context here involved the question of construction is rendered difficult by the change of language in s. 39 (2) (b) where the words used are not "ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom" but "not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom".

The companies contend, first, that the change of language must be regarded as deliberate, and shows that, whereas the words used in sub-s. (2) (b) are plainly exclusive, the words used in sub-s. (1) are not exclusive of residence inside the United Kingdom. In the alternative they argue that the problem goes beyond the sphere of difficult construction and becomes one of ambiguity. They rely on the judgment of POLLOCK, B., in Clifford v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) approving a passage in MAXWELL ON STATUTES, 1st ed., which read as follows ([1896] 2 Q.B. 193):

"Statutes which impose pecuniary burdens are subject to the rule of strict construction. It is a well settled rule of law that all charges upon the subject must be imposed by clear and unambiguous language, because in some degree they operate as penalties. The subject is not to be taxed unless the language by which the tax is imposed is perfectly clear and free from doubt."

The companies, then, contend that the ambiguity must be resolved in favour of the taxpayer. As to this we have, after the exhaustive argument addressed to the court on behalf of all parties concerned, arrived at the conclusion that there is no ambiguity in the sense contended for and that the difficulty is one of construction which can and should be overcome. And in any case, the section is primarily a relieving section and not a taxing section.

We return to the first point. Change of language in itself is not a necessary support for an argument that meaning is changed: see Congreve v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2). LORD SIMONDS, in discussing in that case ([1948] 1 All E.R. 952) the use of the words "by means of" and "by virtue or in consequence of" in s. 18 of the Finance Act, 1936, both phrases being in close proximity to one another, refused to draw a fine distinction, and concluded that the difference of language was there sufficiently explained by the wish of the draftsman not to use the same expression twice. We admit that, if the Crown is right, the change in terminology is open to criticism as a matter of drafting, but we think it is easy to see (on the Crown's view) how it may have come about. The Act reads in s. 39 (2) (a) "that that body corporate is ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom", and then continues in s. 39 (2) (b) "that another body corporate which is not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom", etc. In drafting (a) and (b) together it seems natural enough to add the word "not" before the words "ordinarily resident" rather than to look back to see what form of words was used in s. 39 (1) to describe the same thing. We are not, then, persuaded that the change of language in s. 39 (2) displaces what we regard as the prima facie meaning of the words "resident outside the United Kingdom" in s. 39 (1). On the other hand, we think that assistance can be gained from a consideration of the language of s. 39 (3).

The first two companies contended that the words in s. 39 (3)

refers to the body corporate in sub-s. (2) (b). That contention is accepted by the Crown, and prima facie it supports their submission that the words "ordinarily resident outside" in sub-s. (3) are synonymous with the words "not ordinarily resident in" in sub-s. (2) (b). The Crown thus endeavour in part to meet the contention based on change of language. Counsel on behalf of the first two companies retorts that this reference carries the matter no further, since reference to sub-s. (2) (b) in sub-s. (3) may be to a limited class of corporations already included in the wider language of the latter sub-section. Sub-section (3) is concerned with what is called "franked investment income". This phrase is defined in sub-para. (1) (A) of para. 7 of sched. IV to the Finance Act, 1937, as amended by s. 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1947. Without attempting a complete or precise exposition, the purpose and effect of these provisions are to avoid double payment of the tax (at the full rate) when and to the extent that the profits of one body corporate (liable to the tax) consist of "investment income" directly or indirectly received from another body corporate which has, in respect of that income, already become liable to tax at the full rate. Both sub-s. (1) and sub-s. (2) of s. 39 of the Act of 1947 make provision for reducing the rate of tax in certain cases—sub-s. (1) in the case of all the taxable profits of a body corporate "ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom", and sub-s. (2) in the case of a body corporate "ordinarily resident inside the United Kingdom" which is controlled as to not less than half its voting power by a body corporate not ordinarily resident inside the United Kingdom, to the extent of the profits distributed to the latter body. It is reasonably clear, then, in our view, that what sub-s. (3) is designed to do is to provide that where income or profits, in respect of which the rate of tax has been reduced by virtue of sub-s. (1) or sub-s. (2), would in the hands of another body corporate be entitled to be treated as "franked investment income" under the earlier provisions of the Act, then that other body corporate is, quoad such income or profits, disentitled to the relief it would otherwise obtain. As regards the reference in sub-s. (3) to sub-s. (1) no difficulty seems to arise. The phrase "to which sub-s. (1) . . . applies" is in all respects appropriate. As regards sub-s. (2), however, the language used in sub-s. (3) is much less clear and on any view the drafting must be regarded as somewhat inelegant. For sub-s. (2) is dealing with the case of a body corporate ordinarily resident inside the United Kingdom—albeit having the characteristic that not less than fifty per cent. of its voting power is controlled by a body corporate not ordinarily so resident. The taxpayer companies are then confronted with a dilemma. If the word "applies" in sub-s. (3) has, quoad sub-s. (2), its ordinary significance, then the only body corporate to which sub-s. (2) "applies" is one ordinarily resident, not outside, but inside, the United Kingdom. To avoid this difficulty the word "applies" must be read as "refers". This is the horn of the dilemma preferred by counsel for the first two taxpayer companies, and although, as we have already said, it is no doubt possible as a matter of language to regard sub-s. (3) as intending, by its reference to sub-s. (2), to identify a sub-class (as it were) of bodies corporate ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom, namely, those that are not also ordinarily resident inside the United Kingdom, it is a singularly oblique method of achieving that end, to say the least; and if the word "applies" must for this purpose be read as equivalent to "refers", then the far more natural sense of the language, in our judgment, is that "ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom" and "not ordinarily resident inside the United Kingdom" are treated as synonymous.

Counsel for the third company so far recoiled from this result that he grasped the first horn of the dilemma. He insisted that the word "applies" must, quoad sub-s. (2), be correctly used and read. But this conclusion is, we think, even less happy for him than was the alternative preference of counsel for the first two companies, for, as we have already observed, sub-s. (2) applies not to a body corporate ordinarily resident outside the United Kingdom but to a body corporate ordinarily resident inside the United Kingdom. To make sense, therefore, of the provision at all, sub-s. (3), on the argument of counsel for the third company, must be treated quoad sub-s. (2) as intended, by an even greater obliquity than demanded by the alternative construction, to be referring to a body corporate ordinarily resident inside the United Kingdom which is also ordinarily resident outside it, and (by what must be admitted to be a queer caprice) to be taking away the benefit introduced by s. 32 of the Act of 1947 from a person who has received as "franked investment income" income received from that body corporate and not income received from the body corporate referred to in sub-s. (2) (b). Notwithstanding that, relief in regard to the rate of tax has been given by sub-s. (2) to distributions to the latter body corporate and not to the former.

In our judgment, the complexities and anomalies which either of the arguments of counsel for the companies require are such as to make it impossible to attach significance to the change in expression from "ordinarily resident outside", on the one hand, to "not ordinarily resident inside", on the other. In other words, the inelegance of language and the mental contortions which are otherwise forced on the reader point strongly, in our judgment, to the solution that the two expressions are and were intended to be synonymous. We think, therefore, on the whole that the argument of the Crown has persuasive force and that the natural reference to sub-s. (2) in sub-s. (3) is to the body corporate not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom mentioned in sub-s. (2) (b), so that "ordinarily resident outside" in sub-s. (3) is synonymous with "not ordinarily resident in" in sub-s. (2) (b).

We think, however, that support for the Crown's contention (apart from the prima facie meaning of the word "outside") is also to be found in the structure of the legislation by which the profits tax is imposed. The normal dichotomy in the taxing acts is between persons residing in, and persons residing out of, the United Kingdom. We use the word "normal" to show that we have not overlooked the fact (pointed out by counsel for the third taxpayer company) that the Act of 1947 introduced a new conception, namely, differential rates of profits tax according to whether profits were distributed or not, and that the distinction is not one wholly between resident and non-resident, since under s. 39 (2) relief is given to a person who is resident in this country. The distinction does, however, appear in s. 19 of the Finance Act, 1937, which first imposed the national defence contribution. The taxpayer companies were made subject to the tax by the Act of 1937, and if it had been intended by s. 39 (1) of the Act of 1947 to give persons resident not only inside but also at the same time outside the United Kingdom relief already given by the same section to persons residing exclusively outside the United Kingdom the legislature would, in our opinion, have said so in terms. In our judgment, the words of s. 39 (1), construed in their natural meaning, in their context, and against the background of the taxing acts generally, can only properly be construed in the sense contended for by the Crown, so that the companies, being resident inside, cannot claim the benefit conferred by the section on persons resident outside, the United Kingdom.

Before leaving this part of the case it is desirable that we should refer to one sentence used by HARMAN, J., which has been the subject of criticism in this court. He said:

"It is, however, to be observed that 'not resident in' in sub-s. (2) (b) is used as the opposite to 'resident in' in sub-s. (2) (a) and that the latter must mean 'resident in and nowhere else'."

We are unable to assent to this statement, since, once it is conceded that a company may be resident in two places, the positive finding that a company is resident in the United Kingdom does not, according to the natural sense of the words, exclude a finding that the same company is also resident outside the United Kingdom. In so far, therefore, as the learned judge found support for the construction he placed upon the language of s. 39 (1) in the language of sub-s. (2) (a) and sub-s. (2) (b), we should not follow him.

Having regard to the conclusion at which we have arrived on the first question, it becomes, in strictness, unnecessary for us to express our view on the second. But it has been most fully and elaborately argued before us, and we have been informed by learned counsel that those who are engaged in the practice and administration of income tax law have now for more than twenty years been vexed by the problem, and have awaited an opportunity for its determination by the court. Both the Special Commissioners and HARMAN, J., have given their opinions on it, and the present case may well be considered by the House of Lords. In the circumstances we have thought it right to state our own conclusions. The short question at issue may conveniently be posed, at this stage, in reference to one of the three companies—say, Union Corporation, Ltd., and so posed it may, indeed, seem at first sight simple enough. This large corporation, incorporated according to the laws of the Union of South Africa, having its registered office in Johannesburg in that country, has an issued share capital of more than £1,000,000, and controls the activities of sixteen subsidiary companies, thirteen of them incorporated in South Africa and managed by the company from Johannesburg, two of them incorporated in England, and the last in Mexico which, like the English companies, is managed from London. In addition the company acts in secretarial and technical capacities for a number of other companies, most of them incorporated in South Africa, in which country the company's services are performed. More than two-thirds of the company's staff is in South Africa. A minority of the board of directors resides in South Africa. Meetings of the board, or of committees of the board, take place in South Africa, but on matters of policy or otherwise generally affecting the company's affairs the supremacy rests with the board in London. It follows that the real and ultimate control over the company's activities is to be found in London, where the majority of the directors reside and act, and of the large revenue which the company enjoys more than one half (as appears from the Case Stated) may fairly be taken to be earned in England or outside the Union.

We have given but a brief summary of the functions and activities of Union Corporation, Ltd. They are fully analysed in the Case Stated, but the summary is sufficient for our present purpose. Where, on these facts, is Union Corporation, Ltd. "ordinarily resident"? Or, since it is conceded on both sides that in the present case the adverb is without significance, where is it "resident"? We have put the question deliberately in that form since it is also conceded, and must in any event since Swedish Central Ry. Co., Ltd. v. Thompson (3) be taken as established, that an incorporated company may for income tax purposes have more than one residence. But though we think the question is properly put as we have posed it, the circumstances have presented it to us in slightly different form. The company being admittedly resident in England, is it resident also in South Africa? For residence in England has throughout been conceded on the company's behalf, and having regard to the existence and exercise of final and effective control by the directors in London, to the presence or "abiding" in London (to anticipate the formula recurring time and again in the many cases cited) of "central control and management"—we deliberately omit the definite article as tending to beg the question—the company's advisers could do no other.

The words "residing" and "residence", whether applicable to a natural or an artificial person, are nowhere defined in any of the relevant Income Tax or Finance Acts. There is no indication in such legislation that the significance of the words is to be determined by reference to any particular facts or circumstances. So far as the words apply to a natural person, it is established that they are to be construed according to their natural and ordinary import: see per VISCOUNT SUMNER in the Egyptian Delta Land & Investment Co., Ltd. v. Todd (4) ([1929] A.C. 27) citing Inland Revenue Comrs. v. Lysaght (5) ([1928] A.C. 249). On the other hand, it is obvious that a body corporate, a persona ficta, cannot appropriately be said to "reside" at all in the same and ordinary sense as an individual. Physical presence and its normal manifestations, e.g., of eating and sleeping, are absent in the former case. The relevant legislation has, however, over a long period applied the test of "residence" indifferently to natural and artificial persons. The sense of the words must, therefore, as respects a body corporate, be derived, as LORD LOREBURN, L.C., observed in his much quoted opinion in De Beers Consolidated Mines, Ltd. v. Howe (6) ([1906] A.C. 458), from analogy. But the analogy involves no mere technicality, no great mystery or mental strain; it leaves, we should have thought, room for common sense. Still the words remain, "residing" and "resident". There is, as we have said, no substitution in the statutes in the case of a body corporate of a new and elaborate formula, the precise terminology of which requires to be construed by the court.

If, then, this were the whole matter, we should for our part have been much inclined to say, on the facts as we have summarised them and regarding the first company's activities and functions as best we could by sensible analogy to those of an individual trader, that, if Union Corporation, Ltd. resided in the United Kingdom, it resided also in the Union of South Africa, since there are ample manifestations of its presence in both places and it truly does business in both countries, or at least we should have been inclined to hold that the question was one of fact to be conclusively determined in a broad man-of-the-world sense by the Special Commissioners. Unfortunately, so simple an approach and so easy a solution are not possible. And the Special Commissioners attempted no such matter of fact determination, but concluded, after a most careful summary of the numerous authorities, that in the circumstances of the present case the (admittedly correct) concession of a London residence negated as a matter of law the existence of a residence elsewhere.

During the thirty years between 1875 and 1905, the span covered at its extremes by the decision of the Exchequer Chamber in the Ottoman Bank case (A.-G. v. Alexander (7)) and the decision of the House of Lords in the De Beers case (6), the courts undoubtedly worked out and enunciated a rule or principle for determining where, for purposes arising under sched. D of the Income Tax Acts, a limited company resided. The rule found classical expression in LORD LOREBURN'S words ([1906] A.C. 458) in the De Beers case (6)—"where the central management and control actually abides". Thereafter, and before the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), this enunciation was thrice affirmed in the House of Lords in American Thread Co. v. Joyce (8), in New Zealand Shipping Co., Ltd. v. Thew (9), and in Bradbury v. English Sewing Cotton Co. (10). And it must now be taken also, since the case of Egyptian Delta Land & Investment Co., Ltd. v. Todd (4), as clear that the rule or principle was and is equally applicable to companies incorporated in the United Kingdom and to companies incorporated outside the United Kingdom (see [1929] A.C. 25 of the report of that case). But nowhere in any of the authorities from the Ottoman Bank case (7) until the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3) was it decided—nor was it material to decide—whether the test, if satisfied as regards one country, was exclusive of residence in another. There are many judicial dicta favouring the possibility of dual residence—for example, KELLY, C.B., in Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson (11) (1 Ex.D. 445); CHANNELL, J., in Goertz & Co. v. Bell (12) ([1904] 2 K.B. 146); PHILLIMORE, J., in the De Beers case (6) ([1905] 2 K.B. 632); BUCKLEY, L.J., in American Thread Co. v. Joyce (8) (106 L.T. 175), and elsewhere.

But the truth was that at the time of the De Beers case (6), as VISCOUNT SUMNER said in the Egyptian Delta case (4) ([1929] A.C. 23):

" . . . and for twenty years afterwards it was assumed, that a limited liability company could not have two residences for income tax purposes; either it resided abroad or it did not."

We are, therefore, disposed for ourselves to think (with all respect to certain language of VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3)) that if LORD LOREBURN and the other noble lords who participated in the De Beers decision (6) had been asked if the test there formulated was exclusive in its effect, they would have answered affirmatively, because the possibility of dual residence by a limited liability company for tax purposes was not then in contemplation. But whether our surmise be right or wrong, it is beyond doubt that none of the cases referred to ever so decided.

So the question arose for the first time in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), and in that case—equally beyond doubt—the House of Lords answered the question affirmatively, and decided that a limited company which was admitted to reside in Sweden (where its board of directors, in fact, met to conduct the company's business) could still have, and did have, at the same time an English residence also for income tax purposes. But it is, we think, impossible to avoid the conclusion that the opinions in that case, on the face of them, went further than merely to assert the validity of the proposition that a limited liability company might contemporaneously reside in more than one country, and that there was evidence sufficient to justify the finding by the Special Commissioners that the Swedish Central Railway Company resided in the United Kingdom as well as in Sweden. The opinions lend strong support to the view that, even where the "central control and management" were concentrated exclusively in one country, still concurrent residence in another country might exist, based on not much more than the facts of incorporation and registration in that other country, together with such further activities as were necessary to maintain the registration in accordance with the local law. It will be necessary for us hereafter to state more fully the facts in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), and to refer to certain language used by LORD CAVE on which the companies in the present cases have particularly relied. But it is pertinent at this place to state first that both ATKIN, L.J., and LORD ATKINSON dissented from the conclusion of the majority in the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords respectively, and maintained that the rule enunciated in the De Beers case (6) was exclusive in its effect; and, secondly, that LORD SUMNER, though expressing no reasons of his own, assented to the conclusion proposed by LORD CAVE. If, therefore, on the facts of the present case having been presented to us for our opinion before the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), we should have felt bound by the authority of the De Beers case (6)—contrary to our own inclination as above intimated—to answer the question posed adversely to the companies' arguments, after the decision of the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3) we should have felt no less bound to express the opposite conclusion.

Four years later, the Egyptian Delta case (4) came before the House of Lords. In that case, as in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), residence in a country outside the United Kingdom was admitted, but it was contended that, although beyond a peradventure the central control and management abided wholly in Egypt, the mere fact of incorporation and registration in the United Kingdom, together with the performance there of such other formal or administrative functions as were essential by the law of England to maintain such registration, sufficed to give to the company English residence also. HARMAN, J., was of opinion that in the Egyptian Delta case (4) the House of Lords did not reside in any respect from the opinions it had expressed in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), and, so far as concerns the matters strictly decided in the latter case, no doubt the House did not do so and could not have done so. But we have found it impossible to avoid the conclusion that LORD SUMNER, in the course of his long analysis of the previous decisions, and particularly of the decision in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3) itself, did at least substantially qualify, and intend to qualify, some of the dicta in the last mentioned case and the inferences to which, unqualified, they must inevitably have led. In support of this view we refer particularly to the attention directed by LORD SUMNER to the dissenting judgments of LORD ATKINSON and ATKIN, L.J., in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), and to the emphasis placed by LORD SUMNER, LORD BUCKMASTER and LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE on the language of r. 7 of All Schedules Rules to the Income Tax Act, 1918, which had not been previously noticed.

The question presented to the House of Lords for decision in the Egyptian Delta case (4) was of a limited character—whether the company, being admittedly resident in Egypt, could in the circumstances already mentioned properly be held also to have an English residence. But as it had been with VISCOUNT CAVE in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), so the speech of VISCOUNT SUMNER was not confined to giving a negative answer to the question posed. He “trod again the weary road of the tax cases” and elaborately analysed previous decisions, and particularly the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3). As a consequence, on certain passages of his speech, the Crown have relied with no less zeal than have the companies on their chosen sections of the speech in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3). The result has been that the language of both these speeches and of LORD LOREBURN’s speech in the De Beers case (6) has at times been subjected to a closeness of scrutiny more appropriate to the examination of the words of a statute in course of interpretation by the court. This process has, we think, run the risk of doing less than justice to the speeches in question which were intended only to express the speakers’ reasons for the conclusions at which they arrived in the particular circumstances before them.

What, however, is the result? The view of the Special Commissioners was that in the case of a limited company engaged in active business operations (like each of the taxpayer companies but unlike the Swedish Central Railway Company) residence in more than one country could only be found if the supreme command, as it were, over the company’s affairs, “the central control and management”, was in truth divided so as to be equally, or substantially equally, present in both countries: as if, in Union Corporation Limited’s case, the board of directors in England and South Africa were equally, or substantially equally, balanced, and board meetings in each country possessed and exercised a like authority, or, as if a company’s single board of directors divided its presence, energies and functions correspondingly between two countries. We agree with HARMAN, J., in rejecting this view. It is clear that mere registration and mere performance of those acts which the English law relating to limited companies (and corresponding laws in other countries) require to be done to maintain registration do not constitute such activities as are by analogy equivalent to the activities which, in the case of a natural person, establish residence. It is, we think, no less clear that the mere presence in a country of physical assets belonging to a company and the conduct of substantial productive or other business operations on the company’s behalf by its managing or other servants will not suffice, if the control of all those operations and of the general affairs of the company is elsewhere, for otherwise it would follow (and the argument of counsel for the third company seemed, indeed, at times to go so far) that a company would reside in every country where substantial business activities were being in fact conducted on its behalf. The company may be properly found to reside in a country where it “really does business”, that is to say, where the controlling power and authority which, according to the ordinary constitution of a limited liability company, is vested in its board of directors, and the exercise of that power and authority, is to some substantial degree to be found. In our judgment, the formula “where the central power and authority abides” does not demand that the court should look and look only to the place where is found the final and supreme authority.

We have on this difficult question derived great assistance from the judgment of SIR OWEN DIXON, J., in the Australian case of Koitaki Para Rubber Estates, Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (13), where the same problem was fully considered by that learned judge and by the full High Court of Australia. We cite one paragraph from DIXON, J.’s, judgment (64 C.L.R. 19):

“The better opinion, however, appears to be that a finding that a company is a resident of more than one country ought not to be made unless the control of the general affairs of the company is not centred in one country but is divided or distributed among two or more countries. The matter must always be one of degree and residence may be constituted by a combination of various factors, but one factor to be looked for is the existence in the place claimed as a residence of some part of the superior or directing authority by means of which the affairs of the company are controlled."

We accept and respectfully adopt that passage as accurately stating the solution of the problem. The question in any particular case, whether or no the test is satisfied, whether such part of the "superior and directing authority" of a limited liability company is found in any country as will justify the conclusion that the company is really doing business there, and is, accordingly, there resident, is one of degree, and, therefore, one of fact, on which, if there be evidence to support it, the conclusion of the Special Commissioners will be final.

Of the cases decided before the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3) we do not find it necessary to refer to any but the De Beers case (6), to which we have already many times referred. The De Beers Company, like Union Corporation, Ltd., had been incorporated in South Africa where a substantial mining business was conducted in its name. But, as in the case of Union Corporation, Ltd., the majority of its directors resided in England, where the superior and directing authority over the company's affairs was undoubtedly exercised. The question—and the only question—involved in the case was whether in the circumstances the company resided in England for income tax purposes. The relevant part of LORD LOREBURN'S judgment must be quoted in full ([1906] A.C. 458):

"In applying the conception of residence to a company, we ought, I think, to proceed as nearly as we can upon the analogy of an individual. A company cannot eat or sleep, but it can keep house and do business. We ought, therefore, to see where it really keeps house and does business . . . The decision of KELLY, C.B., and HUDDLESTON, B., in the Calcutta Jute Mills Co. v. Nicholson (11) and the Cesena Sulphur Co. v. Nicholson (11), now thirty years ago, involved the principle that a company resides for purposes of income tax where its real business is carried on. Those decisions have been acted upon ever since. I regard that as the true rule, and the real business is carried on where the central management and control actually abides. It remains to be considered whether the present case falls within that rule. This is a pure question of fact to be determined, not according to the construction of this or that regulation or bye-law but upon a scrutiny of the course of business and trading."

In that passage LORD LOREBURN was, in our judgment, answering two distinct questions—first, what were the activities or functions of a body corporate, an artificial person, which by analogy corresponded to those human functions or activities which in the case of a natural person might constitute "residence"? , and, second, what (for the purpose of providing the answer to the question raised in the case before him) extent or degree of those activities or functions on the part of an artificial person would suffice to establish "residence"? To the first question LORD LOREBURN'S answer was—"keeping house and doing business", not, be it observed, doing business alone, for otherwise, as we have already stated, a limited company might be said to reside in every country where any substantial business was being done in its name though it remained, in DIXON, J.'s phrase in Koitaki Para Rubber Estates, Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (13), a mere "absentee owner". To the second question LORD LOREBURN'S answer was—where those activities are "really" performed, where the company "really keeps house and does business". And the significance of the essential adverb is supplied by the later paraphrase "the real business is carried on where the central management and control actually abides". The form of the language was determined by reference to the particular question which the House was called upon to determine and by the circumstance that the possibility of dual residence was then neither contemplated nor relevant.

in such a context the test formulated amounts, in our judgment, to no more and no less than the test stated by DIXON, J., in the Australian case.

In the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3) the facts were that the railway undertaking owned by the company had at the material date been leased to another company in Sweden, so that its business activities were for practical purposes limited to the receipt of the contractual rentals. All meetings of directors as well as of shareholders were held in Sweden, but there was a secretary in London and a banking account in London and the company's seal was kept in London, where all transfers of shares were made or registered. It was conceded that the company was resident in Sweden, but the question was whether (as the Crown alleged) the company was also resident for the purposes of schedule D in the United Kingdom. According to the judgment in the Egyptian Delta case (4) of LORD SUMNER, who was, as we have noted, a member of the House which heard the appeal in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), the character of the activities performed in Sweden and England respectively were never discussed at the Bar ([1929 A.C. 16]):

" . . . in the static condition of the company's affairs [the business done in England] was not much less important than the Swedish part . . . as things were, little had to be done anywhere except 'administration', as is often the case with companies, and that was fairly divided between the two countries."

Nevertheless, VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., and the majority of the House proceeded to determine the case on the basis that the central control and management of the company's affairs was to be found, and found (as we think) exclusively, in Sweden. That fact did not, however (they held), negative concurrent residence in England, nor did it invalidate the finding of the Special Commissioners that the company also resided in England. LORD CAVE said ([1925] A.C. 501):

"The effect of this decision is that, when the central management and control of a company abides in a particular place, the company is held for purposes of income tax to have a residence in that place; but it does not follow that it cannot have a residence elsewhere. An individual may clearly have more than one residence: see Cooper v. Cadwalader (14); and on principle there appears to be no reason why a company should not be in the same position. The central management and control of a company may be divided, and it may 'keep house and do business' in more than one place; and, if so, it may have more than one residence."

The passage on which the companies here most strenuously relied is that which occurs later (ibid., 505):

"In the present case it was found by the commissioners that, while the business of the company was controlled and managed from the head office at Stockholm, so that the company would in the contemplation of English law have a residence in Sweden, the company was resident in the United Kingdom for the purposes of the Income Tax Acts; and it was hardly disputed that, assuming that a company can have two residences, there was sufficient material upon which that finding could be based. I am not at present prepared to say that registration in the United Kingdom would itself be sufficient proof of residence here; that point does not arise in this case, and I express no opinion upon it. But, however that may be, I am satisfied that the fact of registration, together with the other circumstances which were found by the commissioners to exist, were sufficient to enable them to arrive at their finding."

In the Egyptian Delta case (4) the facts were similar to those in the preceding case save that (i) the business of the company was not "static" but consisted of active trading operations in Egypt, and (ii) the residual activities of the company in England were confined to such purely "administrative" functions only as were necessary to comply with the requirements, in order to sustain the company's continued registration in England, of the Companies (Consolidation) Act, 1908. The Crown contended—relying particularly on the Swedish Central Ry. Co. decision (3)—that the company was, as a matter of law, resident in England as well as in Egypt for income tax purposes and so the revenue judge and the Court of Appeal had both determined. VISCOUNT SUMNER and the other noble lords who were then associated with him (LORD ATKINSON, LORD BUCKMASTER and LORD WARRINGTON OF CLYFFE) decisively rejected that proposition. We have already cited certain comments by LORD SUMNER on the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3), but the whole of the following passage should be quoted ([1929] A.C. 16):

“ All that was decided in the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3) was that the company could have two residences, one in England as well as one in Sweden. Your Lordships were not asked to decide more. It is true that by admission the controlling power over the business was in Sweden, but other business was done in London the character and importance of which, though set out in the case, was not discussed at the Bar. It was a matter of degree on the facts and your Lordships cannot be deemed to have come to some unexpressed conclusion on that ground merely because you did not for yourselves declare either that there was no evidence of business carried on in England or that there was no need to discuss the carrying on of business because the effect of registration was conclusive. Nor is it decisive of the point to say now that the business done in England was only administrative. It was in fact, a good deal more, and in the static condition of the company's affairs, it was not much less important than the Swedish part. If new questions arose the Swedish directors could settle them, but as things were, little had to be done anywhere except ‘administration’, as is often the case with companies, and that was fairly divided between the two countries. I would particularly draw attention to the powerful judgments of my noble and learned friend LORD ATKINSON and of ATKIN, L.J., as showing how strong are the grounds for saying that since the De Beers case (6) the test of taxable residence for any company has been settled to be the carrying on of business here and not the bare operation of the Companies (Consolidation) Act.”

Having so restricted the effect and significance of the Swedish Central Ry. Co. decision (3), the noble lord then proceeded to his review of the authorities up to and beyond the De Beers decision (6). To do justice to its sense and its reasoning, the whole speech must be read. In our judgment, it involved, essentially, an unhesitating affirmation of the validity and authority of the test expounded by LORD LOREBURN in the De Beers case (6) (ibid., 20):

“ Then in 1906 the De Beers case (6) . . . was decided in terms which in my opinion render it conclusive of the present issue.”

Again (ibid., 25): “ I submit that, even technically, the De Beers case (6) is a binding authority today.”

In our judgment, therefore, LORD LOREBURN's test emerges supreme and authoritative, subject only to the rider or corollary that since a limited liability company can contemporaneously have more than one residence (a thing not contemplated by LORD LOREBURN) his analogy to a natural person demands that central management and control may be divided, and that such division, being a matter of fact and degree in each case, is not denied by the circumstance that the supreme command, the power of final arbitrament, may be found to be, or to be predominantly, in one place. The Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3) emerges as a decision justified by its peculiar facts and an authority consequently limited, but at least it renders it no longer possible to satisfy the test of residence by reference only to the country where final control abides or to assert that when for that reason residence in one country is conceded residence elsewhere cannot co-exist.

There remains the Australian case to which we have already alluded—Koitaki Para Rubber Estates, Ltd. v. Federal Commissioner of Taxation (13). In that case, Australian residence being admitted, it was claimed that the company resided also in Papua. But in that country, though substantial productive business was conducted by the company—i.e., by the company's servants in the company's name—there existed no part of the company's "superior or directing authority". DIXON, J., said (64 Commonwealth L.R. 18):

"From the point of view of that territory [i.e., Papua] [the company] is simply an absentee owner of a rubber estate managed by an attorney under power in its name . . . It may be conceded . . . that in respect of the conduct of the plantations a full measure of responsibility is placed in the attorney or manager. But his responsibility, however full, is confined to what may broadly be described as the production and shipment of rubber and does not extend to the control of the general or corporate affairs of the company, to matters of policy or of finance. All control seems to me to be centred in Sydney."

It was held, accordingly, that the company had failed to establish residence in Papua, and we respectfully agree with that decision. We have already expressed our concurrence with the conclusion of DIXON, J., and with his formulation of the proper test, and we are content to adopt the whole of his judgment and reasoning with one slight exception. Where the learned judge has discussed the Swedish Central Ry. Co. case (3) and refers to the conclusion that the Swedish Central Railway Company was resident in Sweden and in England, he is reported as saying (ibid., 21):

"But VISCOUNT CAVE, L.C., clearly stated that the reason was that there was a division between the two countries of the 'central management and control'."

With all respect, we have difficulty in accepting this view. Although we think that the explanation of the case by LORD SUMNER in the Egyptian Delta case (4) produces, in effect, that result, nevertheless, the passage which we have cited above from LORD CAVE's speech seems to us to show that, in his opinion, residence in England could be supported, though the "central control and management" was concentrated in Sweden. That view was not, however, essential to the decision, as LORD SUMNER interpreted it. This small matter cannot be said to affect DIXON, J.'s, decision or the reasoning on which it was based, and that decision was affirmed by the full High Court. SIR GEORGE RICH (Acting C.J.), in his short judgment, was content to accept the judgment of DIXON, J. He said (64 C.L.R. 244):

"In Papua the company's operations fall into an auxiliary or subordinate position of a purely local as opposed to a central nature."

The judgment of WILLIAMS, J., as we read it, might be said to revert to a more strict interpretation of the original formulation of principle in the De Beers case (6). But any divergence between him and DIXON, J., in this respect was immaterial for the purpose of answering the particular question there before the court. WILLIAMS, J., observed (ibid., 250):

"In order that a company may acquire a residence in two countries for the purposes of income tax . . . the central management and control must be divided between such countries so as to 'abide' in them both. The company through the central control is then metaphorically speaking bodily present and residing by analogy in both countries."

We do not, in the circumstances, read that passage as meaning that such dual residence can only be established where the final or supreme authority is found to be divided.

We have, therefore, reached upon this matter the same view as that entertained by HARMAN, J. In such a matter as this the precise formulation of the test must be a difficult matter. According to him, it is “essential that both features of the phrase ‘keeps house and does business’ must be present. ‘Keeping house’ will thus refer to administrative management and ‘doing business’ to trading activities. Where both are found the conditions are satisfied.”

For our part we feel some doubt whether it is right to treat the phrase “keeping house” as referring only to administrative management, but we think that the sense of the learned judge’s test is the same as that which we have attempted to formulate and the same as that stated by DIXON, J.—in other words, that there must, in order to constitute residence, be not only some substantial business operations in any given country, but also present some part of the superior and directing authority. We prefer, accordingly, to state the matter as we have done, but we agree with HARMAN, J., that the question of the extent of the superior or directing authority required (as well as of the business operations being performed) is one of fact to be determined by the Special Commissioners.

It only remains, accordingly, to apply the test, as we have stated it, to the three companies. As we earlier observed, the Special Commissioners treated themselves as bound in law to reject the companies’ claim for dual residence, and, therefore, expressed no conclusion of fact on the matter of degree. They did, however, in the Stated Cases, fully record their findings in regard to the relevant circumstances affecting each of the three companies. It seems, therefore, proper that the court should now express its own view of the result. As regards Union Corporation, Ltd. the facts which we have earlier summarised seem to us clearly to justify the conclusion, if our test is correctly formulated, that the company has a residence in South Africa as well as in England. It was conceded before us that the position of Johannesburg Consolidated Investment Co., Ltd. is in all material respects the same as that of Union Corporation, Ltd., and a similar result follows accordingly. We agree, therefore, with HARMAN, J., as regards both these companies.

The case of Trinidad Leaseholds, Ltd. presents greater difficulty, and HARMAN, J., was of opinion that this case should be referred back to the Special Commissioners for their opinion. On the whole, however, it seems in the circumstances right for this court to express its conclusion. The findings of the Special Commissioners cover in great detail the nature of the various operations and activities performed by or on behalf of this company in England and elsewhere, and it does not seem to us that any further investigation could usefully be undertaken. The company was incorporated in England and all its eight directors now reside in England, where all formal board meetings take place as well as the general meetings of the company, and where the secretary resides. The main business of the company is that of winning, refining and dealing in petroleum and other mineral oils in Trinidad, and there is no doubt that in that island it possesses property of great extent and value. The issued capital, very largely represented by these assets in Trinidad, is no less than £1,639,432. Its very considerable operations in Trinidad are in charge of a manager who, under a power of attorney from the board of directors, has the widest powers and responsibility. Still, if the matter rested there, the case would seem to us in principle to be the same as the Australian case. The company would be an “absentee owner” and there could not be found in Trinidad any part of the superior and directing authority. But, although the supreme control is undoubtedly exercised at the meetings of the company’s directors in England, it is clear that in practice the chairman, managing director, and other directors pay frequent visits to Trinidad for the purpose of exercising their supervision and a large measure of control over the policy and general affairs of the company. In the words of the Stated Case:

"Frequent visits are made by the chairman and other executive directors and officials of the company to Trinidad, and important decisions are taken by members of the board when there."

Reference is also made to the evidence of the secretary of the company, which the Special Commissioners accepted and which was to a like effect. Thus:

"Important decisions were taken in the course of these visits (to Trinidad), minutes being taken of the various meetings and conferences before the director or directors concerned left Trinidad and being sent to London. In many aspects of the company's business it was important to go into matters with the technical side of the management in Trinidad, particularly as regards drilling and oil production."

On these facts it seems to us that there is sufficient to justify the conclusion that Trinidad Leaseholds, Ltd., is resident in Trinidad as well as in London. On this part of the case, therefore, we are of opinion that each of the three taxpayer companies is able to make good its claim to residence outside the United Kingdom as well as within the United Kingdom. But their success in this matter avails them nothing, having regard to our view on the first question raised in the appeals, which must be dismissed accordingly.

Appeals dismissed.

HAYWARD v. MARSHALL. WINCHESTER v. SHARPE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), February 27, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—"Separate dwelling"—Sole use of unfurnished rooms—Sharing of other living rooms—Right to draw water and boil clothes in kitchen—Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920 (c. 17), s. 12 (2).

Unfurnished rooms were let with the right to use the kitchen and scullery for the purpose of drawing water and to use the gas stove for boiling the washing once a week.

HELD: in deciding whether the rights over the kitchen amounted to the sharing of the kitchen within the principle of Neale v. Del Soto ([1945] 1 All E.R. 191) the court must consider not merely the character of the room over which the rights were exercised, but also the character of the rights exercised; the use of a room for purposes other than "living purposes" did not amount to a sharing of a living room; drawing water and boiling washing were not "living purposes"; and, therefore, the tenants were entitled to the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts.

APPEALS by tenants from two orders of His Honour JUDGE LEON, made at Windsor County Court, dated Dec. 5, 1951. The landlords claimed possession of premises consisting of two and three unfurnished rooms respectively with the right to draw water from the kitchen at all reasonable times, and in one case the right to use the gas stove for boiling the washing once a week. The judge held that there was a sharing of the kitchen within the principle of Neale v. Del Soto (1) and made orders for possession. The tenants appealed.

C. H. Duveen for the tenants.

Gordon Hardy for the landlords.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I will ask HODSON, L.J., to deliver the first judgment.

HODSON, L.J.: These are two appeals from His Honour JUDGE LEON sitting at Windsor County Court on Dec. 5, 1951, in possession cases in which he gave judgment in favour of landlords against tenants who claimed that they were protected by the terms of the Rent Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1939. The question to be determined on the appeals was correctly stated by the county court judge in his judgment when he said that the whole crux of the matter was whether what was let to the tenant in each case was let as a separate dwelling, having in mind s. 12 (2) of the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, which says:

“ This Act shall apply to a house or a part of a house let as a separate dwelling . . . ”

In the first case, HAYWARD v. MARSHALL the material facts found are these. In July, 1939, the tenant was let three unfurnished rooms and had no right to use the kitchen in the house which she had previously had, except for the following two specified purposes, namely, for the drawing of water at all reasonable times for all purposes and once a week to use the gas stove for the purpose of boiling her washing. In the second case, WINCHESTER v. SHARPE, the facts were not essentially different. The number of rooms was two instead of three, and the right to use the kitchen and scullery was only for the purpose of drawing water and not, as in the other case, for the purpose of using the gas stove for boiling washing. The learned judge said that, if the matter had been free from authority, he would have found that each of these tenants had separate dwellings which were protected, but he said there were decisions which compelled him to decide these cases against the tenants.

The question which has to be considered in the appeals first came before the Court of Appeal in Neale v. Del Soto (1), in which the only judgment, with which the other learned lords justices agreed, was delivered by MORTON, L.J. In that case under an oral agreement the tenant was let two unfurnished rooms in a seven-roomed house, together with the use jointly with the landlord of the garage, kitchen, bathroom, lavatory, coalhouse, and conservatory, and it was held that there was really a sharing of the house, each party having the exclusive use of some rooms and the two parties together having the use in common of other rooms, and there was, therefore, not a letting of the two rooms as a separate dwelling within the meaning of the sub-section of the Act to which I referred. The first point to be noticed is that MORTON, L.J., was dealing with the matter as a question of fact, the county court judge having found the facts in this way ([1945] 1 All E.R. 192):

“ I find as a fact from the evidence, as also appeared in the rent book before it was altered, that what was let was two unfurnished rooms for the sole use and occupation by the applicants and the garage, kitchen, bathroom, lavatory, coalhouse and conservatory for use and occupation by them jointly with the respondent . . . when, as in this case, a person has got in a lease at a rent two rooms and the use in common with the owner of other rooms such as the kitchen, that is a sole tenancy of two rooms and a joint tenancy, as it were, of the other rooms, since he has a right to use them in every way, not merely as an accessory to something else'."

At the end of his judgment, MORTON, L.J., used this language (ibid., 193):

" . . . I am satisfied on the facts of this case that the county court judge's decision was right . . . and this appeal ought to be dismissed."

In the course of his judgment, he had answered the question: Were the two rooms in question in the present case "a part of a house let as a separate dwelling?" in this way: He said (ibid.):

"In my view, they were not. What was let was the two rooms together with the use in common with the owner of the house of the garage, kitchen, bathroom, lavatory, coalhouse and conservatory . . . it would be a misuse of language, to my mind, to say that the two rooms and nothing more were let as a separate dwelling. The real substance of the matter is that there was a sharing of this house; each party had the exclusive use of some rooms and the two parties together had the use in common of certain other rooms."

That decision gave rise to a consideration of the problem when rooms which were part of a house were not living-rooms, and the matter was again considered by MORTON, L.J., in Cole v. Harris (2). In that case the landlord let to the tenant three rooms, consisting of a bedroom, living-room and kitchen, on the first floor of a dwelling-house, together with the joint use, with the landlord and the tenant of the second floor, of a bathroom and water closet. It was held by MORTON and MACKINNON, L.JJ., that there was a demise of the three rooms as a separate dwelling and not a mere sharing of the whole house. It was difficult to define, as a matter of legal principle, the dividing line between the two classes of case, but the most satisfactory formula seemed to be to say that, if there was a sharing of essential living-rooms (which would include the kitchen), there would not be a demise of the premises as a separate dwelling-house. MORTON, L.J., examined the matter very closely and used this language ([1945] 2 All E.R. 152):

"I think that the true test, where the tenant has the exclusive use of some rooms and shares certain accommodation with others, is as follows: there is a letting of part of a house as a separate dwelling, within the meaning of the relevant Acts if, and only if, the accommodation which is shared with others does not comprise any of the rooms which may fairly be described as 'living rooms' or 'dwelling rooms'. To my mind a kitchen is fairly described as a 'living room', and thus nobody who shares a kitchen can be said to be tenant of a part of a house let as a separate dwelling."

Then he drew a distinction in considering the bathroom and the water closet as being rooms which were visited only on occasions and could not fairly be classed as living-rooms.

Cases have come before the county courts from time to time in which the question has arisen as to what is a sharing within the meaning of the decision in Neale v. Del Soto (1). We have not actually been referred to the decisions, but we were told that in cases rather like this case county court judges have taken the view that sharing does not extend to a bare right of passage through a room, nor to a right to use a kitchen only for scullery purposes or for bathing in the bath it contains. For my part, I see nothing in the decisions of Cole v. Harris (2) and Neale v. Del Soto (1) to lead one to the conclusion that the mere use of a room for purposes other than what might be described as living purposes amounts, in the ordinary use of language, to sharing the room. The mere fact that a person who lives in the house is allowed to go into the kitchen, whether to draw water, or, indeed, to have a bath there, would not be properly an illustration of a sharing of the room. The kitchen is a room which is normally used for cooking and for living in. The mere right of access to the room does not seem to me to be properly described as a sharing of the room.

I should, perhaps, refer to one or two other cases which seem to me to support this view, as indicating that, at any rate, MORTON, L.J., who again had to consider the problem, or an analogous problem, in Kenyon v. Walker. Stevenson v. Kenyon (3) took this view. In considering the use of a kitchen which was used for cooking purposes only he said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 598):

"After all, the primary purpose of a kitchen is for cooking, and in this case there is no doubt that the use of the kitchen, at any rate for that primary purpose, was shared by the parties. It seems to me that the present case comes both within the wording of the test as I expressed it and as it was expressed by MACKINNON, L.J. [In Cole v. Harris (2)] I said: 'nobody who shares a kitchen can be said to be tenant of a part of a house let as a separate dwelling'."

We were referred to Winters v. Dance (4), in which a judgment was delivered by TUCKER, L.J. The question there was whether a kitchenette, which was so small as to be unsuitable for any purpose except that of cooking itself, could come within what might be described as the Neale v. Del Soto (1) principle. TUCKER, L.J., said that the authorities indicated ([1949] L.J.R. 169):

"... that in ascertaining whether or not there has been a letting of part of a dwelling-house as a separate dwelling, or whether there has been a sharing of the house, one of the tests is: does the tenant share one of the essential living-rooms? It is to be observed that nowhere in the cases referred to have judges used the word 'sitting-room'; the word is 'living-room'. I think that the basis of the decisions is that a room which is used for the primary purpose of cooking is a living-room . . ."

There is nothing in those cases which, in my view, supports the conclusion at which the county court judge arrived. Counsel for the landlords, in endeavouring to support the judgment, has relied on two more recent cases, which are not directly in point, but which, he says, tend to support the view, first of all, as is no doubt right, that there is no distinction between a licence to use the kitchen and a sharing of the kitchen—in other words, that the relationship between the landlord and the tenant cannot be altered by calling the right to share the kitchen a mere licence to use the kitchen. He says that it follows from what was said by LORD REID in Baker v. Turner (5), that once you have established any right in a tenant to use the living-room for any purpose apart from a purpose which might be described as de minimis, then that tenant is in a position of sharing the room so as to lose the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts. In particular, he relies on a passage where LORD REID said ([1950] 1 All E.R. 854):

"It is, perhaps, easier to say what is not a separate dwelling than to say what is one. In Neale v. Del Soto (1), the owner of a house, in addition to letting two rooms to a tenant, gave him the right to share the use of other rooms including the kitchen."

Then he refers to another case, and he says he has no doubt the decision in Neale v. Del Soto (1) is correct. He goes on (ibid.):

"If a tenant has to share with another person a living room which is not let to him, it is, in my view, impossible to find anything which is let to him as a separate dwelling. It cannot be the let rooms plus the right to use the other room, because that other room is not let to him at all—he is only a licensee there. And it cannot be the let rooms alone, because his having to share another room shows that the let rooms are only a part of his dwelling place."

Counsel for the landlord referred, in addition, to a judgment of LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE in Rogers v. Hyde (6), where counsel for the landlord had put forward the argument that there was really for this purpose no distinction between a sharing and a licence, and that was accepted by LORD ASQUITH in these words ([1951] 2 All E.R. 83):

“ . . . I accept the argument of counsel for the landlord in its essentials so far as they are applicable in this case. The grantee of a licence to use a kitchen seems to me to differ in name only from the grantee of a right to ‘share’ or use it in common with the landlord . . . If we decided otherwise, the effect of Neale v. Del Soto (1), which has been accepted by the House of Lords, could be circumvented in every case by simply substituting the word ‘licence’ for ‘share’ or for ‘right to use in common’.”

In my judgment, what is said by LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE and by LORD REID does not touch the question in this case, which is whether there is, according to the ordinary use of language, a sharing of the kitchen. The county court judge having indicated that, if he had felt unfettered by authority he would have found there was no sharing, in my opinion, it is the duty of this court to reverse his finding on the ground that there is nothing in the authorities to which we have been referred and to which he referred in his judgment which forces him to find the facts in an opposite way. These appeals should be allowed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The judge, in his judgment in HAYWARD v. MARSHALL, in which he gave his reasons for deciding both cases as he did, thus stated his view of the law deducible from the authorities:

“ If you let to a tenant two rooms and (save for the one qualification which I will mention) the use for any purpose of another room, it does not seem to me that the premises let to the defendant can be said to be let as a separate dwelling, as long as the principle laid down in Neale v. Del Soto (1) is accepted. I said there was a qualification. There are in fact two qualifications. In the first place, it has been held by the Court of Appeal that if the room of which use is given is a bathroom or lavatory or a box room or something of that sort, that does not prevent the letting as a whole from being a letting of a separate dwelling. That is the decision in more than one case in the Court of Appeal, and naturally I shall follow it, although I am bound to say I do not fully understand the principle of those cases once the principle in Neale v. Del Soto (1) is accepted as being correct.”

With respect to the judge, I cannot regard that passage as correctly stating the law. The effect of the line of authorities in this court, beginning with Neale v. Del Soto (1), is simply that it cannot be said that a part of a house is let to a tenant as a separate dwelling if his contract of tenancy includes a right of sharing, as distinct from the exclusive possession of, some essential part of the living accommodation provided under the contract of tenancy. The judge's way of stating the law produces a very different result, for his view is that, if a tenancy of some of the rooms in a house includes the right to use for any purpose another room not itself included in the tenancy, then (apart from cases of “de minimis”) the application of the Rent Restrictions Acts is excluded, whatsoever the nature of the right may be, if the room over which it is exercisable can be described as forming part of the essential living accommodation comprised in the house as a whole. In my view, there is no warrant for that at all. In such a case the first question to ask is: “Is there under this contract a sharing of some room not actually included in the tenancy?” If that question is answered: “No”, then no further question arises. If that question is answered: “Yes”, there arises the further question: “Is that room part of the essential living accommodation?” In my view, both those questions must be capable of an affirmative answer to bring the principle of Neale v. Del Soto (1) into play at all.

In the two present cases, the rights held by the county court judge as sufficient to oust the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts consisted, in the one case, of the right of drawing water in the kitchen, with an additional right of using the gas stove in the kitchen weekly for the purpose of boiling the wash, and, in the other case, simply of the right of drawing water in the kitchen. I cannot regard the rights over the kitchen in either case as rights amounting to a sharing of the kitchen. They do not extend, as I understand them, to using the kitchen as such, to using the kitchen as part of the living accommodation provided under the contract of tenancy. They are simply rights in the nature of easements, in no way distinguished by reference to the character of the room over which they are exercised. The right of drawing water is no different in kind because the tap happens to be in the kitchen than it would be if the tap was in some out-house not itself included in the tenancy. Similarly, the right of boiling clothes in the kitchen seems to me not essentially different from a similar right given with respect to a copper in an out-house not itself included in the tenancy. These rights, in my view, clearly do not amount to rights to the use of the kitchen as part of the tenants' living accommodation.

It must never be forgotten in these cases that this is the decisive test, as was clearly shown by MORTON, L.J., in Cole v. Harris (2), where, after quoting from his judgment in Neale v. Del Soto (1), he said this ([1945] 2 All E.R. 151):

"It cannot be that any sharing of any room, however unimportant, takes the property outside the operation of the Act. The words may be susceptible of that construction, but so to construe them would be to defeat, to a large extent, the purpose of the Act. For instance, take a case in which an entire floor of a house is let to a tenant, and there is no sharing of any room, except that the tenant is allowed, in common with the landlord, to store his boxes in an attic. It seems to me quite contrary to the intention of the Act to exclude from its operation a letting of this nature, where the tenant is, I think, 'dwelling' in a 'separate' part of the house."

So, here it seems to me that the tenant cannot rightly be held not to be dwelling in a separate part of the house merely because the tenancy carries with it the right to fetch water from the kitchen or to carry out a weekly boiling of wash on the gas stove in the kitchen.

As has been pointed out by HODSON, L.J., I think it is reasonably plain that in Kenyon v. Walker (3) MORTON, L.J., recognised that not merely the character of the room over which rights are exercised but also the character of the rights exercised over it were material in considering whether there was a sharing. I need not read at length the passage to which HODSON, L.J., has already referred. It is the passage where MORTON, L.J., dealing with the tenant's argument based on the fact that in that case the kitchen could only be used for the purpose of cooking, said this ([1946] 2 All E.R. 598):

"To my mind, ingenious though the argument is, we should be introducing an unwarrantable extra refinement into the test which has been already laid down by this court if we accepted that argument. After all, the primary purpose of a kitchen is for cooking, and in this case there is no doubt that the use of the kitchen, at any rate for that primary purpose, was shared by the parties."

If the law had been that any right over a kitchen not capable of being discounted by reference to the maxim "de minimis" amounted to a sharing of the kitchen, it seems to me that this passage in the judgment of MORTON, L.J., would hardly have been appropriate, and that, if he had wished to lay down any such principle, he would simply have said: "It matters not that the right over the kitchen here was limited; any right given to a tenant over a kitchen not itself included in the tenancy amounts to a sharing of the kitchen". As the passage actually stands, he clearly implied that the character of the right over the kitchen was a material factor. In my view, it clearly is, and must be, a material factor.

I have only to add that I have listened with attention to the interesting argument for the landlords and, notwithstanding his submission to the contrary, can find nothing in the speeches of the House of Lords in Baker v. Turner (5), in any way inconsistent with my conclusion that the county court judge in these two cases misconceived the effect of the authorities and misdirected himself in law, the true questions to be asked and answered being, not merely whether there was some right given over the kitchen in either case, but whether the right given did amount to a sharing of the kitchen. As appears clearly from his judgment, if he had considered the matter untrammelled by the view he had formed of the law, he would have answered the second of those questions in the negative. Accordingly, in my view, these appeals should be allowed.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I am of the same opinion. I agree with counsel for the landlords that the question to be determined in all cases of this character is whether the person against whom possession is claimed, whom I will call the defendant, is shown to be a tenant of premises let to him or her as a separate dwelling. In arriving at the answer to that essential question, the courts have laid it down (and I do not refer again to the cases to which already my brethren have made reference) that where, as regards some part of his or her living accommodation, the defendant is shown to have no more than a right or licence to share that part in common with the landlord, a negative answer to the question is given, because, in consequence of that finding, the living accommodation of which the defendant is the tenant is incomplete. The result, I think, depends on the proposition that a sharing which disentitles the defendant to the protection of the Act is a sharing of living accommodation as such. Hence is found the distinction between the cases of sharing a kitchen, on the one hand, and those of sharing a bathroom or lavatory on the other. It does not, I think, help to solve the problem merely to give to a kitchen the label of "living-room". The distinction rests rather on the view that the ordinary uses and purposes of a kitchen are essential manifestations of living or residence, so that if a tenant of rooms has to rely on some licence for the exercise of those essential manifestations, he is not, as I have said, the tenant of a separate dwelling. In my judgment, it does not follow, nor do I think have any of the cases so decided, that any common user (other than such as can be disregarded on the principle of de minimis) is equivalent to a sharing. The question, then, is: Is there in any particular case, in truth, a sharing, that is, a right in common with other persons to use a living-room as such? That seems to me, prima facie, to be a question of fact and of degree. In this case, as my brethren have pointed out, the judge did find as a fact that there was no such sharing. The result, in my judgment, is that both appeals should be allowed.

Appeals allowed.

PARVIN v. MORTON MACHINE CO., LTD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Normand, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone and Lord Cohen), January 15, 16, March 6, 1952.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Duty to fence machinery—Machinery manufactured in factory—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 14 (1), s. 16, s. 20.

The respondents were the owners of a factory engaged in the manufacture of machinery. The appellant, who was under eighteen years of age, was employed by the respondents in the factory as an apprentice fitter. While cleaning a dangerous, but unfenced, part of a machine which had been manufactured in the factory, he was injured. He claimed damages for the breach by the respondents of their statutory duty under s. 14 (1), s. 16, and s. 20 of the Factories Act, 1937.

HELD: on the true construction of s. 14 (1), read in conjunction with s. 12 and s. 13 of that Act, the words "any machinery" did not apply to machines within the factory which were products of the manufacturing processes carried on in the factory, and, therefore, the duty securely to fence dangerous machinery laid on occupiers of factories by s. 14 (1) and s. 16 and the prohibition against young persons cleaning dangerous machinery provided by s. 20 did not apply, and the respondents were not liable to the appellant under those sections.

FOR THE FACTORIES ACT, 1937, s. 14 (1), s. 16 and s. 20, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 9, pp. 1009, 1011 and 1013.

APPEAL by a workman from an order of the Second Division of the Court of Session (LORD THOMSON (Lord Justice-Clerk), LORD JAMIESON and LORD PATRICK), dated June 23, 1950, affirming an order of the Lord Ordinary (LORD STRACHAN), dated Jan. 5, 1950, whereby he held that the respondents were not liable to the workman (their employee) for breach of s. 14 (1), s. 16, and s. 20 of the Factories Act, 1937, when the appellant was injured while cleaning a machine which had been produced in the factory for sale. The respondents' contentions that the sections were intended to apply only to machinery in use in the factory, and not to manufactured products of the factory, were upheld by both courts.

Beney, Q.C., and J. G. Wilson (of the Scottish Bar) for the appellant.

Calver, Q.C., and Sloan (both of the Scottish Bar) for the respondents.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 6. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, the appeal submits for decision a novel question on the construction of the Factories Act, 1937. It is whether the provisions of s. 14 (1), s. 16 and s. 20 of the Act apply to machines or machinery manufactured in the factory or only to machines or machinery for use in the factory in the processes of manufacture or as ancillaries to these processes. There is no reported case in which this question has been decided. The same question might have arisen under the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and, though it is not necessary to decide the point, I see no reason to differ from the opinion of LORD PATRICK that there is no difference material to this question between the language of the Act of 1901 and the language of the Act of 1937.

The facts as averred are simple. The appellant, a minor employed by the respondents as an apprentice fitter, was instructed by one of the journeymen fitters to clean a dough-brake which had been manufactured and assembled in the respondents' factory. The dough-brake consists of a flat table six feet long and twenty-two inches wide divided into two equal parts by a pair of rollers each of them twenty-two inches wide. One roller is placed with its upper surface flush with the table surface, and the other is mounted directly above it at a height which can be adjusted according to the required thickness of the dough which is passed between the rollers while they are revolving. The rollers are driven at a speed of forty revolutions a minute by an electric motor built in under the table. A guard is provided which is so designed that it can come down on the side of the rollers where the nip-in may happen to be according to the direction of the rotation of the rollers. Before the appellant began to clean the dough-brake the fitter had removed the guard in order to adjust it and had set the brake in motion. While the appellant was working, a rag held by him was drawn between the rollers and after it his hand and forearm. He sues both on negligence at common law and on breach of the duties imposed by s. 14 (1), s. 16 and s. 20 of the Act. His averments of negligence were held to be relevant by the Lord Ordinary and issues have been approved. The respondents did not reclaim against that part of the Lord Ordinary's interlocutor. On the other hand, the Lord Ordinary held the averments of breach of statutory duty irrelevant, and he, therefore, repelled the appellant's plea-in-law directed to them and sustained quoad them the respondents' plea to relevance. The appellant reclaimed against this part of the interlocutor and the Second Division of the Court of Session unanimously refused the reclaiming motion and adhered.

My Lords, I agree with the learned judges in the courts below that s. 14 (1), s. 16 and s. 20 of the Factories Act, 1937, do not apply to machines within the factory which are the products of the manufacturing processes carried on in the factory. Section 14 (1) provides:

"Every dangerous part of any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery, shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced: Provided that, in so far as the safety of a dangerous part of any machinery cannot by reason of the nature of the operation be secured by means of a fixed guard, the requirements of this sub-section shall be deemed to have been complied with if a device is provided which automatically prevents the operator from coming into contact with that part."

If the sub-section applies to the dough-brake, it must follow that s. 16, which deals with the construction and maintenance of the guard required by s. 14 (1), will apply. So, also, will s. 20, which provides:

"A woman or young person shall not clean any part of a prime mover or of any transmission machinery while the prime mover or transmission machinery is in motion, and shall not clean any part of any machine if the cleaning thereof would expose the woman or young person to risk of injury from any moving part either of that machine or of any adjacent machinery."

For the purposes of this case the parties were agreed that "machine" and "machinery" could be regarded as interchangeable terms. For the appellant it is contended not only that "any machinery" in s. 14 (1) and likewise "any machine" in s. 20 are words capable of applying to the dough-brake, but that in their ordinary literal meaning they do so apply. It would be difficult to dispute this contention in the abstract. But the context must be looked at and I find in the context supplied by s. 12 and s. 13 compelling reasons for construing the word "machinery" in s. 14 (1) as denoting only machinery used for production. It is necessary to notice the inter-relation of the three sections. Section 12 deals with prime movers, s. 13 with transmission machinery, and s. 14 (1) with "any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery". If it can be shown that the prime movers and the transmission machinery are prime movers and transmission machinery used as part of the factory equipment for its manufacturing processes, it is a logical inference that "any machinery other than prime movers and transmission machinery" means any other machinery used in the factory for or ancillary to its manufacturing processes. Now s. 12 (1) deals with flywheels directly connected with prime movers and with every part of any prime mover not excepted by sub-s. (3) "whether the flywheel or prime mover is situated in an engine-house or not". It is apparent from these words that the sub-section applies to a flywheel or prime mover which may be in the factory engine-house and, therefore, part of the factory equipment. Sub-section (2) deals with the head and tail race of every water-wheel and of every water-turbine, and these must necessarily be part of the factory plant. Sub-section (3) excepts from the operation of sub-s. (1) electric generators, motors and rotary converters if they are in such a position or of such a construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as they would be if securely fenced. The implication of sub-s. (3) is that the machinery excepted may have a permanent position in the factory which in itself secures safety. This sub-section also appears to be concerned only with machinery which is part of the factory equipment. Section 13 is throughout dealing with "the transmission machinery". The use of the definite article is unintelligible unless the transmission machinery is the transmission machinery used in the factory for its processes of manufacture. LORD PATRICK's judgment puts the argument in a clear light when he says that s. 12 and s. 13 obviously are concerned with plant used in manufacture and that s. 14 then naturally follows, to include the rest of the machinery used in the process of production.

These considerations conclude the case against the appellant. For s. 16 can apply only if s. 14 (1) applies, and in s. 20 the division—prime movers, transmission machinery and any machine—corresponds to and repeats the division of machinery in ss. 12 to 14. It appears to me that there is no ambiguity or difficulty in construing the sections founded on by the appellant and that it is quite unnecessary to have recourse to presumptions or maxims which may be an aid to construction when there is ambiguity or doubt. I, therefore, propose to say nothing about the judicial observations cited to us on the proper approach to the construction of ambiguous phraseology in remedial statutes or in penal statutes. Nor do I find it necessary to rely on certain other sections in the Act which are referred to in the judgments of the courts below or which were referred to in the argument. It is true that other sections in the Act are by their terms restricted to premises, plant or equipment of the factory, yet, it might be said, if that were all, there would be no necessary inconsistency in giving to the words "any machinery" in s. 14 (1) their literal and natural meaning and applying them to machinery within the factory which was the product of the factory. But I cannot find that any of the provisions of Part II of the Act apply to any machinery except machinery which is part of the factory and used in the manufacturing processes, and I think that none of them applies to machines made in the factory. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD REID: My Lords, in this case your Lordships are only concerned with the alleged breach of statutory duty by the respondents. The case for the appellant can be thus stated shortly:—Section 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, requires that every dangerous part of "any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery", shall be securely fenced except in circumstances which did not exist in this case. The appellant, while in the respondents' employment and doing work in the respondents' factory which he had been instructed to do, was injured by a dangerous, but unfenced, part of a machine which was in the factory, and that dangerous part was neither a prime mover nor transmission machinery. The respondents' answer can be stated equally shortly. They manufacture machinery in their factory and this machine had been manufactured by them for sale and was not part of the equipment of their factory. They contend that s. 14 (1) only applies to machinery which is part of the equipment of a factory.

A number of arguments on both sides were based on inferences to be drawn from other parts of the Act and on general canons of construction. I do not think that these considerations afford much assistance in this case. The scope of s. 14 (1) must be determined by examining its terms and particularly the first part of it

“Every dangerous part of any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery . . .”

The reason why prime movers and transmission machinery are excepted is plainly because these kinds of machinery are dealt with by s. 12 and s. 13 respectively. If one looks at the terms of s. 13 one can hardly doubt that the scope of that section is limited to transmission machinery which is part of the equipment of the factory and the terms of s. 12 strongly suggest a similar limitation of its scope. If the appellant is right, Parliament has not provided any statutory protection where a prime mover or transmission machinery is present in a factory but is not part of its equipment, but it has provided statutory protection when other machinery is so present in a factory. In other words, the word “machinery” where it first occurs in s. 14 (1) has a different scope from that which it has where it next occurs—in the first case “any machinery” includes machinery which is not part of the factory equipment; in the second case “machinery” in the phrase “transmission machinery” does not. I can find nothing in the context to justify this difference. Section 12, s. 13 and s. 14 must be read together, and I think that, in the absence of any indication of a contrary intention, their scope must be held to be similarly limited.

I have had an opportunity of reading the speech which my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, has just delivered and I agree with it. In my opinion, this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, I agree.

LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE: My Lords, I agree with the opinions expressed by my noble and learned friends. The case turns substantially on the construction of the words “any machinery” in the first line of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1937. Construed quite literally, these words would, no doubt, include almost anything, for instance, a bicycle or motor car casually left on any premises. But the Act applies only to factories (s. 149). A “factory” connotes a place in which things are made, and by the definition in s. 151 of the present Act it includes a place where they are “repaired”, “adapted for sale”, and the like. When in such a statute “machinery” of, or in, such a factory is spoken of, prima facie the expression surely relates to the machinery by which the things in question are made, repaired, or adapted for sale, and not to the things themselves, even if those things themselves consist also of machinery. The assumption that such a limitation is intended is, in my view, strongly reinforced by the collocation—the architecture, if that expression may be allowed—of s. 12, s. 13 and s. 14. Section 14 (1) makes provision for the precautions to be taken in relation to “any machinery” other than “prime movers and transmission machinery”. Going back, we find that s. 13 has already made provision for the precautions to be taken in relation to “the transmission machinery”. Not “transmission machinery” but “the transmission machinery”. The definite article clearly limits this expression to transmission machinery used as factory plant, and prevents it from extending to transmission machinery (if any) produced by the factory plant. In my view, a similar limitation, though not express, must be read into s. 12, which deals with precautions in relation to “prime movers”. It would be a very capricious statute which, in the case of a factory which both used and produced prime movers and both used and produced transmission machinery, provided by one of its sections—s. 12—that certain protection should be afforded to the worker both in regard to the used and produced prime movers, whereas by another—s. 13—it provided that he should enjoy corresponding protection only in regard to the used, and not in regard to the produced, transmission gear. If this is so, when s. 14 (1) makes provision in regard to “any machinery, other than prime movers and transmission machinery”, the exception carved out of “any machinery” consists entirely of plant, and it seems right to read the whole from which the exception is carved out as also limited to machinery used as plant. The structure of s. 12, s. 13 and s. 14, to my mind, implies that their operation is wholly within the framework or ambit of machinery used as a productive agent, and does not extend to machinery emerging as a product. For these short reasons I respectfully concur with the conclusion at which my Lords have arrived and, like them, would dismiss the appeal.

LORD COHEN: My Lords, I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

Re STEVENS (deceased). PATEMAN v. JAMES AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), February 28, 1952.]

Will—Incomplete will—No appointment of executor—No reference to property or extent of interest—“I give devise and bequeath unto” three named persons.

A testatrix made a will on a printed form as follows: “This is the last will and testament of me, Mrs. Ellen Stevens, of 43 Caversham Rd. in the county of St. Pancras—made this—day of Mar. 4 in the year of our Lord 1934. I hereby revoke all wills heretofore made by me. I appoint — of — in the county of — and — of — in the county of — to be executors of this my will. I give devise and bequeath unto my brother Mr. Harry Pateman of Collingdale, Larkstone Terrace, Ilfracombe, Devon, (Also sister) Mrs. Jane Slade of 1, Elm Rd. Kentish Town, N.W. (Also sister) Mrs. Ethel James of 67, Dagenham Avenue, Dagenham.” The will was properly executed.

HELD: notwithstanding that no appointment of an executor was made by the testatrix, it sufficiently appeared from the form of the will, not merely that the testatrix did not intend to die intestate, but that she intended to deal with the whole of her property by leaving it to the brother and two sisters, and, one of the sisters having predeceased the testatrix, the will was effective to pass the whole estate to the brother and surviving sister as joint tenants.

Dictum of LORD ESHER, M.R., in Re Harrison (1885) (30 Ch.D. 393), applied.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS for the determination of the questions whether, on the true construction of the will of Ellen Stevens, deceased, (a) the whole of the net estate of the testatrix belonged to the plaintiff (brother of testatrix and the administrator of her estate) and Ethel James (a sister of the testatrix) as joint tenants, or (b) the said testatrix died wholly intestate as to her said estate, or (c) the said estate or some and what part thereof ought to be held on some and what other trusts.

J. L. Arnold for the plaintiff, the administrator of the estate.

Semken for the first defendant, a sister of the testatrix.

A. A. B. Fuller for the second defendant, interested under an intestacy.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This case raises a short point of construction on the will of the testatrix, Ellen Stevens. The will was made on a printed form, and reads as follows:

"This is the last will and testament of me, Mrs. Ellen Stevens, of 43 Caversham Rd. in the county of St. Pancras — made this — day of Mar. 4 in the year of our Lord 1934."

Down to there, even after the filling in of the blanks, there are considerable spaces to be found.

"I hereby revoke all wills heretofore made by me. I appoint — of — in the county of — and — of — in the county of — to be executors of this my will. I give devise and bequeath unto my brother Mr. Harry Pateman of Collingdale, Larkstone Terrace, Ilfracombe, Devon, Also sister) Mrs. Jane Slade of 1, Elm Rd. Kentish Town, N.W. Also sister) Mrs. Ethel James of 67, Dagenham Avenue, Dagenham."

Then there is a blank followed by the signature of the testatrix and an attestation in proper form.

The question arises on the will as admitted to probate in that form whether it operates to pass any, and, if so, what, part of the property of the testatrix to the brother and the sister who survived her, or is it completely ineffective to pass any of her property? I have been referred to certain authorities. In the first place, there is the dictum frequently quoted from the judgment of LORD ESHER, M.R., in Re Harrison (1), where he said (30 Ch.D. 393):

"There is one rule of construction, which to my mind is a golden rule, viz., that when a testator has executed a will in solemn form you must assume that he did not intend to make it a solemn farce,—that he did not intend to die intestate when he has gone through the form of making a will. You ought, if possible, to read the will so as to lead to a testacy, not an intestacy. This is a golden rule."

To my mind, that language makes it clear that LORD ESHER, M.R., was intending to enunciate a rule of general application. The facts of the case which he had to consider were materially different from the facts of the case which I have to consider in that the gap there consisted, not in the omission of any mention of the property proposed to be dealt with, but in the omission of the name or names of the person or persons proposed to be benefited by the disposition of the property.

There are three cases somewhat similar to the present case. The first is Re Bassett's Estate (2). In that case a testatrix made a will, which she declared to be her "last will and testament", and thereby appointed an executor, and, after giving legacies, proceeded as follows:

"After these legacies and my doctor's bills and funeral expenses are paid, I leave (sic) to my sister, M.P., without any power or control whatsoever of her husband, J.P., in case of her death to be equally divided amongst her children or grandchildren", and then followed a blank. It was held by BACON, V.-C., that there was a good gift of the residue to the sister. BACON, V.-C., in the course of his judgment, said (L.R. 14 Eq. 57):

"I read the will as containing a disposition of the whole of the testatrix's estate and effects. That must have been her intention, as is generally the case, when she set about making her 'last will and testament'. That would vest the whole of her estate in the executor."

Pausing there, it will be seen from the statement of facts in Re Bassett's Estate (2) that the testatrix appointed an executor, and, as might be expected BACON, V.-C., adverted to that circumstance as one which aided him in coming to the conclusion at which he arrived. But it is necessary not to lose sight of the context in which he refers to the vesting of the estate in the executor. He assumes from the form of the will, which, in being entirely in blank as to the property intended to be dealt with, is similar to the will with which I have to deal, that the presumption should be that the will intended to deal with the whole of the testatrix' estate and effects. In the upshot, BACON, V.-C., held that the will operated to pass the whole of the testatrix' property.

In Re Messenger's Estate (3) CLAUSON, J., had to consider the will of a testator which was on a printed form by which he appointed a named person to be his executrix. After providing for the payment of the testator's debts, and funeral and testamentary expenses, the will provided: "I give and bequeath (blank) to", and then followed the name of the executrix. His Lordship held "upon a consideration of the testator's intention expressed in the will" that the person named as executrix "was beneficially entitled to the whole of the testator's estate". In the course of his judgment CLAUSON, J., having referred in detail to the form of the will, said ([1937] 1 All E.R. 356):

"In my view it is quite plain from this document that the testator desired to make an effective will, and in that connection I need only refer to the observations of LORD ESHER, M.R., in the case of Re Harrison, Turner v. Hellard (1) . . ."

and then he quoted the "golden rule" which I have already read. He continued (ibid.):

"It is quite plain in this case that the testator intended to dispose of his property, otherwise what he was doing was a solemn farce. Another thing which is perfectly plain is this, that he intended in some way or other to benefit Mrs. E. A. Chaplin [who was named as executrix]."

I read those two sentences as indicating that CLAUSON, J., was dealing with two different subject-matters. In the first sentence he was dealing with what, in his view, was the intention of the testator as regards the disposition of his property, and he held that the testator intended to dispose of the whole of his property for the reason which he gives and which is based on the golden rule, viz., otherwise what he was doing was a solemn farce. Having come to that conclusion, he intended to pass on and deal with the question, who was intended to be benefited by this intention? He says (ibid.):

"In my view, it appears with reasonable clearness on the face of this will that the extent to which he desired to benefit her was to the extent of the whole of his property, which he was vesting in his executrix, who happens to be named as beneficiary, by means of appointing her executrix."

So one has three elements. First, a conclusion that the testator intended to dispose of the whole of his property; secondly, that he intended in some way to benefit the person named as executrix; and, thirdly, that he intended to benefit her to the extent of his whole estate. I do not find in that reasoning anything which would lead me to the conclusion that the only reason why CLAUSON, J., was able to hold that the testator had effectively disposed of the whole of his estate to the named person was because she was named as executrix.

The last case to which I need refer is Re Turner (4). That was a decision of DANCKWERTS, J., on a will made on a printed form by which a testator appointed two named persons to be his "executor" in the singular and directed the payment of his debts and funeral expenses "as soon as conveniently might be after his decease". The will proceeded: "I give and bequeath unto", and under those words were written the names of eleven persons, one name on each line, including the first person appointed executor. Immediately under the last of the names were written the words "my gold wrist watch to go" to the last-named person. DANCKWERTS, J., held that "the gift of the gold watch . . . was an afterthought, and, as the testator must be taken not to have intended to die intestate, it was reasonably clear that he intended to give all his property to the eleven persons named, who were, therefore, jointly entitled to the whole of the residuary estate apart from the gold watch."

It is true that, as in the two earlier cases to which I have referred, the will in question appointed an executor or executrix, but the problem which DANCKWERTS, J., had to consider was really whether or not the case before him could be distinguished from Re Messenger (3) by reason of the fact that a specific gift followed the alleged gift of residue. He came to the conclusion that the specific gift in the will which he had to consider appeared as an afterthought, and, therefore, the case was not distinguishable from Re Messenger (3).

On the consideration of those three authorities, I come to the conclusion that the omission of any appointment of an executor is insufficient to enable me to distinguish this case from the earlier cases, and that it sufficiently appears from the form of the will in which it was admitted to probate that the testatrix not merely did not intend to die intestate to any extent, but intended to deal with the whole of her property by leaving it to the brother and the two sisters, and that, as the elder of the two sisters predeceased her, the result is that the will is effective in passing the whole of the testatrix' estate to the brother and second sister who will be entitled to the property as joint tenants.

Order accordingly.

NOTE.Re AN APPLICATION BY THE NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), January 22, 23, 24, 25, 28, 29, 30, 31, February 1, 20, 1952.]

Mine—Coal mine—Working of mine—Application to let down surface—“Hampering” of working—Evidence—Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923 (c. 20), s. 3 (1)—Costs—General rule.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS under R.S.C., Ord. 54o, by which the National Coal Board applied under the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, for the right to let down the surface of certain land in the city of Stoke-on-Trent and the borough of Newcastle-under-Lyme, North Staffordshire, by the working of seams of coal thereunder. Prior to nationalisation of the coal mining industry, the mines under the relevant land were worked by a private company which, under an order of the Railway and Canal Commission dated Dec. 17, 1943, was granted the right, subsequently vested in the National Coal Board, to let down the surface of the said land by working a seam called the Great Row Seam (not the subject of the present application). That right was granted until Mar. 25, 2000.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 20. DANCKWERTS, J., in a written judgment, said that jurisdiction was conferred on the court by the Mines (Working Facilities and Support) Act, 1923, s. 3, s. 4 and s. 6, and the Railway and Canal Commission (Abolition) Act, 1949, s. 1 (1) (a), by virtue of which Act the functions of the commission were transferred to the High Court.

It was contended on behalf of the objectors that the jurisdiction conferred by s. 3 of the Act of 1923 was not available unless it could be shown that the applicants were presently hampered by the absence of the facility or right for which they asked—i.e., unless they could show that their effective working of the coal had already been hampered—and that it was not sufficient for them to show that coal was present in the area which they wished to work and that their working of that coal would be hampered in the future. A fortiori, it was said, it was not sufficient to show that coal might or might not be present in commercially workable quantities in the area in question. This construction of the Act put a very strict and limited interpretation on the words “is hampered” in s. 3 of the Act, and it seemed to him that to restrict the meaning so severely would destroy to a large extent the usefulness of the powers conferred on the court and was contrary to the plain intention of the statute. It would hardly be practicable for a mining concern to operate if it were necessary to prove a breakdown of the existing method of working as a condition of making an application under the Act. Continuous output obviously could not be maintained under such conditions, and planning, at the least, would be hampered unduly. The reference in the section to the person who is working or desirous of working the minerals evidently referred to the future as well as the present. Accordingly he (His LORDSHIP) rejected the contention of the objectors on the construction of the Act. He came to the conclusions (i) that the applicants should receive the right to work and, so far as necessary, let down the surface, for a period of fifty years in respect of the whole area under consideration; (ii) that, given proper safeguards, the risk of increased and unduly serious subsidence would not be caused if the applicants were allowed to work any one or more of the seams, and the applicants should be given liberty to work any of them; (iii) the applicants should have liberty to work super-imposed seams within three years after working a seam during the first ten years from the making of the order.

On the question of costs it was suggested by counsel on behalf of the applicant that the practice of the Railway and Canal Commission in not granting costs (as a general rule) be followed, although he (HIS LORDSHIP) had full discretion in the matter. Certain objectors submitted that they ought to be granted costs. The jurisdiction which he had seemed to him to be sui generis and was not to be compared with any of the other jurisdictions of the Chancery Division. The rule normally would be that costs should not be awarded, and he proposed to abide by that rule in the present case.

STREET AND ANOTHER v. BRITISH ELECTRICITY AUTHORITY AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.JJ.), February 26, 27, 28, 1952.]

Factory—Place “within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory” — Part of factory building—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 151 (6).

Factory—Openings in floors—Space for hoist at edge of floor—Safe means of access—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 25 (3), s. 26 (1).

A workman was employed by the second defendants on work of installing boilers in an electricity power station belonging to the first defendants. On the second floor where he worked five boilers had been installed in bays and were generating electricity. Beyond these five bays, there were four more bays into which boilers were to be put. There was a partly erected boiler in the sixth bay, and an unguarded open space in the seventh bay, in which a hoist was working, with a drop of forty-five feet through that open space to the ground floor. The workman was working in the ninth bay. Between the fifth bay, the last of the bays in which there were working boilers, and the sixth bay, the first of the bays in which installation was in progress, a tarpaulin had been put up to divide the operating part of the building from that part in which installation was in progress. When the workman was returning from his lunch to his work at the ninth bay, in some manner unexplained he fell through the open space in the seventh bay and was killed. In a claim by the workman's personal representatives, inter alia, against the first defendants for breach of statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937,

HELD: the place where the accident happened did not form part of a factory, because, by reason of the separation therefrom of the operating part of the factory, it was a place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory which was used solely for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory, within the meaning of s. 151 (6) of the Factories Act, 1937, and this was so notwithstanding that the place formed part of the factory building itself, and, therefore, the first defendants were not bound by the statutory duties imposed by the Factories Act, 1937.

Dictum of WYNN-PARRY, J., in Cox v. Cutler & Sons, Ltd. & Hampton Court Gas Co. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 673), approved.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of SELLERS, J., dated Nov. 28, 1951.

The plaintiffs, as administrators of the estate of a deceased workman, Sydney Frank Street, claimed damages under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. The claim against the first defendants, to whom the generating station in which the deceased was working—the New Power Station, Ipswich—belonged, was for breach of statutory duty under s. 25 (1), s. 25 (3) and s. 26 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and for negligence at common law. The claim against the second defendants, the workman's employers, was for breach of statutory duty under reg. 30 of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), and for negligence at common law. SELLERS, J., found against the plaintiffs on the ground that the place where the accident happened was not a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937, that there was no breach of statutory duty under the Building Regulations, 1948, and that the evidence did not establish negligence at common law. The plaintiffs appealed against the findings that there was no breach of statutory duty under the Factories Act, 1937, and no negligence at common law.

Hines for the first defendants.

Burton, Q.C., and J. W. Russell for the second defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The claim against the first defendants is set out in the statement of claim and is based both on breaches of statutory duty and on negligence. By way of particulars it is said:

"The first-named defendants were in breach of their duties under the Factories Act, 1937, in that: (1) Contrary to s. 25 (1) the said second floor was not of sound construction or properly maintained in that the surface of the floor was of rough concrete with metal reinforcing rods protruding above the surface. (2) Contrary to s. 25 (3) one side of the second floor had an opening therein which was not securely fenced. (3) Contrary to s. 26 (1) they failed to provide or maintain safe means of access to a place at which persons, including the said Sydney Frank Street, had to work. The means of access provided was unsafe both by reason of its proximity to the said open edge and by reason of the matters set out in para. 3 and sub-para. (1) and (2) hereof. The first-named defendants were negligent in that they failed to give to the said Sydney Frank Street any or any sufficient warning of and/or to take any or any sufficient steps to prevent danger or injury to the said Sydney Frank Street arising from the unguarded opening in the said floor and/or from the condition of the floor and/or from the presence of obstruction thereon."

Regarding the second defendants, it is said that they were negligent in that:

"(1) they failed to provide a guard-rail or other suitable safeguard to prevent the fall of persons from the said second floor, (2) they failed to ensure that the surface of the said second floor was smooth and free of obstructions, (3) they failed to instruct the said Sydney Frank Street not to walk between the said trolley line and the said open edge, (4) they failed to warn the said Sydney Frank Street of the danger of walking between the said trolley line and the said open edge, (5) they, their servants or agents caused the floor between the said trolley line and the said wall to be obstructed by debris and other material, (6) they, their servants or agents permitted the said trolley to stand upon the said line adjacent to the said obstruction and (7) they failed to adopt a safe system of working."

One difficulty which arises in this case is to ascertain what was the true position as between the first and second defendants. In view of the evidence of the placing of the tarpaulin in the position in which it was, it would appear that at least some effort had been made to divide the building into two parts—(i) the part in which electricity was being generated, and (ii) the part in which the second defendants were installing boilers.

[Dealing with the allegation against the second defendants of liability at common law, HIS LORDSHIP considered the facts, agreed with the finding of SELLERS, J., that the second defendants had not been guilty of negligence at common law, and continued:] The claim against the first defendants which is based on alleged breaches of the Factories Act, 1937, presents much more difficulty. The first question for determination is: Is the place in which this accident took place a factory within the meaning of the Factories Act, 1937? It is unnecessary to look at the definition of "factory" in s. 151 (1), because an earlier section, s. 103, deals with electrical stations. Section 103 (1) provides:

"The provisions of this Act shall apply to any premises in which persons are regularly employed in or in connection with the processes or operations of generating, transforming or converting, or of switching, controlling or otherwise regulating, electrical energy for supply by way of trade, or for supply for the purposes of any transport undertaking or other industrial or commercial undertaking or of any public building or public institution, or for supply to streets or other public places, as if the premises were a factory and the employer of any person employed in the premises in or in connection with any such process or operation were the occupier of a factory."

It was not sought to bring the second defendants in under the later words of that sub-section. What is clear is that a generating station such as this is a factory for the purposes of the Factories Act, 1937.

Section 151 (6), is in these terms:

"Where a place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory is solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory, that place shall not be deemed to form part of the factory for the purposes of this Act, but shall, if otherwise it would be a factory, be deemed to be a separate factory."

It is said on behalf of the first defendants that the place at which Street fell was taken out of the factory by that sub-section and that it ought not to be regarded as a factory. Counsel for the plaintiffs submitted that sub-s. (6) did not apply at all, and that the place at which the accident took place was within the factory itself and could not be described by the words "within the close, curtilage, or precincts" in sub-s. (6). In this connection he drew attention to the words "close, curtilage, or precincts" which appear also in sub-s. (1).

The view which I hold on this is that, taking into consideration the words in sub-s. (6), "forming a factory", the words: "Where a place situate within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory . . ." ought to be read as covering the whole of the premises, inside and out, so long as they are within the close, curtilage, or precincts forming a factory. Consequently, a part of the building, as distinct from something in the yard or outside the building, which is solely used for some purpose other than the processes carried on in the factory, may be taken out of the factory by the terms of s. 151 (6). Section 149 (4) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, the predecessor of s. 151 (6), was discussed in a case before the Divisional Court in 1904—Lewis v. Gilbertson & Co., Ltd. (1). It was said, and rightly said, by counsel for the plaintiffs that certain observations of the members of the Divisional Court were obiter. Probably the same may be said with regard to passages in one or two of the judgments in Cox v. Cutler & Sons, Ltd. & Hampton Court Gas Co. (2). I will read a passage from the judgment of WYNN-PARRY, J., given in this court in the latter case. The learned judge, having referred to the judgments in Lewis v. Gilbertson & Co., Ltd. (1), said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 673):

"All three judgments proceed on the basis that 'place' in the sub-section means an area outside the factory, though within the close, curtilage or precincts forming the factory. LORD ALVERSTONE, C.J., proceeded on the basis that the 'place' was a place apart from the factory. WILLS, J., treated it as a place entirely outside the factory area. KENNEDY, J., held that a person on the new sheet mill site could not be described as being in the factory, although he might have been on the premises which were within the curtilage and precincts of the factory. No doubt, on the facts of that case, there was sound ground for holding that the site of the new sheet mill had never formed part of the factory, and that would be sufficient to support the decision, but, for myself, I have great difficulty in view of the language of sub-s. (6) of s. 151 of the Act of 1937 in accepting the view that in order that an area of land should qualify to be treated as a place within that sub-section, it must first be shown that it has never been part of the particular factory. The wording of the definition in sub-s. (1) makes the word 'factory' include not merely the area comprised by the walls of a building in which a manufacturing process is carried on, but the whole area comprised within the boundaries of, e.g., the close of the premises in question. This appears to me to be borne out by the wording of sub-s. (6) where the close, curtilage or precincts are described as forming the factory. In my view, it follows that any area which is within the close, curtilage or precincts of any premises, which are a factory within the definition of that word in s. 151, is qualified to be treated as 'a place' under sub-s. (6), provided it satisfies the other conditions of the sub-section as to user. I can find no ground for concluding that the factory area, to employ the phrase used in Lewis v. Gilbertson & Co., Ltd. (1) is less than co-terminous with the area comprised in the phrase 'close, curtilage, or precincts' of the premises, otherwise it would be difficult to give any effect to the word 'deemed' in the sub-section."

Respectfully, I agree with that part of the judgment of WYNN-PARRY, J. I think that, by reason of s. 151 (6) the place where this accident happened is not within the factory for the present purpose. I feel that it is only by so reading the sub-section that you can get a reasonable view of the statutory provisions. If one could imagine a large building erected so that factory processes could be carried on in it, and in one corner, entirely separate from the rest of the premises, a factory process is carried out, on the argument put forward for the plaintiffs the whole building then becomes a factory. I think it does so under s. 151 (1), but if no other part is used for factory purposes at all, it may well be that sub-s. (6) can be applied, and thus the Factories Act and the regulations made thereunder would not apply to those parts of the building in which a wholly different process, not within the scheme of the Factories Act, was being carried on.

The question must depend on the facts. SELLERS, J., took that view, and he said:

“Another issue was raised, on which I shall make some brief observation. It was said on behalf of the first defendants that they were under no duty under the Factory Acts to the deceased man because they were, it was said, not the occupiers of the premises for the purpose of the Factory Act, and reliance was placed on s. 151 (6) of the Factories Act . . . I find as a fact that the first five boilers did form part of the factory, but that this particular area, shut off as it was, not by a permanent barrier, but by a tarpaulin which was dividing the area where work was being carried out by the second defendants fell within that sub-section, so that the area was deemed not to form part of a factory, and I do not find any evidence which would justify a finding that it was deemed to be a separate factory.”

That is a finding of fact. True, the submission was made that this is not a question of fact, but a question of construction of s. 151 (6) of the Act, still, one must look at the facts of each case. The finding of fact is based on the evidence and I am disposed to agree with the learned judge that the place at which this accident happened was not a factory or part of a factory.

In view of the importance of this case, it is desirable that I should say something on the other points which were raised on behalf of the plaintiffs, though strictly it is not necessary. It was said by counsel for the plaintiffs that, if this were a factory, s. 25 of the Act must be applied, and sub-s. (3) of that section reads:

“All openings in floors shall be securely fenced, except in so far as the nature of the work renders such fencing impracticable.”

It was submitted that the space down which Street fell was an opening in a floor and that it ought to have been fenced. The marginal note to the section is: “Construction and maintenance of floors, passages and stairs”, and sub-s. (1) provides:

“All floors, steps, stairs, passages and gangways shall be of sound construction and properly maintained.”

A question was raised on that. I do not think I need go into it except to say the learned judge found there was no breach of that sub-section. Whether this was an opening in a floor is another very difficult question. I do not regard it as an opening in a floor within the contemplation of the section as I understand it. In the case of a floor in a factory there must not be an open hole in it down which someone can fall. Steps must be taken to see that any opening in the floor is securely fenced. It is submitted on behalf of the first defendants that this was not an opening in the floor. I find that an unusually difficult question. What did the man fall down? Counsel for the plaintiffs submits he fell down an opening which was left in this space where the hoist was. True, it was a place at which a boiler was to be placed, and, had the boiler been placed there, there would not have been a hole. The boiler would have occupied the open space. In that sense it is the end of the floor and not exactly a hole in the floor. It is difficult to find an apt illustration and not always helpful, but we have all heard of someone in excitement walking off a platform. He does not fall down a hole; he falls over the edge; and so it might be said that Street did not fall through an opening in the floor, but fell over the edge of the floor. I have grave doubt whether this can properly be described as a hole in the floor or an opening in a floor, but, as I have said, it is not necessary to come to any final decision on that point.

The other question raised is under s. 26 (1) of the Act, which provides:

"There shall, so far as is reasonably practicable, be provided and maintained safe means of access to every place at which any person has at any time to work."

[HIS LORDSHIP said that the terms of s. 26 were definite—"safe means of access". It was said that that was a relative term. It was meant to secure, so far as possible, safety for men working and on their way to work. A man approaching his work might be thinking of his work. He might not be looking at the ground on which he was walking, and he might trip and fall. A rail, or guard, of some sort, he thought, would have saved Street's life, but it was impossible for the court to say that the learned judge was not entitled to find on the evidence that the man had reasonably safe means of access to his work.]

It was said on behalf of the first defendants that it was not practicable to have a guard or a fence under either s. 25 or s. 26. The learned judge accepted that submission. The way it was put was this. The hoist was being used fairly continuously. It had been used for heavy materials, and the man in charge did not like heavy things being hoisted at a level which might be dangerous. It was said, further, that after this accident a gate of some kind was erected in front of this open space. If that gate had been erected sooner, I am inclined to think Street would have been alive today. I do not accept the learned judge's view that it was impracticable either by the nature of the work or for any other reason. If there is a place of this kind in works by which it is known that men pass frequently, someone ought, I think, to take steps to put up some sort of a guard. I have dealt with the legal duty, and I will not repeat what I said with regard to that matter, but I do believe it to be important, in the interests of employers and workmen, that where you have two bodies such as the first and second defendants in this case consideration should be given to that kind of thing. I think it right to say that, because, in my view, the duty created by s. 25 and s. 26, if it exists, cannot be met by saying: "Well, it was not very convenient." Those are not the words of the section. For the reasons that I have given, I feel with some regret that the only course which this court can take is to say that the appeal must be dismissed.

PEGLER v. CRAVEN.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), February 21, 1952.]

Landlord and Tenant—Shop—Renewal of tenancy—"Occupier" of premises—Company carrying on business—Tenancy held by managing director—Application for renewal by managing director—Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951 (c. 38), s. 10 (1).

By a lease dated Feb. 4, 1947, the landlord let to the tenant shop premises and living accommodation thereon for a term of twenty-one years from Feb. 1, 1947, with an option to either party to terminate the lease at the end of five, ten, or fifteen years. By a notice expiring on Feb. 1, 1952, the landlord terminated the lease. The tenant, who resided in the living accommodation on the premises, was the managing director of a company to which he had assigned the goodwill of a business which was conducted on the premises. He held 437 out of the 887 issued shares in the company. On an application by the tenant under s. 10 (1) of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, for a new lease of the premises,

HELD: as the company was conducting on the premises a business which belonged to it and was not conducting as the agent of the tenant a business which belonged to him, the company was the occupier of the premises within the meaning of s. 10 (1) and not the tenant, and, therefore, the application could not be maintained by the tenant and must be refused.

Quaere, whether, if the tenant had been the holder of all or substantially all the shares in the company by himself or his nominees, the company could have been regarded as his alter ego with the result that he could have been held to be the occupier of the premises occupying through the company.

APPEAL by the landlord against an order of His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., made at East Grinstead County Court on Nov. 27, 1951, granting the application of the tenant under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 10 (1), for a new lease of premises comprising a shop and living accommodation.

A. E. Holdsworth for the landlord.

Eastham for the tenant.

JENKINS L.J.: This is an appeal from an order made by His Honour JUDGE SIR GERALD HURST, K.C., at East Grinstead County Court, on Nov. 27, 1951, whereby he ordered that there should be granted to the tenant, Mr. R. H. Pegler, for the period of one year from February, 1952, at the existing rent and on the same terms and conditions, a new tenancy of the property comprising a shop and living accommodation and premises situate at Wilmington Bookshop, Portland Road, East Grinstead. Mrs. Craven, the landlord of the premises in question, now appeals to this court on the ground that the tenant's application was not sustainable under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, inasmuch as he did not possess the status necessary under that Act to enable a person to found such an application.

The story of the transactions between the parties begins with a memorandum dated Dec. 26, 1946, purporting to be an agreement between the tenant and the landlord for the purchase by him from her of the whole of the issued share capital of a company called Wilmington Bookshops, Ltd. There seems to have been trouble about that which led to the first litigation between the parties. The next material document is the lease, the termination of which gave rise to the application with which the present appeal is concerned. It is a lease of Feb. 4, 1947, of the premises for twenty-one years with an option to both parties to break at the expiration of the first five, ten or fifteen years. It appears that the landlord availed herself of the "break clause" by giving notice expiring on Feb. 1, 1952. The other material document is an assignment by the landlord, not to the tenant, but at his request to Wilmington Bookshops, Ltd., of the goodwill of the business of a bookshop conducted on the premises. That was expressed to be done as part of the terms of settlement of the litigation there had been between the parties. The landlord assigned to the company as beneficial owner by the direction of the tenant directing as beneficial owner. As to the company which thus acquired the goodwill, the position appears to be this. The tenant is managing director. He and his wife conduct the business of the company. The total issued share capital is 887 shares, of which the tenant holds 437, his wife, who is also secretary of the company, holds ten, and the remainder of the shares are held among friends and relations. It thus appears that, while the tenant has a majority interest in the company with the aid of his wife's shareholding, he cannot justifiably claim that the company is his alter ego, as for some purposes a man may be able to do where he holds all or substantially all the shares of a company by himself or his nominees. The company carries on business on the premises, and on those premises there is kept stock belonging to the company. The profits made from carrying on the business belong to the company, though the tenant benefits from those profits, which, I suppose, go to provide his salary and to pay dividends on his shareholding. The residential part of the premises is occupied by the tenant and his wife. Those are the circumstances to which the provisions of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, have to be applied. The tenant is the tenant of the premises, but the business, on the other hand, is entirely carried on by the company on its own account. The relationship between the tenant and the company under which the company is in occupation and carrying on the business, was described by the county court judge as that of a gratuitous licensee.

The first section of the Act of 1951 to which it is necessary to refer is s. 10, the first section in Part II, which is headed "Shops." It is an enabling section, stating in effect in what circumstances the Act is intended to enable an application to be made. Sub-section (1) provides:

"The provisions of this Part of this Act shall have effect for enabling the occupier of a shop under a tenancy to which this section applies (hereinafter referred to as 'the expiring tenancy') to apply to the court for, and subject to the provisions of this Act to obtain, the grant of a new tenancy where apart from the next following section the expiring tenancy would come to an end immediately before the date of the commencement of this Act or within the period of two years beginning with that date, and would so come to an end by effluxion of time or by the expiration of a notice to quit given by the landlord, whether before or after the commencement of this Act."

It thus appears that the person who is enabled to make an application is the occupier of a shop under a tenancy to which the section applies. The argument for the tenant, which prevailed before the judge, was that there is no dispute that the premises are of a kind which come within the Act. The tenant is, undoubtedly, the tenant of the premises. He also claims to be the occupier. He says the section is not confined in its operation to cases of actual personal occupation by the tenant himself. It includes (he argues) occupation by a servant or by an agent or by a licensee. The company in this case is his licensee, and, therefore, he (the tenant) in this indirect fashion is himself the occupier of the shop within the meaning of s. 10 (1).

The judge, who accepted substantially that argument, said this:

"Physically of course the 'occupier' of the shop now in question is Wilmington Bookshops, Ltd., but that company does not occupy 'under a tenancy'. It occupies under a gratuitous parol licence from the [tenant] terminable at any moment. In my judgment, the [tenant] himself occupies the shop under a tenancy. His tenancy admittedly comprises the shop as well as the living accommodation enjoyed by himself and his family. He is also in possession or 'occupation' of the shop by his licensee, the company. The company pays no rent, and has no legal or beneficial interest whatever in the tenancy of the shop. Thus in law the company occupies the shop on behalf of the [tenant]."

He went on to say that it followed that the requirements of s. 10 (2) (b) were also satisfied. It will have been observed that in the passage I have read the judge referred to the tenant as being in occupation of part at all events of the premises himself. That refers to his occupation of the living quarters provided in the premises, in which he lives with his wife.

Section 10 (2) provides:

"This section applies to a tenancy the subject of which—(a) consists of a shop, or (b) consists of a shop and of living accommodation occupied wholly or mainly by the tenant or by a person who is employed by the tenant for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop, or (c) includes a separate part which consists of a shop . . . and of such living accommodation as is mentioned in the last foregoing paragraph . . ."

So the judge could say that the premises consisted of a shop "and of living accommodation occupied wholly or mainly by the tenant," for there is no doubt that the living accommodation in the present case was in the actual physical occupation of the tenant himself.

The case is one on which I, for my part, have felt some difficulty, but I have reached a different conclusion from that of the judge. I agree that the conception of "occupation" is not necessarily and in all circumstances confined to the actual personal occupation of the person termed the occupier himself. In certain contexts and for certain purposes it obviously extends to vicarious occupation by a caretaker or other servant or by an agent. Clearly the tenant of a retail shop who, through persons in his employment, carried on business there for his own benefit under a tenancy with respect to which he was tenant would properly be described as the occupier of the shop and the person carrying on business there, though not himself in actual personal occupation of it. I cannot regard the words "the occupier of a shop" in s. 10 (1) as going so far as to include as "occupier" within the meaning of the sub-section a tenant who is not himself carrying on business on the premises in question at all, either personally or by a servant or agent, but who is tenant of premises, the shop portion of which is wholly taken up with the stock and the business of a limited company, i.e., of an entirely distinct and different legal person, though I would reserve for further consideration, if and when it arises, the case of a tenant who is beneficial owner of all or substantially all the issued shares of such a company.

I think that conclusion is borne out by s. 10 (2) (b), for it is plain that where sub-s. (2) (b) speaks of a tenancy the subject of which "consists of a shop and of living accommodation occupied wholly or mainly by the tenant or by a person who is employed by the tenant for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop," the word "occupied" must clearly point to actual occupation either by the tenant himself or by a person employed by the tenant in the business carried on in the shop which by necessary implication means the business there carried on by the tenant. Further, it may be said that the reference to occupation by a person employed by the tenant for the purposes of the business carried on in the shop in itself suggests that the terms "occupier" and "occupation" are not used in the section in the unrestricted sense demanded by the argument put forward for the tenant, for, according to that argument, occupation, not merely by the tenant's servant, but by any third party with the tenant's consent, would be occupation by the tenant himself for the purposes of the section.

Some further light on the point at issue may be derived from some of the definitions in s. 20 (1) of the Act. "Shop" is defined as meaning "premises occupied wholly for business purposes, and so occupied wholly or mainly for the purposes of a retail trade or business."

That definition, if it is read into s. 10 (1), makes the reference to a shop read (to put in shortly) as "premises occupied wholly for business purposes," and the critical phrase in the sub-section thus becomes, "for enabling the occupier of premises occupied wholly for business purposes under a tenancy . . ." Occupied by whom for business purposes? I should have thought the reasonable answer to be: "Occupied for business purposes by the occupier under the tenancy, that is to say, occupied by that occupier for his business purposes and not for the business purposes of somebody else." "The tenant" is defined in s. 20 (1) as the person for the time being entitled to the tenancy, and clearly, as is not disputed, a person holding under a mere licence from a tenant cannot answer that description.

The only other provision of the Act to which I think reference can usefully be made is to be found in s. 12 (3) (b). Section 12 deals with the cases in which it is proper for the court to make a grant of a new tenancy on an application under the Act. Section 12 (3) sets out a number of cases in which a new tenancy must not be granted, and so far as relevant for the present purpose, provides that:

"The court shall not order the grant of a new tenancy if it is satisfied . . . (b) that the landlord has offered to afford to the tenant, on terms and conditions which in the opinion of the court are reasonable, alternative accommodation which, in the opinion of the court, is suitable for the purposes of the tenant's business."

Plainly that provision contemplates that the business conducted on the premises must be the business of the tenant, and I think it reinforces the conclusion that, while, no doubt, a tenant of premises who carries on business there by agents may qualify for a new tenancy, the intention of the Act is that the businesses conducted on premises of which new tenancies may, in the appropriate circumstances, be granted should be the businesses of the tenants seeking new tenancies and not the businesses of strangers or third parties. By no stretch of imagination, so far as I can see, can the business carried on by the company on the premises here in question be regarded as the business of the tenant. It is the business of the company, and nobody else. Although the tenant is (with the aid of his wife's holding of ten shares) a majority shareholder, he is not by any means the sole shareholder. The business is the company's, and the tenant manages it for the company and not on his own account.

Counsel for the tenant endeavoured to satisfy us that the expression "occupier" in s. 10 (1) extended to any person carrying on business on the premises by permission of the tenant, whatever the interest of the tenant in the business might be and even if the tenant had no interest in it at all. He founded that argument on the theory that where a tenant entitled to the possession of premises grants a third party a licence to occupy those premises, the premises are in the occupation of the tenant by his licensee. I think the answer to that argument is that the meaning of the word "occupation" is one which must be determined by reference to the context in which the expression is used, and, in my view, the context makes it reasonably plain that occupation by a third party under a licence otherwise than for the purpose of carrying on a business belonging to the tenant himself does not suffice to make the tenant the occupier of a shop under a tenancy within the meaning of the Act.

Counsel for the tenant referred us to Paterson v. Gas Light & Coke Co. (1), concerning the position of two persons appointed by the court to be joint receivers and managers of a company in relation to the supply of gas to the premises of the company, and, in particular, their liability to pay for gas supplied to the company before their appointment. He cited that case to us for this statement by LINDLEY, L.J. ([1896] 2 Ch. 482):

"It was strenuously contended that the plaintiffs could, simply as occupiers of the mill, have required gas to be supplied to it without requiring such supply in the name of the mill company, and this view was adopted by KEKEWICH, J. But the term 'occupier' is ambiguous. In one sense a caretaker is an occupier, but in another sense his occupation is that of some other person."

That well illustrates the general nature of the question arising in the present case.

Then counsel for the tenant referred to the decision of this court in Clift v. Taylor (2). The use he made of that was this. As will be remembered, one of the grounds on which a landlord can oppose the granting of a new lease under s. 5 of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, is that the landlord requires the premises for occupation by himself or by a son or daughter of his over eighteen years of age. In this case the landlord was a member of a firm of auctioneers and surveyors, and the premises, so it was said, were required for the use of the firm, and the question had to be decided whether the landlord really required the premises for occupation by himself within the meaning of the section, inasmuch as the firm was going to be the actual occupier. This court held that the premises were none the less required for occupation by the landlord himself because he wanted to use them for occupation by the other members of his firm as well. I do not think that case really advances the matter any further, for (apart from the difference in the context with reference to which the expression "occupation" there fell to be construed) it was a case of a partnership, and each partner in a firm is an occupier jointly with his fellow partners of the partnership premises.

Butlins, Ltd. v. Fytche (3) is, I think, further removed from the present case than Clift v. Taylor (2). The question in Butlins, Ltd. v. Fytche (3), was whether for the purpose of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927, goodwill had attached to an area used as a fun fair or place of entertainment of that description by reason of a business having been carried on there by Butlins, Ltd. Butlins, Ltd., were tenants of the area, and they organised and laid it out as an amusement park. They let out pitches or spaces for various amusements to be conducted by sub-tenants or licensees, and that letting out seems to have been done sometimes by a wholly-owned subsidiary of Butlins, Ltd. In those circumstances, this court had no difficulty in holding that Butlins, Ltd., could claim that, by reason of their carrying on business on the premises, goodwill had attached, and it was said by TUCKER, L.J., in referring to the report of the referee under the Act ([1948] 1 All E.R. 739):

"Looking at this report, it is clear that the whole lay-out and the scheme of these premises was devised by Butlins. They organised this place as an amusement park, and I think it is clear from the referee's report that goodwill did attach to these premises. It seems to me quite immaterial that the goodwill may have so attached in part as a result of sub-leases granted to other persons."

That seems to me to be an entirely different question from the one raised in the present case.

The point is a short one, and the arguments either way are not capable of any great elaboration. Although I feel some sympathy for the tenant, I am forced to the conclusion that by the severance which has been brought about between the tenancy and the business, the business being vested in and carried on by the company and the tenancy being the property of the tenant, it is impossible, on the true construction of the Act, to bring him into the category of persons who, as occupiers of shops under tenancies to which s. 10 (1) applies, are able to apply for new tenancies under the provisions of the Act. I would allow this appeal.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: I am of the same opinion. The question is what is the meaning of the formula "occupier of a shop under a tenancy" in s. 10 (1) of the Act of 1951, for, unless the tenant proves himself within that description, he is not a person enabled to apply for an extended tenancy. I should be repeating much that has fallen from JENKINS, L.J., if I elaborated the point. I, therefore, content myself by saying that, as a matter of English and having regard to the other passages in the statute to which allusion has been made, I feel forced to the conclusion that the occupier of the shop who may make the application must occupy it under a tenancy, that is to say, he must be the tenant and occupy by virtue of his tenancy. Further, I think that since the "shop" must comprehend premises which are occupied for the purpose (wholly or substantially) of a retail business, the business carried on must be the business of the tenant, and, therefore, at the same time and for the reasons I have indicated, of the occupier. The latter proposition, I think, is emphasised by the language of s. 10 (2) (b), which shows that a tenancy to which the section applies will cover the tenancy of premises, the living accommodation in which is occupied by a person employed by the tenant "for the purposes of the retail trade or business carried on in the shop", and so, clearly, as I think, carried on by the tenant. The same point is further emphasised by s. 12 (3) (b). It may be that in some circumstances it could be said that a company in actual occupation was but the alter ego of the tenant, and that that could be said consistently with the well-known decision of the House of Lords in Salomon v. Salomon & Co. (4), but, in my judgment, that view cannot be taken in this case for this company cannot be said to be a mere alter ego of the tenant. Though the company's right to occupy the premises is in law, no doubt, precarious, still it is not a wholly controlled company, and I think it is impossible, therefore, to accede to either of the arguments put forward by counsel for the tenant (who does not, I think, substantially dispute the view of the construction of the Act which I have expressed), namely (i) that the occupation here of the company is really an occupation for and on behalf of the tenant, and is, in truth, but an occupation of the tenant, and (ii) that the tenant and the company in some sense jointly occupy the shop.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal allowed.

MARTIN v. SCOTTISH TRANSPORT AND GENERAL WORKERS UNION.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Normand, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker, Lord Asquith of Bishopstone, Lord Cohen), January 14, 15, March 6, 1952.]

Trade Union—Membership—Temporary membership for the duration of the war—No position for temporary membership in union's rules.

Until August, 1940, M., a dock worker in Glasgow, was not a member of a trade union. On Aug. 19, 1940, at the request of the secretary of the Scottish Transport and General Workers Union, he attended a meeting of the local branch committee which was held for the purpose of admitting new members to the union. On his expressing his willingness to join the union, he was asked to sign a letter in these terms: "I hereby apply for membership of the [union] for the duration of the present war. I agree to be bound by all the rules of the . . . union, and I admit, by my subscription hereto, that the executive of the . . . union shall be entitled to require me to forfeit my membership of the . . . union on or at any time after " the end of hostilities. He signed the letter under protest, on being told that it would not be used against him and that he could not be admitted a member unless he signed. On paying the usual member's entrance fee, he received his member's badge, a copy of the union's rules and a contribution card, and his name was entered on the register of members. From Aug. 19, 1940, until June, 1948, he performed all the obligations and enjoyed all the advantages of a member of the union. On June 23, 1948, he received a letter from the secretary of the union informing him that, pursuant to an order of the general executive council of the union dated May 24, 1948, in terms of a resolution and minute in accordance with the terms of the contract signed by M. on Aug. 19, 1940, he would cease to be a member of the union on June 26, 1948. By r. 20 of the union's rules, no rule was to be amended or rescinded, and no new rule was to be made, except in accordance with a resolution passed at the annual meeting of the general executive council. By r. 15, which was in force in August, 1940, and was not thereafter altered by any resolution passed at the annual meeting of the general executive council: "Every person upon being admitted a member of the union shall be deemed to agree to abide by the rules of the union . . . and be liable to forfeit membership at any time if in the opinion of the general executive council such person has failed to abide by the rules." The rules contained no other ground for forfeiture of membership and there was no rule providing for the admission of members on a temporary basis. In an action by M., claiming inter alia a declaration that he was a member of the union, as the condition affecting the duration of his membership was ultra vires, HELD: (i) the letter of Aug. 19, 1940, was the basis on which M. was admitted to membership of the union, and the condition therein as to the duration of his membership was not separable from the rest of the letter so as to leave the letter standing as an unqualified application, but was an integral suspensive condition in the sense that he would not have been admitted unless he had signed the letter containing the condition as an integral part of his application.

(ii) by virtue of the provisions of the Trade Union Act, 1871, s. 14, para. (1), and sched. I, para. (2) and para. (3), any rule of the union governing the terms on which membership was granted had to apply to all admissions until it was altered by the method prescribed by the union's rules, and, as r. 15 was in force in August, 1940, and had not been altered, the officials of the union had no authority to admit M. to membership subject to a limitation of time; in purporting to do so they had acted in excess of their powers; and, therefore, M. had never been a member of the union.

AS TO TRADE UNION RULES, see HALSBURY, Hailsham Edn., Vol. 32, pp. 492-494, paras. 786, 787.

APPEAL by the pursuer, a dock worker in Glasgow, from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session (LORD COOPER (Lord President), LORD CARMONT and LORD RUSSELL), dated Nov. 23, 1950, recalling an interlocutor of LORD BLADES, Lord Ordinary, dated Feb. 25, 1950.

In August, 1940, the appellant was admitted a member of the Scottish Transport and General Workers Union after he had signed a letter applying for membership "for the duration of the present war" and admitting that the union could require him to forfeit his membership after the end of hostilities. In June, 1948, pursuant to a resolution and order of the general executive council of the union, dated May 24, 1948, he was informed that his temporary membership was revoked. He brought an action against the union claiming (a) a declaration that he was admitted a member of the union in August, 1940, and (b) reduction, quoad him, of the resolution and order of the general executive council, dated May 24, 1948. He contended, inter alia, that, as the rules of the union provided for forfeiture of membership only for failure to abide by the rules, the requirement that he should forfeit his membership at the end of the war was ultra vires. LORD BLADES (Lord Ordinary) held that the appellant was admitted to full membership of the union and that it was ultra vires of the committee (a) to make the signing of the form of contract contained in the letter of August, 1940, a condition precedent to membership, and (b) to found on it as a ground for terminating the appellant's membership, there being no provision in the union's rules for such procedure. The union appealed from this decision to the First Division of the Court of Session, who held that the appellant was never admitted to ordinary membership, that the union acted ultra vires in admitting him to war-time membership under a special contract, and that, therefore, he was never a member of the union.

T. P. M'Donald, Q.C., and Sloan (both of the Scottish Bar) for the appellant.
Walker, Q.C., and Duffy (both of the Scottish Bar) for the respondent union.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 6. LORD NORMAND read the following opinion. My Lords, this appeal is, as the Lord President (LORD COOPER) has said, of importance not only to the appellant and to the respondent trade union but also to a large group of Clyde dockers who are in the same position as the appellant and whose membership of the union is at stake equally with his.

The facts are set out in condescendence 2 and it is sufficient for the disposal of the appeal to summarise them. The appellant, who had previously been a dock worker in Glasgow, but not a member of a trade union, received in August, 1940, a letter from the respondents' secretary requesting him to attend a meeting of the Glasgow Docks No. 1 Branch Committee which was to be held for the purpose of admitting new members to the respondent trade union. He attended the meeting, which took place on Aug. 19, 1940, and he expressed his willingness to join the union. Thereupon an official of the union presented to him for his signature a letter in these terms:

"I hereby apply for membership of the Scottish Transport and General Workers Union, 27 Oswald Street, Glasgow, for the duration of the present war. I agree to be bound by all the rules of the said union, and I admit, by my subscription hereto, that the executive of the said union shall be entitled to require me to forfeit my membership of the said union on or at any time after the signing of an armistice by His Majesty's government."

The appellant protested against being asked to sign the document, but he was told that it would not be used against him. He still protested, but signed on being told that he could not be admitted a member unless he signed. The appellant was then, according to his own averment, admitted a member of Glasgow

Docks No. 1 branch, having paid the usual member's entrance fee of £2 10s., and he received his member's badge, a copy of the rules of the union, and a contribution card. His name was entered in the register of members. From his admission on Aug. 19, 1940, till 1948 he continued to perform all the obligations and to enjoy all the advantages of a member of the union. On June 23, 1948, the respondents' secretary wrote a letter to the appellant informing him that his temporary membership of No. 1 Docks Branch had been revoked and that he would cease to be a member of the branch and of the union on June 26, 1948. The letter intimated that the decision to terminate his membership was agreed to and ordered by the general executive council of the union on May 24, 1948, in terms of a resolution and minute in accordance with the terms of the contract signed by the appellant. In July, 1948, the appellant raised the present action, concluding for a declarator that he was admitted a member of the union on Aug. 17, 1940 (a mistake for Aug. 19, 1940), and for reduction of the resolution and order of the general executive council of May 24, 1948. The ground of the action is unambiguously averred in condescendence 2, where it is said that the appellant's letter of Aug. 19, 1940, in so far as it required him to forfeit his membership after the signing of an armistice, was invalid and illegal and ultra vires as not being in accordance with the rules of the union, because the rules provided for the forfeiture of membership only for failure to abide by the rules, and because there was at the material time no rule by which the conditions contained in the letter could be attached to the admission of a member. The Lord President (LORD COOPER) aptly and accurately summarised the issue presented by the record as a question:

“ . . . whether, without first altering their rules, the defenders had the power in 1940 to admit applicants to what I shall call ‘ war-time membership ’ by making a special bargain with them.”

The respondents' criticism that the plea of ultra vires is technically inappropriate when the trade union has the power to authorise the act complained of, if it first alters its rules, has no merits, for fair notice was given of the true case made by the appellant.

Before considering the only issue really arising on the record, I find it necessary to point out that there is no conclusion for the partial reduction of the letter of Aug. 19, and no plea that it should be partially reduced ope exceptionis, and, further, that there is no record for the admission of the appellant to membership by actings after Aug. 19. I say this because counsel for the appellant attempted to argue (i) that the letter of Aug. 19 should be so far reduced as to set aside any condition affecting the duration of his membership and to leave the application for membership standing in unqualified terms, and (ii) that his enjoyment of the rights and advantages of membership and his performance of its duties from 1940 to 1948 and other circumstances should be held to have impliedly conferred on him at some uncertain date an unqualified membership of the union. These arguments, which are on their merits open to grave criticism, I eliminate at the outset because they are not within the four corners of the record.

On the issue whether the condition affecting the duration of membership was valid, the Lord Ordinary (LORD BLADES) heard argument on the respondents' plea of relevancy in the procedure roll. He came to the conclusion that the rules did not allow of a membership subject to the condition that it should be temporary and forfeitable on the signing of an armistice. He then found that when the appellant paid the entry money and fulfilled the other obligations attached to full membership he became a full member of the union, by which, as the context shows, he means a member the duration of whose membership is unqualified. Having arrived at that conclusion on a consideration of the documents and of the admitted facts, the Lord Ordinary ought, I think, to have granted a decree in terms of the declaratory and reductive conclusions. Instead of that, he allowed a proof of the parties' averments and evidence was taken in accordance with his interlocutor. We were not referred to a single page of the evidence and it was of so little assistance in the determination of the case that the opinion of the Lord Ordinary pronounced after the proof adds nothing to the opinion which he had already given after the procedure roll discussion. By his interlocutor of Feb. 25, however, he decreed in terms of the declaratory and reductive conclusions. This interlocutor was recalled by the First Division of the Court of Session by an interlocutor sustaining the respondents' plea to relevancy and dismissing the action. A

My Lords, in my opinion, the reasoning of the learned judges in the Inner House, particularly in the judgments of LORD COOPER, Lord President, and LORD CARMONT, is unassailable and conclusive of the action. The whole issue turns on the construction and effect of the letter of Aug. 19, 1940, and on the construction and effect of the respondents' rules, and I turn first to a consideration of the construction of the letter. The first sentence is, in terms, an application for membership "for the duration of the war" neither more nor less; the second sentence contains an express provision that the executive of the union should be entitled to require the appellant to forfeit his membership B

" . . . on or at any time after the signing of an armistice by His Majesty's government." C

Had the letter been a document drafted and adjusted by lawyers for the parties, there might have been difficult questions about the legal meaning of the "duration of the war" and of "the signing of an armistice by His Majesty's government", and the fact that hostilities ended, not by the signing of an armistice, but by the unconditional surrender of the King's enemies, would have given rise to special difficulty. But this was not a lawyer's document and the parties were agreed that it should not be made the subject of a legalistic interpretation. It was really common ground that "for the duration of the . . . war" meant no more than "till the end of hostilities" and that the "signing of an armistice" has the same meaning. I think that that is the sensible and correct way to construe the letter. What the application had in view was that the appellant should have the right to remain a member till hostilities ceased and that after that he might remain a member till the union executive chose to terminate his membership. The respondents' counsel did, indeed, offer another construction, that the letter was an application for membership without qualification as to duration accompanied by a standing offer of resignation capable of being made effective by acceptance at any time after the cessation of hostilities. The language of the document is not capable of bearing such a construction, and that is all that need be said about it. What, then, is the effect of the letter? It is, on the appellant's own averments, the basis of his admission, or purported admission, to membership. The appellant was reluctant to sign, but in the end he gave way and signed the document put before him. He then and there paid his entrance fee and was handed his membership card, a copy of the union's rules, and his contribution card. We were invited to ignore the letter and to treat the other incidents as an implied application for membership and an implied acceptance which were independent of the letter. But it is impossible to wipe out the express application which was followed by an act of acceptance and to substitute for it an implication from the tender of the entrance fee which was itself a consequence of the signing of the application in agreed terms. The real question is whether the condition affecting the duration of the membership is separable from the remainder of the letter. Again, I have no doubt that the condition was integral and cannot be separated and severed so as to leave the letter standing as an unqualified application. LORD CARMONT's observations on this aspect of the case are, in my opinion, most cogent. The learned judge says that the more the appellant emphasises his reluctance to accept the condition and his protests, the more he makes it impossible to adopt the suggestion that he put forward an overriding application for unqualified membership, the acceptance D E F G H of which was qualified by a severable ultra vires condition. The first sentence in the letter, moreover, is incapable of being separated into an application unlimited in time with an added limitation. The two things are indissolubly connected grammatically. I, therefore, hold that the letter was the basis on which the appellant was admitted and that the condition as to duration was an integral suspensive condition in the sense that he would not have been admitted unless he had signed the letter containing the condition as an integral part of his application.

For a just appreciation of the respondents' rules it is important to consider the statutory provisions under which they were made. They are contained in the Trade Union Act, 1871, s. 14, and sched. I. Section 14 enacts:

"With respect to the rules of a trade union registered under this Act, the following provisions shall have effect: (1) The rules of every such trade union shall contain provisions in respect of the several matters mentioned in sched. I to this Act."

Schedule I contains the following:

"(2) The whole of the objects for which the trade union is to be established, the purposes for which the funds thereof shall be applicable, and the conditions under which any member may become entitled to any benefit assured thereby, and the fines and forfeitures to be imposed on any member of such trade union. (3) The manner of making, altering, amending, and rescinding rules."

It follows that any rule governing the terms on which membership is granted must apply to all admissions until it is altered by the method prescribed by the rules themselves, and I, therefore, reject the argument put forward for the respondents that esto the rules in August, 1940, provided only for the admission of members without any limit on the duration of their membership, some modification of the rule so as to provide for temporary membership could be brought about by an implied ratification of admissions purporting to have been made on a temporary basis. Now, r. 15 contains this:

"Every person upon being admitted a member of the union shall be deemed to agree to abide by the rules of the union in every respect, and be liable to forfeit membership at any time if in the opinion of the general executive council such person has failed to abide by the rules."

There is no rule providing for the admission of members on a temporary basis or for forfeiture for any reason except that prescribed by r. 15. Rule 20 provides:

"No new rule shall be made, nor shall any rule herein contained or hereafter to be made (sic), or amended, or rescinded except in accordance with a resolution duly passed at the annual meeting of the general executive council."

In spite of imperfections of drafting, the sense of this rule is clear. It is common ground that r. 15 was in force in August, 1940, and that it was not thereafter altered by any resolution passed at the annual meeting of the general executive council. Therefore, the officials of the branch or of the union had no authority in August, 1940, or later, to admit the appellant to membership subject to a limitation of time, and when they purported to do so they acted in excess of their powers and their act had and has no validity. I agree with the view expressed by LORD CARMONT that there was an attempt to create a class of member outside the provisions of the rules and that it necessarily fails. The conclusion that the appellant never was a member may be inconvenient to both parties, because it may be difficult to work out the equitable adjustment of rights, but that is not a consideration which can affect the decision of the present appeal. I would dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD REID: My Lords, I have had an opportunity of reading the speech which my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, has just delivered. I am in complete agreement with it and I cannot usefully add anything to it.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, I agree.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, LORD ASQUITH OF BISHOPSTONE, who is, unfortunately, not able to be present today, has asked me to state that he concurs with the opinion which I have delivered.

LORD COHEN: My Lords, I also agree with the opinion which has been delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND. Appeal dismissed.

Building—Installation of plant in factory—“Working platform”—Steel platform of plant—“Construction, structural alteration, repair or maintenance of a building”—Installation of plant by contractors—Safe system of working—Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948 (S.I., 1948, No. 1145), reg. 2 (1), reg. 22.

ACTION for damages for negligence, and, alternatively, breach of statutory duty.

The plaintiff was a steel erector employed by the defendants, engineering contractors, who designed and manufactured plant for use in sugar beet factories. On Sept. 1, 1950, while the defendants were erecting a pulp bagging plant in a factory, the plaintiff was required to drill holes in the casing of a long worm of the plant which was placed on a steel platform, some sixteen or seventeen feet above the floor of the plant. This platform, which was a fixed structure, was part of the plant. When finished, it was to have a set of railings, but they had not yet been fitted in. As the permanent ladder to the platform was not yet securely fixed, the plaintiff and other workmen climbed to the platform by means of a wooden ladder which was then removed. The worm was placed about eighteen inches from the edge of the platform. Finding that he had not got a suitable drill, the plaintiff asked L., a workman employed by the occupiers of the factory, who was on the ground, to get one for him. L. threw up the drill and, in trying to catch it, the plaintiff bumped against the worm casing, and, fearing that he would over-balance and fall, tried to jump down to the ground and sustained injuries. He contended (i) that the operations on which he was engaged were within the ambit of the Building (Safety, Health and Welfare) Regulations, 1948, and that the defendants had failed to comply with reg. 22, in particular; and (ii) that the defendants were negligent at common law in that they had failed to maintain a safe system of working.

W. M. F. Hudson for the plaintiff.

J. W. Russell for the defendants.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J., held (i) that a "working platform", within the meaning of reg. 22 of the regulations of 1948, was part of what was commonly known as the scaffolding which was used in building operations, that the platform on which the plaintiff was working was not a "working platform" within the meaning of the regulation, and, therefore, the defendants were not in breach of reg. 22; (ii) that the defendants were engaged, not in "the construction, structural alteration, repair or maintenance of a building", within reg. 2 (1) of the regulations, but in providing plant for a building, and, therefore, there was no breach of any statutory duty by them as the operations on which they were engaged did not come within the ambit of the regulations; (iii) that, as there was nothing dangerous in what the plaintiff was required to do and there was ample room for persons accustomed to such work to move on the platform, the defendants had not failed to maintain a safe system of working; and (iv) that, assuming that there was negligence on their part, it was not the cause of the plaintiff's accident, which was an "accident" in the original sense of the word, and, therefore, the defendants were not liable at common law.

R. v. TRONOH MINES, LTD., AND OTHERS.

[CENTRAL CRIMINAL COURT (McNair, J.), February 14, 18, 1952.]

Elections—Expenses—Advertisement "promoting . . . election of . . . candidate" —Criticism of political party in general—Representation of the People Act, 1949 (c. 68), s. 63 (1) (b).

After writs had been issued in respect of a parliamentary general election a company, through its secretary, caused to be inserted in a newspaper circulating throughout the country an advertisement condemning the financial policy of the Labour Party, and, in particular, that party's proposal to control the dividends of companies. The advertisement continued: "The coming general election will give us all the opportunity of saving the country from being reduced, through the policies of the Socialist government, to a bankrupt 'Welfare State'. We need a new and strong government with Ministers who may be relied upon to encourage business enterprise and initiative . . ." The company, the secretary, and the proprietors of the newspaper, were jointly charged with unlawfully incurring expenses with a view to promoting or procuring the election of a candidate other than the Labour candidate at the parliamentary election to be held in the constituency in which the company had its office and the newspaper was published, contrary to s. 63 (1) (b) and s. 63 (5) of the Representation of the People Act, 1949.

HELD: section 63 (1) (b) was designed to prohibit expenditure on advertisements supporting a particular candidate in a particular constituency, which, if authorised by the election agent, would form part of the election expenses for that constituency as distinct from supporting the interests of a party generally in all constituencies, and, therefore, there was no case to go to the jury.

SUBMISSION ON POINT OF LAW on a charge under the Representation of the People Act, 1949, s. 63 (1) (b).

On Oct. 19, 1951, the defendant, Tronoh Mines, Ltd., by its secretary, the defendant, Harold Edgar Barrenger, caused to be inserted in a newspaper owned by the defendants, The Times Publishing Co., Ltd., an advertisement which was headed "Tronoh—Malayan Tin Group of Companies. Interim statement on dividend limitation," and contained criticisms of the Labour Party's financial policy—in particular, that relating to a proposal to control the dividends of companies. The advertisement concluded with these words:

"The coming general election will give us all the opportunity of saving the country from being reduced, through the policies of the Socialist government, to a bankrupt 'Welfare State'. We need a new and strong government with Ministers who may be relied upon to encourage business enterprise and initiative, under the leadership of one who has, through the whole of his life, devoted himself to national and not sectional interests . . ."

The three defendants were charged under s. 63 (1) (b) and s. 63 (5) of the Act of 1949 that in the city of London they unlawfully incurred expenses on account of issuing in the "The Times" newspaper an advertisement with a view to promoting or procuring the election of a candidate other than the Labour Party's candidate at the parliamentary election held in the constituency of the cities of London and Westminster during the general election on Oct. 25, 1951, for which the writ had been issued on Oct. 6. By a second count it was alleged that the expenses were incurred with a view to promoting or procuring the election of the Conservative candidate in the constituency referred to. At the conclusion of the case for the prosecution the defendants submitted that for an advertisement to offend against s. 63 (1) (b) it must be directed to a particular candidate in a particular constituency and not be in the general terms of the advertisement complained of, and that, as the prosecution had not tendered any evidence to that effect, there was no case to go to the jury against the defendants who were entitled to be acquitted.

McNAIR, J.: On the view I take of the construction of s. 63 (1) of the Representation of the People Act, 1949, this is not a case which I can properly leave to the jury. For the purpose of the observations which I am about to make, I assume that the jury could properly find on the evidence that the object, or, possibly, the primary object, of incurring the expenditure in question was to advance the prospects of the anti-Socialist cause generally, that those who incurred those expenses had in mind the general election of 1951, and that they desired to achieve their object by securing the election of a majority of candidates who were against the Socialist government, though, if the matter had been left to the jury, the jury might well have taken the view that they were not the objects or the primary object. The indictment contains two counts, charging the defendants with acting contrary to s. 63 (1) (b) and s. 63 (5) of the Act of 1949.

The Act of 1949 is a consolidating statute embracing the whole of the electoral law. So far as is material, s. 63 (1) provides:

"No expenses shall, with a view to promoting or procuring the election of a candidate at an election, be incurred by any person other than the candidate, his election agent and persons authorised in writing by the election agent on account—(a) of holding public meetings or organising any public display; or (b) of issuing advertisements, circulars or publications; or (c) of otherwise presenting to the electors the candidate or his views or the extent or nature of his backing or disparaging another candidate . . ."

Counsel for the defendants have submitted that, on the proper or reasonable construction of that section, the evidence tendered by the Crown does not establish any act which is prohibited by it. Section 63 (1) prohibits the incurring of expense on account of (a) holding public meetings, (b) issuing advertisements, or (c) "otherwise presenting to the electors the candidate or his views or the extent or nature of his backing or disparaging another candidate". It seems to me that (c) necessarily imports that the particular items specified in (a) and (b) must also, if they are to be caught by the prohibition, be items which have the effect of "presenting to the electors the candidate or his views or the extent or nature of his backing or disparaging another candidate." If this result had not been intended, it seems to me that para. (c) would have run: "of presenting to the electors, whether by means specified in para. (a) or para. (b), or in any other way, the candidate or his views . . ." Furthermore, the Interpretation Act, 1889, s. 1 (1), provides that, unless the context otherwise requires, words importing the singular include the plural, and I think that the context here does necessarily require that references to the election of a candidate at an election means a candidate at a particular election and not candidates at elections generally. On the whole, therefore, although I appreciate that the point is fully arguable, I think that the construction contended for by the defence on this point is correct. It is not, however, necessary in a criminal case such as this to go to that length. It is sufficient to say that, in my judgment, it is a reasonable and possible construction. For, in the construction of a penal statute—to use the words of LORD SIMONDS in Howell v. Falmouth Boat Construction, Ltd. (1) ([1951] 2 All E.R. 281)—

"a man should not be put in peril on an ambiguity."

I have reached the decision that on the evidence no reasonable jury could find that the advertisement in question was presenting to the electors of any constituency any particular candidate, still less presenting to the electors of the constituency of the cities of London and Westminster either the Conservative candidate or any candidate other than a Socialist candidate or his views.

Counsel for the defendants, Tronoh Mines, Ltd. and Mr. Barrenger, also contended that this construction is supported by the consideration that s. 63 (1) does not prohibit the incurring of expenditure of the nature covered by the section absolutely, but only sub modo, and, therefore, the fact that the section itself provides no way in which the particular form of advertisement in question, namely, an advertisement in a national newspaper, which circulates generally throughout the country, supporting the views of a particular party and not those of a particular candidate, can be authorised, lent strong support to the view that the particular form of advertisement in question was not prohibited. If expenses incurred on account of the items specified in (a) (b) and (c), being supported in writing by the election agent, are permissible and authorised by the election agent, then, by virtue of sub-s. (2), the person who incurs them has to make a return to the returning officer of the amount of those expenses, stating the election at which and the candidate in whose support they were incurred. The prescribed form referred to in sub-s. (3) is set out in the Representation of the People Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1254), which took effect after approval by resolution of both Houses of Parliament, and is Form W., and it is clear that that form is inappropriate for making a return of expenses of the kind with which we are here concerned. There is no way in which the expenditure, on the hypothesis I have stated, incurred in relation to all elections can be apportioned for the purpose of any particular return for a particular election. That consideration alone seems to me to lend strong support to the view that the section is not intended to prohibit expenditure incurred on advertisements designed to support, or having the effect of supporting, the interest of a particular party generally in all constituencies, at any rate at the time of a general election, and not supporting a particular candidate in a particular constituency.

Counsel for The Times Publishing Co., Ltd. has based an argument on the general structure of the group of sections—ss. 60 to 78—headed “Election expenses”. Those words, “Election expenses”, are, according to recognised canons of construction, to be regarded as forming part of the statute itself, and may, at any rate in the case of doubt, but, probably in all cases, be used to provide the key to the general construction of each section which follows under that heading. Election expenses are defined in s. 103 as follows:

“ ‘Election expenses’ in relation to an election means expenses incurred, whether before, during or after the election, on account of or in respect of the conduct or management of the election.”

The result of s. 171 (1) is that “election” here means a parliamentary election, and that term “parliamentary election” is itself defined by s. 17 (1) of the Interpretation Act, 1889, in terms which make it plain that it means an election for a particular constituency and not a panoply of elections commonly known as a general election. Accordingly, it seems to me that this group of sections is dealing with an election for a particular constituency, and it would be contrary to the ordinary canons of construction to impose the prohibition of s. 63 (1) in the circumstances of the present case. In other words, what is prohibited by this section is the incurring of expenditure of one of these particular categories which has the effect of supporting a particular candidate or candidates in a particular constituency, which, if authorised by the election agent, would form part of the election expenses for that constituency and thus be subject to the statutory maximum of expenditure for that constituency. I, therefore, accept the submission of counsel for The Times Publishing Co., Ltd. that s. 63 (1) does not prohibit expenditure, the real purpose or effect of which is general political propaganda, even although that general political propaganda does incidentally assist a particular candidate among others. There may be instances where there has been an incursion by a party or body into an election, but there is no evidence or suggestion of anything of that kind in the present case. Certain of the cases to which I have been referred (including Lambeth, Kennington Division Case, Crossman v. Davis (2) and Shoreditch, Haggerston Division Case, Cremer v. Lowles (3)), draw this distinction, and, although those were decisions on earlier legislation, it does not seem to me that in any relevant respects their validity has been altered by the Act of 1918, the Act of 1948, or the consolidated Act of 1949.

I have come to the conclusion that no reasonable jury could find that the expenditure in question here was prohibited on this construction of the Act. That being so, I need not pause to consider the special position of the third defendants, The Times Publishing Co., Ltd., and the question whether, on any view of the statute, it could be said that there was any evidence against them. Furthermore, the conclusion which I have reached on the general construction of the section renders it unnecessary for me to express any final view on the question whether the proof of intention, object, or view to promote or procure the election of candidates generally of one particular party or in opposition to one particular party in all elections held at one general election could be sufficient evidence, on which a jury could act, of specific intent such as is charged in the present case, viz., the intent of promoting or procuring the election of a particular candidate or candidates at a particular election. But I must say, having listened to the arguments on this point, I am strongly of the opinion that in a case such as this it would be necessary to prove affirmatively the specific intent relating to the particular election.

Verdict: “Not Guilty” on both counts.

DRINKWATER AND ANOTHER v. KIMBER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.J.J.), January 22, 23, 24, February 29, 1952.]

Negligence—Contributory negligence—Action by two plaintiffs—Wife and husband—Judgment for first plaintiff against defendant—Second plaintiff one third to blame—Right of defendant to recover from second plaintiff one third of damages payable to first plaintiff—Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945 (c. 28), s. 1 (1).

The female plaintiff was injured in a collision between a motor van, in which she was being driven by the male plaintiff (her husband), and a motor car driven by the defendant. In an action for damages brought by the plaintiffs against the defendant the judge found the male plaintiff one third to blame for the accident and the defendant two thirds to blame. With regard to the female plaintiff's claim, he gave judgment in her favour for £405. On a counterclaim by the defendant against the male plaintiff for one third of the sum awarded to the female plaintiff,

HELD: the defendant's counterclaim being based on the judgment against him and not arising directly from the accident was not a "claim" within s. 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, nor was his liability to the female plaintiff, which also arose under the judgment and not directly from the accident, "damage" within the sub-section, and, therefore, the defendant could not recover against the male plaintiff under the sub-section.

Per MORRIS, L.J.: the defendant was not held liable to the wife because her husband was negligent towards her, but because he himself was negligent and caused her damage; the defendant and the husband were not joint tortfeasors but separate tortfeasors whose concurrent acts caused injury to the wife; and, therefore, the defendant had not suffered damage partly through the fault of the husband and his counterclaim was not a "claim" within s. 1 (1).

APPEAL by the defendant from an order of DEVLIN, J., dated July 31, 1951 (reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 713).

An action for damages for negligence was brought by a husband and wife against the defendant who counterclaimed for contribution in respect of contributory negligence. The wife was injured in a collision between a van in which she was being driven by her husband and a motor car driven by the defendant. The husband's claim was settled and liability was admitted for the wife's damage, but the amount of damages was not agreed, the defendant contending that the husband was partly responsible for the accident and therefore liable to make a contribution towards the damages recovered by the wife. DEVLIN, J., awarded the wife £405, and found that the husband was partly to blame, but dismissed the counterclaim on the ground that the defendant had not suffered any damage within the meaning of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1).

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 29. The following judgments were read.

SINGLETON, L.J.: This appeal arises on a counterclaim by the defendant in an action tried before DEVLIN, J. The judge decided against the defendant on claim and counterclaim, and he appeals against the judgment on the counterclaim. A

On June 4, 1950, the plaintiffs, Mr. and Mrs. Drinkwater, were in a motor van driven by Mr. Drinkwater, and when they were at cross-roads in Clapton there was a collision between the van and a motor car driven by the defendant. Mrs. Drinkwater was injured and the van was damaged, and Mr. Drinkwater was put to expense. The plaintiffs commenced an action against the defendant claiming damages for negligence. In respect of Mr. Drinkwater's claim a sum was paid into court and accepted by him, so that nothing remains to be said on it. Mrs. Drinkwater's claim for damages for personal injuries was heard, and the judge awarded £405 damages against the defendant on that claim. In his defence the defendant alleged that the collision was due solely to negligence on the part of Mr. Drinkwater, and he gave particulars. Alternatively, he alleged that Mr. Drinkwater was guilty of contributory negligence. By way of counterclaim he said: B

"If (contrary to the defendant's contention) the defendant is held to have been guilty of negligence contributing towards the happening of the matters complained of so that he is adjudged to pay damages to the female plaintiff, the defendant will contend that he has suffered damage within the meaning of s. 1 of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, caused partly by his own fault and partly by the fault of the male plaintiff." C

"(1) Where any person suffers damage as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced to such extent as the court thinks just and equitable having regard to the claimant's share in the responsibility for the damage: Provided that—(a) this sub-section shall not operate to defeat any defence arising under a contract; (b) where any contract or enactment providing for the limitation of liability is applicable to the claim, the amount of damages recoverable by the claimant by virtue of this sub-section shall not exceed the maximum limit so applicable. (2) Where damages are recoverable by any person by virtue of the foregoing sub-section subject to such reduction as is therein mentioned, the court shall find and record the total damages which would have been recoverable if the claimant had not been at fault. (3) Section 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935 (which relates to proceedings against, and contribution between, joint and several tortfeasors), shall apply in any case where two or more persons are liable or would, if they had all been sued, be liable by virtue of sub-s. (1) of this section in respect of the damage suffered by any person. (4) Where any person dies as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person or persons, and accordingly if an action were brought for the benefit of the estate under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, the damages recoverable would be reduced under sub-s. (1) of this section, any damages recoverable in an action brought for the benefit of the dependants of that person under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, shall be reduced to a proportionate extent. E

(5) Where, in any case to which sub-s. (1) of this section applies, one of the persons at fault avoids liability to any other such person or his personal representative by pleading the Limitation Act, 1939, or any other enactment limiting the time within which proceedings may be taken, he shall not be entitled to recover any damages or contributions from that other person or representative by virtue of the said sub-section. (6) Where any case to which sub-s. (1) of this section applies is tried with a jury, the jury shall determine the total damages which would have been recoverable if the claimant had not been at fault and the extent to which those damages are to be reduced."

Ten years earlier the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, had been passed and by s. 6 provided:

"(1) Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort (whether a crime or not)—(a) judgment recovered against any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage shall not be a bar to an action against any other person who would, if sued, have been liable as a joint tortfeasor in respect of the same damage; (b) if more than one action is brought in respect of that damage by or on behalf of the person by whom it was suffered, or for the benefit of the estate, or of the wife, husband, parent or child, of that person, against tortfeasors liable in respect of the damage (whether as joint tortfeasors or otherwise) the sums recoverable under the judgments given in those actions by way of damages shall not in the aggregate exceed the amount of the damages awarded by the judgment first given; and in any of those actions, other than that in which judgment is first given, the plaintiff shall not be entitled to costs unless the court is of opinion that there was reasonable ground for bringing the action; (c) any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tortfeasor or otherwise, so, however, that no person shall be entitled to recover contribution under this section from any person entitled to be indemnified by him in respect of the liability in respect of which the contribution is sought. (2) In any proceedings for contribution under this section the amount of the contribution recoverable from any person shall be such as may be found by the court to be just and equitable having regard to the extent of that person's responsibility for the damage; and the court shall have power to exempt any person from liability to make contribution, or to direct that the contribution to be recovered from any person shall amount to a complete indemnity."

Under s. 6 (1) (c) a tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would, if sued, have been, liable in respect of the same damage. A wife cannot succeed in an action against her husband for a tort of this nature, hence no claim by Mr. Kimber for contribution under s. 6 could succeed. The claim of the defendant is really a claim to contribution, but, as such a claim cannot succeed under s. 6 of the Act of 1935, he seeks to achieve the same end by claiming damages against Mr. Drinkwater and bringing into play s. 1 of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. That section does not create a right of action; it removes an obstacle. The fact that the defendant was himself negligent ceased to be a bar to his succeeding to some degree against someone else who was negligent if he proved damage. DEVLIN, J., awarded Mrs. Drinkwater £405 damages in her action against the defendant on the ground of negligence. On the defendant's counterclaim he formed the opinion that Mr. Drinkwater was one third to blame and the defendant two thirds, and he held that the defendant could not recover on his counterclaim.

The fact that a person might in certain circumstances be liable to contribute one third of the damages awarded does not mean that of necessity the person who pays the whole amount of damages has a right of action for damages against him. The defendant's counterclaim is that, if he is adjudged guilty of negligence in the action, he will contend that he has suffered damage within s. 1 (1) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, caused partly by his own fault and partly by the fault of the male plaintiff, and at the hearing he asked for judgment for £135, that is, one third of the damages he was ordered to pay to the female plaintiff. The answer to the problem would seem to be that the defendant has not shown that he suffered damage within the meaning of s. 1 (1). There was no proof of any damage to him or to his property in the accident. If there had been he would have been entitled to contribution in respect of it. He was subsequently found responsible in damages, and judgment was given against him for £405 for negligence. His liability arose on that judgment, and I do not think that it is damage within s. 1 (1).

This can be tested by asking when, if ever, the right of action of the defendant arose. The purpose of s. 1 was to remove the bar which stood in the way of someone who was at fault or who was negligent. It does not extend the right to contribution. The submission on behalf of the defendant is that it does so, or, at least, that it enables him to obtain as damages an amount which is equivalent to the contribution to which he would have been entitled but for the words in s. 6 (1) (c) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935

"who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage."

I cannot accept the submission of counsel for the defendant. Section 1 (3) of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, which introduces s. 6 of the Act of 1935 is directly opposed to the construction which he puts forward. Section 1 (3) preserves the limitation on contribution in the Act of 1935: it cannot be that that limitation is abolished inferentially by s. 1 (1). Further light is thrown on the matter by examination of sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (4) of s. 1 of the Act of 1945. It is sufficient to take the former. Where damages are recoverable by a person in a case to which sub-s. (1) applies, judgment is given for that amount. Under sub-s. (2)

"... the court shall find and record the total damages which would have been recoverable if the claimant had not been at fault."

Counsel for the defendant submitted that judgment should be entered for the defendant for £135 damages, but if the defendant had not been negligent no damages would have been recoverable by Mrs. Drinkwater and the court in such case would be bound to record the damages which would have been recoverable if the defendant had not been negligent as nil.

That satisfies me that this claim to damages, based on a judgment against a defendant and not arising directly from the accident, either is not a claim within the ambit of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, s. 1 (1), or that that which is claimed is not "damage" within the meaning of that word as used in the sub-section. I do not think that any help is given by the decisions in Admiralty cited to us. In the result, I reach the same conclusion as DEVLIN, J., reached, though he took a narrower view of the word "damage" than I do. I realise the difficulty which arises from s. 4 of the Act of 1945, and yet I cannot see why "damage" in the Act should be read in a different way from that in which it has always been treated under s. 6 of the Act of 1935. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree with the judgment which has just been delivered. I have also had an opportunity of reading and considering the judgment which is about to be delivered by MORRIS, L.J., and I agree with that judgment, too. In those circumstances I do not desire to deliver a judgment of my own.

MORRIS, L.J., stated the facts and continued: DEVLIN, J., dismissed the counterclaim, and, in dealing with it, he held that Mr. Drinkwater was to be blamed for the collision in the proportion of one third, and that the defendant was to be blamed in the proportion of two thirds. On these facts the defendant was a tortfeasor who was liable in respect of the damage suffered by the female plaintiff as a result of a tort. The opening words of s. 6 (1) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, are:

"Where damage is suffered by any person as a result of a tort . . ."

The female plaintiff was such a person. The opening words of para. (c) of s. 6 (1) of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, are:

"any tortfeasor liable in respect of that damage may recover contribution . . ."

The defendant was a tortfeasor liable in respect of the female plaintiff's damage. He would, without doubt, have wished to receive a contribution from the male plaintiff of one third of his liability. He could not, however, avail himself of the later words of s. 6 (1) (c)—that is, the words

". . . may recover contribution from any other tortfeasor who is, or would if sued have been, liable in respect of the same damage, whether as a joint tortfeasor or otherwise . . ."

He could not do so for the reason that the male plaintiff was not liable to the female plaintiff, and could not have been sued by her. Being unable to avail himself of s. 6 of the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, which section would, in regard to the present facts, denote Mrs. Drinkwater as one who has suffered damage as the result of a tort, the defendant turns to s. 1 of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, and claims that he is the person who has suffered damage. In effect, he claims to have suffered damage because he has been held liable for having caused damage.

Conceding that the Act of 1945 could hardly have been designed to cover the claim that he makes against Mr. Drinkwater, the defendant contends, nevertheless, that he can contrive to accommodate himself within the language used in the Act. Being thwarted in his not unnatural quest for contribution by the terms of the Act of 1935, he claims that the words of the Act of 1945, which was an Act passed to amend the law relating to contributory negligence, are wide enough to assist him. In my judgment, the counterclaim rightly failed. The Act of 1945 does not give the defendant a cause of action against Mr. Drinkwater. The Act does not purport to create any new variety of claim. The only claim which the defendant asserts by his counterclaim is in the terms which have been recited by SINGLETON, L.J., but the reason why the defendant has been held liable to Mrs. Drinkwater is because he himself was negligent towards her and caused her damage. He has not been held liable to her because Mr. Drinkwater was negligent towards her. Indeed, he was not a person responsible in law for the negligence of Mr. Drinkwater. The defendant and Mr. Drinkwater would not appear to have been joint tortfeasors: see The Koursk (1). They were separate tortfeasors whose concurrent acts caused injury to Mrs. Drinkwater. By operation of law, once she proves negligence against the defendant, then she may recover from him the full amount of the resultant damage she suffered. It is no defence to the defendant, as against her, to say that Mr. Drinkwater was also negligent.

If the defendant had by counterclaim against Mr. Drinkwater made a claim in respect of some damage done to his motor car he would have established, on the judge's findings, that Mr. Drinkwater was negligent, and that such negligence did cause him damage. Though he would himself have been the main author of the damage he would, as a result of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, have been able to recover one third of the amount of his necessary loss and expense. In the counterclaim that was presented, though it was asserted (and rightly so) that Mr. Drinkwater was negligent towards the defendant, it was not alleged that because of such negligence the defendant was caused to be negligent towards Mrs. Drinkwater. It is only because of his own negligence that the defendant has been held liable to her. That Mr. Drinkwater's negligence towards the defendant caused him to be negligent towards Mrs. Drinkwater was not alleged, and was not proved, and was not held. The defendant does not, therefore, establish any cause of action against Mr. Drinkwater, and, in my judgment, s. 1 of the Act of 1945, in dealing with the topic of contributory negligence, does not purport to bring into existence some new species of claim. Section 1 of that Act provides that a claim is not to be defeated in one particular way, that is, by setting up the defence of contributory negligence. The section does not touch the questions whether a claim exists at all or whether a claim can be met by any other defence.

Apart from these considerations, the defendant does not, in my judgment, bring himself within the language of s. 1 of the Act of 1945 in connection with the claim that he makes. In regard to his liability to Mrs. Drinkwater—which is the only subject of the counterclaim—he is not a person who has suffered damage. He is a person who has caused damage, but even if it could be said that because he has been adjudged by the court to be liable to pay damages to her he then comes within the words “where any person suffers damage”, it would be very doubtful whether he would come within the words which follow, that is, the words “as the result partly of his own fault and partly of the fault of any other person”. The legal liability to Mrs. Drinkwater would have flowed only from his own fault. The word “fault” is defined in s. 4 to mean “negligence, breach of statutory duty or other act or omission which gives rise to a liability in tort or would, apart from this Act, give rise to the defence of contributory negligence”.

In my judgment, it is not necessary to endeavour to define the word “damage” as used in the phrase “where any person suffers damage”. The Act does not define the word save to the extent that s. 4 provides that “‘damage’ includes loss of life and personal property”. The omission further to define was probably for the reason that the word is one which is well understood in legal parlance as being in many cases one of the elements to be proved in establishing liability in law. A plaintiff, for example, who shows that a defendant was guilty of some negligent act or omission towards him must also show that damage resulted to the plaintiff which was not too remote a consequence of the defendant's conduct. Section 1 (1) of the Act of 1945 uses the words

“... a claim in respect of that damage shall not be defeated by reason of the fault of the person suffering the damage, but the damages recoverable in respect thereof shall be reduced . . .”

It seems clear that the word “damage” refers to that which is suffered and for which a “claim” may be made and for which “damages” are recoverable. All this language is quite inapt to cover the liability of the defendant to Mrs. Drinkwater. Furthermore, even if such liability could be brought within the word “damage”, it is difficult to see how a “claim in respect of that damage” could be asserted, or how “damages” could be recoverable “in respect thereof”, that is, damages in respect of that damage. The counterclaim only arises if and when the defendant has been held liable to the female plaintiff because he has been negligent, and he could not, on any view, seek to recover from the male plaintiff the whole amount of the liability to Mrs. Drinkwater.

Further exemplification of the entire inaptness of the language of s. 1 of the Act of 1945 to cover the defendant's attempted counterclaim is found by considering the terms of sub-s. (2) and sub-s. (6). If the defendant had not been at fault and had not been liable to Mrs. Drinkwater the damages on the counterclaim would have been nil. Indeed, the counterclaim would not have arisen at all. If the counterclaim had been tried with a jury it would have been the duty of the judge to direct them that if the defendant were not at fault the damages would be nil. On the findings of the judge in this case the argument of the defendant involves that damages have to be "reduced" from nothing to £135, and that the court must duly record this strange phenomenon of contraction. That it was never intended by the Act of 1945 to vary the law as to contribution as it was left by the Law Reform (Married Women and Tortfeasors) Act, 1935, is shown by the fact that the later Act recites certain provisions of the former one without enacting any modifications or repeals. That the language used by the legislature in the Act of 1945 has undesignedly produced an unexpected result has not been established by the defendant.

On behalf of the defendant reliance was much placed on the decision in this court in The Cairnbahn (2). That decision does not advance the defendant's contentions. The steamer, Cairnbahn, had come into collision with one of two hopper barges which were in tow of the tug Nunthorpe. Damage was done to the hopper, and the Cairnbahn sustained damage to herself. No collision occurred with the Nunthorpe. Two actions were brought. One was by the owners of the hopper against the owners of the Cairnbahn; in that action the owners of the Nunthorpe were afterwards added as defendants. The second action was by the owners of the Cairnbahn against the owners of the Nunthorpe. The actions were consolidated. It was held that the Cairnbahn and the Nunthorpe were equally to blame, but that no blame attached to the hopper. The hopper recovered from the Cairnbahn alone the whole of her claim for damages. That judgment was satisfied. The owners of the Nunthorpe were then ordered by the President to pay to the owners of the Cairnbahn: (i) One half of the damage occasioned by the collision to the Cairnbahn; and (ii) one half of the damages paid by the owners of the Cairnbahn to the owners of the hopper. From that order of the President the owners of the Nunthorpe unsuccessfully appealed to this court. They contended that s. 1 of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911, regulated only the mode of apportioning a liability existing independently of the Act, and submitted that they were under no such liability. The defendant in the present appeal seeks to argue that just as the owners of the Cairnbahn were entitled to recover from the owners of the Nunthorpe a part of what had been paid to the innocent owners of the hopper, so here the defendant should be allowed to recover from Mr. Drinkwater a part of what has to be paid to Mrs. Drinkwater. The decision in The Cairnbahn (2) depended on the view formed of the effect of s. 1 of the Maritime Conventions Act, 1911—the wording and scope of which differ materially from the wording and scope of s. 1 of the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945. Section 1 (1) of the Act of 1911 begins with the words

"Where, by the fault of two or more vessels, damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels, to their cargoes or freight, or to any property on board, the liability to make good the damage or loss shall be in proportion to the degree in which each vessel was in fault . . ."

With the main point of controversy debated in The Cairnbahn (2) the present defendant has no concern, but he points to the fact that the payment made by the owners of the Cairnbahn to the owners of the hopper came within the words "damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels". The defendant can really derive no help from this circumstance, for there is an obvious material difference between the phrases "where any person suffers damage" and "damage or loss is caused to one or more of those vessels". On further examination it would appear that the payment made by the owners of the Cairnbahn was within the word "loss" rather than the word "damage". No point arose in fact as to the payment being within the words of the section. In his judgment, SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., said ([1914] P. 28):

"It was admitted in terms by counsel for the owners of the tug Nunthorpe that if the owners of the steamship were entitled to claim any damage from them, they, the owners of the steamship, were entitled to include in their damage or loss the amount of the judgment obtained against them by the innocent tow . . ."

In this court the matter seems to have been regarded as coming within the word "loss". LORD PARKER OF WADDINGTON, said (ibid., 31):

"This being so, the only remaining question is whether the sum recovered by way of damages against the owners of the Cairnbahn, by the owners of the hopper barge, damaged through the fault of the Cairnbahn and the Nunthorpe, is loss caused to the owners of the Cairnbahn within the meaning of the section. In my opinion it is."

LORD SUMNER, at the start of his judgment said (ibid., 32):

"The owners of the Cairnbahn suffered 'damage' because their ship ran into the hopper which was in tow of the tug Nunthorpe. They suffered 'loss' because the owners of the hopper sued them for her injuries and won."

Later he said (ibid., 33):

"The word 'loss' is wide enough to include that form of pecuniary prejudice which consists in compensating third parties for wrong done to them by the fault of persons for whose misconduct the party prejudiced must answer."

WARRINGTON, J., said (ibid., 38):

"There remains the question as to the damages paid to the owners of the hopper by the owners of the Cairnbahn. I fail to see why the sum so paid should not be properly held to come within the expression 'loss caused to that vessel'—treating the word 'vessel' in this part of the Act as used figuratively for the owners of the vessel."

I, therefore, consider that the decision in The Cairnbahn (2) affords no assistance to the argument of the defendant, but, even if he could bring his liability to Mrs. Drinkwater within the word "damage", the counterclaim would, for the reasons which have been given, nevertheless fail. I concur, therefore, in the conclusion that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), January 28, 29, 30, 31, February 1, 29, 1952.]

Bill of Exchange—Indorsement—Promissory note—Payable to "F. and F.N.Co."—Indorsement, by partner of firm, "F. and F.N."—Incomplete and irregular on its face—Plaintiffs suing as holders in due course—Entitled to succeed as holders for value—Bills of Exchange Act, 1882 (c. 61), s. 29 (1).

In pursuance of an agreement between the defendant and a firm for the purchase of shares the defendant made two promissory notes payable on demand on specified dates to "Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy Co. or order", the name being that of a firm in which Fathi Nabulsy and Faysal Nabulsy were the partners. The notes were indorsed to the order of the plaintiffs by Faysal Nabulsy, who had authority to sign for the firm, with the words: "Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy", the word "company" being omitted. This was the recognised signature of the partnership, and the plaintiffs discounted the notes in good faith and without notice of any defect in the title of the payees. On presentation the notes were dishonoured. On a claim against the defendant, as drawer of the notes, by the plaintiffs, as holders in due course,

HELD: (i) although the indorsement was valid to pass the title in the notes to the plaintiffs, the omission of the word "company" would give rise to a reasonable doubt whether the payees and the indorsers were necessarily the same, and, therefore, the notes could not be said to be complete and regular on the face of them and the plaintiffs could not succeed as holders in due course within s. 29 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, but

(ii) the plaintiffs having pleaded that they were holders in due course were entitled to rely on the more limited allegation, although not pleaded, that they were holders for value; the defendant had failed to plead any defect in their title; and, therefore, he was liable to the plaintiffs on the notes.

APPEAL by defendant from an order of McNAIR, J., dated July 27, 1951, in an action on two promissory notes made by the defendant of which the plaintiffs were holders.

The defendant had made the notes, each for £10,000, in favour of "Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy Co. or order", a firm of which Fathi Nabulsy and Faysal Nabulsy were partners. The notes were given in part payment for certain shares. The plaintiffs claimed that the notes were duly indorsed to the order of the plaintiffs, who held them as holders in due course, and that they were duly presented for payment and were dishonoured. By his defence the defendant admitted that the notes had been dishonoured, but alleged that he was induced to make and deliver the notes by the fraud of the payees in that the shares were charged to a bank to secure an overdraft, and that he had had to pay £20,000 to this bank to obtain the shares. The defendant further denied that the plaintiffs were holders in due course or that they had given value and alleged that they were only agents for collection on behalf of the payees. It was further alleged that the plaintiffs had knowledge of the fraud of the payees and, therefore, did not take the notes in good faith. At the hearing the defendant sought to raise a new point, viz., that the notes were not complete and regular on their face in that the indorsement by one of the partners of the payee firm was "Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy" the word "company" having been omitted. McNAIR, J., refused leave to amend the defence to include this point, but allowed the defendant to argue it as a point of law. He found that there was no fraud; that the plaintiffs had acted in good faith and without notice of any defect in the notes; and that, there being no evidence that the payee firm constituted a legal entity distinct from the two partners, the notes were complete and regular on their face and the defendant was liable to the plaintiffs on them.

Nelson, Q.C., and F. Atkinson for the defendant.

Gardiner, Q.C., F. A. Stockdale and J. J. Nasir for the plaintiffs.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 29. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The plaintiff bank sues the defendant as maker of two promissory notes both dated July 12, 1946, and each for £10,000 payable on demand on July 1, 1947, and Dec. 31, 1947. The payee was "Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy Co. or order". That was the name of a firm registered in Palestine in which Fathi Nabulsy and Faysal Nabulsy were the two partners. The statement of claim goes on to allege that the notes were duly indorsed to the order of the plaintiffs, who have also indorsed them, and are held by the plaintiffs as holders in due course, and that the notes were duly presented for payment and were dishonoured. The defendant admits that he is the maker and that the notes were dishonoured. He then sets out, and this is not disputed, that the notes were given in pursuance of an agreement between the defendant and the payee firm as part of the purchase price for shares in the Lostock Hall Spinning Co., Ltd. Transfer certificates were executed on the signing of the agreement and the payees undertook to forward the share certificates to the defendant. In his defence the defendant denies that the plaintiffs are holders in due course, denies that they gave value, and alleges that they were agents for collection only on behalf of the payees.

[HIS LORDSHIP dealt with issues which do not call for report, and continued:] The point with which we are concerned was not pleaded. It was produced by counsel on the second day of the hearing. It was this. The indorsement which was in Arabic and English was "Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy", the final word "company" being omitted. It was submitted that the notes, when taken by the plaintiffs, were, therefore, not complete and regular on their face, and, therefore, the plaintiffs were not holders in due course. The learned judge originally ruled that this point should have been pleaded and he refused leave to amend. He later held that it could be argued as a point of law. I will come back to these rulings later.

Section 29 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, provides:

"A holder in due course is a holder who has taken a bill, complete and regular on the face of it, under the following conditions; namely, (a) That he became the holder of it before it was overdue, and without notice that it had been previously dishonoured, if such was the fact: (b) That he took the bill in good faith and for value, and that at the time the bill was negotiated to him he had no notice of any defect in the title of the person who negotiated it."

Other relevant sections of the Act are s. 30 (1) and (2) and s. 38, paras. (1) (2) and (3). The indorsements, according to the evidence as accepted by the learned judge, were written by Mr. Faysal Nabulsy, who had authority to sign for the firm, at the Jerusalem branch of the plaintiffs in the presence of its manager. This followed on an interview at which the plaintiffs, having made inquiries as to the defendant's financial standing, agreed to discount the notes. The learned judge, having allowed the point to be argued, found that the bills were complete and regular on their face notwithstanding the discrepancy. I will set out his conclusion before considering the authorities.

"None of the cases to which I was referred dealt in terms with the question whether a deviation in the form of the indorsement from the exact description of the payee in the bill prevented the bill from being complete and regular on the face of it; but, holding, as I do, that the signature of the names of the two partners Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy by the hand of the one partner Faysal was the known and recognised signature of the partnership and would leave nobody in any reasonable doubt that the named payee intended to pass property in the bill to the bank, and there being no evidence that Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy Co. constituted a legal entity distinct from the two natural persons Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy, I find nothing in the decided cases which compels me to hold that an indorsement in this form involves that the bills were not complete and regular on their face. Accordingly, I hold that the defendant fails on this issue."

Counsel for the defendant relied on the decision of this court in Slingsby v. District Bank, Ltd. (1), affirming and approving a judgment of WRIGHT, J. In that case the plaintiff had made out a cheque to John Prust and Co., a firm of London stockbrokers. A partner in the firm of solicitors who acted for the plaintiff, Messrs. Cumberbirch and Potts, fraudulently inserted after the name of the payee the words "per Cumberbirch & Potts". He then indorsed the cheque "Cumberbirch & Potts" and paid it dishonestly into the account at the Westminster Bank of a company in which he was interested. The cheque was presented to and paid by the defendant bank who claimed to debit the plaintiffs' account. The plaintiff brought the action claiming to be relieved from the debit. Various points were raised. The defendant bank sought to invoke, inter alia, the protection of s. 64 of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. This protection was only available if the Westminster Bank was a holder in due course. WRIGHT, J., held ([1931] 2 K.B. 600) that, if his view of the incorrectness of the indorsement was right, the cheque was not complete and regular on its face. There was evidence that in a certain class of case a practice had arisen of drawing cheques "Pay A.B. per X". This was done in cases where dividends are collected by a bank for its customer. Evidence was called that such cheques were indorsed, not "A.B. per X", but simply "X." The witnesses were confronted with publications, admittedly organs of the profession, which stated that the proper indorsement was "A.B. per X." This latter was the conclusion of WRIGHT, J., and of this court. The representative capacity of X which appears on the face of the bill must appear in the indorsement. If X alone appears he is purporting to indorse as principal, which is "a departure from the terms of the mandate appearing on the face of the cheque". In this court, SCRUTTON, L.J., held ([1932] 1 K.B. 559) that the cheque was not properly indorsed, and that the indorsement should have been "John Prust & Co. per pro Cumberbirch & Potts". GREER, L.J., held (ibid., 564) that

"... the indorsement was ineffective, and that the defendants cannot rely upon the payment made to an indorsee who is some person other than the payee."

A number of cases were referred to. In some of them the question was whether partners were liable on bills or notes which were made in a name which varied to some extent from the true name of the firm. Such a point was taken in Forbes v. Marshall (2). POLLOCK, C.B., held (11 Exch. 176) that the name used was substantially the name of the firm and that was sufficient. The other members of the court agreed. MARTIN, B., said (ibid., 180):

"... if the name, though inaccurately stated, substantially describes the firm, that is sufficient."

It is interesting, as the learned judge pointed out, that in that case MARTIN, B., expressed a doubt as to an earlier decision, Kirk v. Blurton (3). That case was in its area the converse of the present case. The name of the firm was John Blurton. The bill was signed and indorsed John Blurton & Co. The court held the partners not bound. MARTIN, B., in Forbes v. Marshall (2), said (11 Exch. 180):

"I think that 'John Blurton & Co.' meant the firm of 'John Blurton'."

These cases are, of course, in a different area, but they show that in that area the courts have adopted the test as stated by MARTIN, B. Precise correspondence is not required.

I will refer briefly to some of the cases dealing with indorsements. In Leonard v. Wilson (4) a cheque payable to "Terney and Farley" was indorsed "Terney and Farely". The facts were complicated, but LORD LYNDHURST, C.B., held that the indorsement, which, though mis-spelt, was authorised, passed the property in the bill. The indorsee might have maintained an action. It is worth noting that a custom of London bankers to refuse bills where there is a letter wrong in an indorsement was admitted. I agree with the learned judge who, referring to this case, held that the indorsement of the notes here was valid and passed the property. In Hadley & Co. v. Henry (5) a bill made payable to the Union Bank of Australia was indorsed by a sub-manager in the name of the Union Bank of Australia, Ltd. It was argued this was not an indorsement. HOOP, J., held that it was. It was plain that the drawer intended the bill to be payable to the Union Bank of Australia, Ltd. On the other hand, in Bank of Montreal v. Exhibit & Trading Co., Ltd. (6), a promissory note was made by the defendants payable to the Goderich Organ Co. That was the name of a firm with which, one gathers, the defendants had done business. When it reached the payees the business of the firm had been transferred to a limited company, the Goderich Organ Co., Ltd. An official of the limited company added the word "Limited" on the face of the note and indorsed it in the limited company's name to the plaintiffs who claimed as holders in due course. Under s. 64 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882, the note was payable according to its original tenor, and it was argued that the limited company was the same as the firm. This was, of course, wrong. PHILLIMORE, J., held that, as there were two legal entities involved, a bill payable to one could not be validly indorsed by the other. The distinction between the two cases is clear. In the first there was only one legal entity in fact, named on the face by words which identified it to anyone. An indorsement in its full and proper name though different was valid. In the second there were two legal entities, the note being intended for the one which had not indorsed it.

Evidence was tendered in the present case and led for the defendant de bene esse by bankers who said that it was against the practice of bankers to accept indorsements unless there was an exact correspondence. The practice of bankers is, or may be, relevant when a court has to consider whether a bank has been negligent or has acted in the ordinary course of business under s. 60, s. 79, s. 80 or s. 82 of the Act of 1882. It is also, no doubt, relevant in considering the relation of banker and customer. That relation will ordinarily be subject to universal practice. It does not, however, I think, solve the present problem any more than it does the question whether an indorsement is valid to pass the property: Leonard v. Wilson (4).

I have referred to these cases as they were discussed before us, but I agree with the learned judge that none of them is conclusive on the point raised in the present case. The point as sought to be taken here by the defendant has a certain unreality. In CHALMERS' BILLS OF EXCHANGE, 11th ed., p. 93, the learned author, in considering the words "complete and regular on the face of it", expresses their intention in this sentence:

"If the bill itself conveys a warning, caveat emptor."

Here the notes were indorsed by a person authorised to indorse for the payee in the presence of the "emptor", and, as the learned judge found, the signature as indorsed was known to the defendant as the ordinary and recognised signature of the partnership. Is this, as the learned judge thought, relevant? I have with reluctance come to the conclusion that it is not and that one must consider whether, disregarding the circumstances as set out above, the bill as a document is regular on the face of it. Considered from this angle, is the discrepancy one which on the face of it is an inadvertent discrepancy—"John Williams" as payee indorsing "J. Williams"? Though this would entitle a bank or anyone else to refuse to buy or discount a bill, it would not, in my opinion, make it irregular on its face. I was inclined at first to think that the omission of the word "company" was such a discrepancy. I have had the advantage of reading the judgment about to be delivered by ROMER, L.J. I need not repeat but I agree with what he says as to the legal significance of the word "company". The learned judge clearly considered this point as he relied on the fact that there was no evidence that Fathi & Faysal Nabulsy Co. constituted a legal entity distinct from the two natural persons, Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy. The absence of such evidence would clearly be relevant to the question whether it was a valid indorsement to pass the property, but I think completeness and regularity must be determined by looking only at the bill, with a realisation that there might be evidence that there were two legal entities, one "A. and B." and the other "A and B. Co." I have, therefore, with some hesitation come to the conclusion that these notes were not regular and complete on their face by reason of the omission of the word "company". I do not, for reasons which will appear, think that this entitles the defendant to succeed, but, as the learned judge dealt with the point, I thought it right to express my conclusion on it.

Counsel for the defendant took a further point and submitted that the signature should have been "for Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy Co.", and signed by one of the partners. No authority was cited for this proposition and it seems to me inconsistent with the indorsement which SCRUTTON, L.J., said should have been on the bills in the Slingsby case (1).

I now come to the question whether the learned judge should have allowed the point to be raised or whether, in any event, it entitles the defendant to succeed. The learned judge decided that the point was available to the defendant and could be taken on the basis that it was a bare point of law arising from the facts apparent on the notes. In the first place I am clear that this point should have been pleaded. A holder of a bill is, prima facie, presumed to be a holder in due course: s. 30 (2) of the Act of 1882. R.S.C., Ord. 21, r. 2, provides:

"In actions upon bills of exchange, promissory notes, or cheques, a defence in denial must deny some matter of fact, e.g. . . . indorsing . . ."

The predecessor of this rule can be found set out in BULLEN & LEAKE, 3rd ed., at p. 520, note (a):

"in all actions upon bills of exchange and promissory notes, the plea of 'non assumpsit' and 'never indebted' shall be inadmissible. In such actions, therefore, a plea in denial must traverse some matter of fact."

Examples are given as they appear in Ord. 21, r. 2. The fact relied on here is the absence of the word "company" in the indorsement and its presence on the face of the bill. It seems to me quite plain that, if this had been the only point in answer to the plaintiffs' claim as holders in due course, it must have appeared in the defence. But it does not in itself establish the non-liability of the defendant. It means that the plaintiffs' claim may be defeated by defects of title of prior parties or personal defences available to prior parties among themselves. The principle to be gathered from the rule and its predecessor is that a defendant sued on a bill must allege the facts on which he relies in disputing his liability on the bill or note. In the old days, as the cases show, bills passed through many hands. Fraud or defects in title or personal defences affecting prior parties might be relevant to liability or shift the onus. It was for the defendant to make out a defence. In Agra & Masterman's Bank v. Leighton (7) BRAMWELL, B., said (L.R. 2 Exch. 61):

"The intention of the Bills of Exchange Act was, that where there was no pretence for a defence, the party sued should not be allowed to defend, and the holder should have judgment as of course; but that, if the defendant had a real, I do not say good, defence, he should have leave to appear and set it up."

That decision was on the Bills of Exchange Act, 1855, which applied in substance to actions on bills of exchange and promissory notes the existing Ord. 16 procedure.

On a claim on a bill of exchange or promissory note the defendant cannot simply put the plaintiff to the proof. Now, the learned judge on re-consideration allowed the defendant to challenge the indorsement so long as he did not rely on any specific facts other than those appearing on the bills, and I would myself have been inclined to add, and probably the learned judge intended this, facts already to be found in the defence if proved. If it had been established that the indorsement was invalid to pass the property, that would have been one thing. I agree with the learned judge, as I have said, that it was plainly valid to pass the property. The plaintiffs were holders who on the facts as found gave value in good faith. Counsel for the plaintiffs, when he had time to consider the matter, submitted to the learned judge that the plaintiffs could succeed as holders. The learned judge disallowed this on the ground that the plaintiffs had claimed as holders in due course and could not claim in the alternative as holders. It was, as I understand it, agreed before us that on the learned judge's judgment a further claim could be brought in other proceedings on the basis that the plaintiffs were holders. I do not think with respect that this is right. Assume that the only case which the defendant here desired to put forward was that the plaintiffs, though holders for value in good faith, had discounted a bill incomplete on its face and took it, therefore, subject to a defect in title of a prior party, he would have had to allege, not only the incompleteness, but the facts establishing the defects of title. I do not agree that he could have pleaded the incompleteness and defeated the plaintiffs' claim unless they, the plaintiffs, amended by claiming in the alternative as holders. The object of the proceedings is to determine whether the defendant is liable on the bill. He may be, although the plaintiffs are holders, but not in due course. This shows that the point is a bare point of law only if, quoad defects of title, the defendant is restricted to the allegations in his defence. If he had succeeded in establishing that the notes had been obtained by fraud, but failed to establish the plaintiffs' knowledge, it may be that he could have succeeded once he had shown that by reason of the incompleteness of the notes the plaintiffs were not holders in due course. But he failed to establish the only fraud or defect in title he alleged. I have, therefore, come to the conclusion, first, that the point did require an amendment, and on this basis the learned judge was not prepared to allow it, and with that decision I agree. Secondly, it fails to avail the defendant on the only basis on which he was allowed to argue it, namely, as a bare point of law.

In these circumstances the only points open to the defendant are those raised in his defence and on these he failed. In differing from the learned judge on this aspect of the case, I would like to say this. The case as raised in the defence and as fought was a difficult and complicated one. Into this field was inserted the present intricate, and, to me, difficult, point—difficult in itself and difficult in its relation to pleading. It is one of those cases in which the court which hears a second argument, when the plaintiffs' counsel had had time to consider the implications, has a great advantage from which I, at any rate, tried to benefit. In my opinion, the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: The first question in this case is whether the Arab Bank, Ltd., were holders in due course of the promissory note, and that depends on whether, at the time they took it, it was "complete and regular on the face of it" within s. 29 (1) of the Bills of Exchange Act, 1882. Strangely enough, no one doubts that the "face" of a bill includes the back of it. I say strangely enough, because people so often insist on the literal interpretation of Acts of Parliament, whereas here everyone agrees that the literal interpretation must be ignored because the meaning is obvious. The meaning is that, looking at the bill, front and back, without the aid of outside evidence, it must be complete and regular in itself.

Now, regularity is a different thing from validity. The Act itself makes a careful distinction between them. On the one hand, an indorsement which is quite invalid may be regular on the face of it. Thus, the indorsement may be forged or unauthorised, and, therefore, invalid under s. 24 of the Act, but, nevertheless, there may be nothing about it to give rise to any suspicion. The bill is then quite regular on the face of it. Conversely, an indorsement which is quite irregular may, nevertheless, be valid. Thus, by a misnomer, a payee may be described on the face of the bill by the wrong name, nevertheless, if it is quite plain that the drawer intended him as payee, then an indorsement on the back by the payee in his own true name is valid and sufficient to pass the property in the bill: Leonard v. Wilson (4); Bird & Co. (London), Ltd. v. Thomas Cook & Son, Ltd. (8); Hadley & Co. v. Henry (5), but the difference between front and back makes the indorsement irregular unless the payee adds also the misnomer by which he was described on the front of the bill. That is what he eventually did in Leonard v. Wilson (4). Regularity is also different from liability. The Act makes a distinction between these two also. On the one hand, a person who makes an irregular indorsement is liable thereon despite the irregularity. Thus, if a payee, who is wrongly described on the front of the bill, indorses it in his own true name, the indorsement is irregular, but he is liable to any subsequent holder and cannot set up the irregularity as a defence, or, if he is rightly described on the front of the bill, but indorses it in an assumed name, the indorsement is irregular, but he is liable thereon as if he had indorsed it in his own name: see s. 23, para. (1) and s. 55 (2) of the Act. Conversely, a regular indorsement will not impose liability if it is forged or unauthorised. Thus, where a firm is the payee, but is described in an unauthorised name which is substantially different from its real name, an indorsement by one partner in that name does not impose liability on the other partners: Kirk v. Blurton (3). It would be otherwise if the name was substantially the same, Forbes v. Marshall (2).

Once regularity is seen to differ both from validity and from liability, the question is: When is an indorsement irregular? The answer is, I think, that it is irregular whenever it is such as to give rise to doubt whether it is the indorsement of the named payee. A bill of exchange is like currency. It should be above suspicion. But if it is asked: When does an indorsement give rise to doubt?, then I would say that that is a practical question which is, as a rule, better answered by a banker than a lawyer. Bankers have to consider the regularity of indorsements every week, every day of every week, and every hour of every day, whereas the judges sitting in this court have not had to consider it for these last twenty years. So far as I know, the last occasion was in Slingsby's case (1). The law merchant is founded on the custom of merchants, and we shall not go far wrong if we follow the custom of bankers of the city of London on this point. They have given evidence that they would not accept the indorsements in the present case as regular indorsements. They said that, if a bill is made payable to "Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy Co." they would not accept an indorsement "Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy". I think there is good sense in their view. For aught they know, in Palestine the word "company" may be of vital significance. It may there signify a different legal entity just as the word "limited" does here: Bank of Montreal v. Exhibit & Trading Co. (6); or it may signify a firm of many partners and not merely two of them. I agree with the bankers that this indorsement does give rise to doubt whether it is the indorsement of the named payee. It was, therefore, irregular. It was suggested that this attitude of bankers was an excess of caution in their own interests. They insist on strict conformity, it was said, so as to be able to avail themselves of the protection of s. 60, s. 79, s. 80 and s. 82 of the Act of 1882, which they fear they may lose if they pay on an indorsement which does not correspond exactly with the name of the payee. But it is to be noticed that this usage of bankers goes back to times long before those sections were part of the law. The usage certainly existed in 1834: see Leonard v. Wilson (4); whereas s. 60 did not appear, even in its original form, until 1853, and s. 79, s. 80 and s. 82 until 1878. The truth is, I think, that the bankers adopted this strict attitude both in their own interests and also in the interests of their customers. It would be quite impossible for them to make inquiries to see that all the indorsements on a bill are, in fact, genuine, but they can at least see that they are regular on the face of them: see Bank of England v. Vagliano Brothers (9) ([1891] A.C. 157 per LORD MACNAGHTEN). That is some safeguard against dishonesty. It is a safeguard which the bankers have taken for the past one hundred and twenty years at least, and I do not think we should throw any doubt today on the correctness of their practice.

I do not stay to discuss the regularity of indorsements by married women or titled folk, except to say that titles and descriptions can often be omitted without impairing the regularity of the indorsement. The word "company" in this case is not, however, mere description. It is part of the name itself. It was suggested that an indorsement in Arabic letters would be regular. I cannot accept this view. The indorsement should be in the same lettering as the name of the payee, for otherwise it could not be seen on the face of it to be regular. My conclusion is, therefore, that the promissory notes, when they were taken by the plaintiffs, were not complete and regular on their face. They were not, therefore, holders in due course.

Now I must come to the pleadings. The plaintiffs claimed that they were "holders in due course". They have failed to make good that claim because the indorsement was not regular on the face of it. But, nevertheless, it is, I think, open to them to claim as "holders". The difference between the rights of a "holder in due course" and those of a "holder" is that a holder in due course may get a better title than the person from whom he took, whereas a holder gets no better title. In this regard a person who takes a bill, which is irregular on the face of it, is in the same position as a person who takes a bill which is overdue. He is a holder, but not a holder in due course. He does not receive the bill on its own intrinsic credit. He takes it on the credit of the person who gives it to him: cf. Brown v. Davies (10), per BULLER, J. (3 Term Rep. 82). He can sue in his own name but he takes it subject to the defects of title of prior parties: see s. 38 of the Act of 1882. Under the rules of pleading, as I have always understood them, a pleader who has pleaded more than he strictly need have done can always disregard the unnecessary or surplus averments and rely simply on the more limited ones. Thus, the plaintiffs here who have alleged that they are "holders in due course" can rely on the more limited allegation that they are "holders", because the greater allegation of "holders in due course" include the lesser allegation of "holders".

Counsel for the defendant argued strongly to the contrary, but he was forced to admit that, if he were right, the result would be that the plaintiffs would lose this action as "holders in due course", but could then immediately bring another action as "holders" and fight the battle over again. I would be sorry if the rules of pleading led to such a result, but I do not think they do. On these pleadings I think the plaintiffs were clearly entitled to rely on the fact that they were "holders" and the defendant has to meet a claim on that footing. I see no injustice to the defendant in this. When he was faced with the claim by the plaintiffs as "holders in due course", neither he nor his advisers noticed that there was any irregularity on the face of the note. He would, therefore, as a matter of course, plead any defects of title which he thought he could prove, for, by so doing, he would put the burden of proof on the plaintiffs. When faced with a claim as "holders", he would plead the self-same defects, not merely to alter the burden of proof, but to defeat the claim altogether. In either case he would plead all the defects which he thought he could prove. He did, in fact, plead one defect of title in the Nabulsy brothers. He pleaded that they obtained the notes by fraud. He failed to prove that plea. He now seeks to allege another defect. He says that they negotiated the notes in fraud of him, knowing they could not hand over the share certificates. That allegation was neither pleaded nor proved. If it was to be relied on, it certainly should have been pleaded. Not having been pleaded, it cannot now be raised. It has been repeatedly said in this court that fraud must be distinctly alleged and as distinctly proved. The result is that no defect has been shown to exist in the title of the Nabulsy brothers. There is no answer to the plaintiffs' claim as holders, and the appeal must be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J., dealt with the pleadings and continued: I think myself that the proper view to take is that the defence must be treated as having been amended to the extent that an amendment was necessary, with the result that it was open to the defendant to rely at the hearing on the "want of conformity point" and that it was open to him to rely on it before this court. It, accordingly, becomes necessary to consider whether the plaintiffs became holders in due course of the bills notwithstanding the omission of the word "company" from the indorsement. My brethren have so fully reviewed such authority as exists on this matter that I will not take up time in considering the cases myself. None of them is decisive of the present problem.

The question depends on whether the bills were "complete and regular on the face of" them in spite of the omission to which I have referred. In the absence of any direct authority on the point the learned judge held that the absence of the word "company" from the indorsement was immaterial and it seems that he founded his decision on the combined effect of three elements, viz., (i) that the signature of the names of the two partners, Fathi & Faysal Nabulsy, by the hand of the one partner, Faysal, was the known and recognised signature of the partnership, (ii) that such signature would leave nobody in any reasonable doubt that the named payee intended to pass property in the bills to the bank, and (iii) that there was no evidence that Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy Co. constituted a legal entity distinct from the two natural persons Fathi and Faysal Nabulsy. It is to be observed that of these three considerations the first and the third are peculiar to the circumstances of this particular case, and are, therefore, not germane to counsel's point of law, which is a perfectly general one. As to the second consideration I agree that the indorsement, which in no way transgressed s. 32 of the Act, passed to the bank the title of the indorsers. But if (as I think is the case) the learned judge intended to convey that, because the indorsement sufficed to pass the title, it necessarily follows that it was "complete and regular" within the meaning of s. 29 (1) I find a difficulty in agreeing. It seems to me that that question depends, not so much on whether the indorsers intended to pass the title and succeeded in doing so as between themselves and the indorsees, but on whether it is apparent from the indorsement that they were the same persons as the payees, and were, accordingly, the proper persons to make the indorsement. The argument of counsel for the defendant as to this is that (apart from titles of courtesy such as "The Hon.", "Mr.", etc.) there must be absolute conformity between the name or description of the payees and the name or description of the indorsers, and that, in the absence of such conformity, a holder of a bill cannot claim the special privileges which the Act confers on holders in due course whatever rights he may have as a holder for value.

Now, whether or not counsel is right in the full scope of his contention, the word "company" clearly is, or may be, one of considerable legal significance. Following on the names of individuals and preceded by the word "and" it would probably denote a partnership. Without the word "and" (as in the case before us) it might (where the concern was an English one) denote either an unlimited company or an unregistered company or (in the case of a foreign enterprise) a body possessing under the law of its domicile a legal entity of its own resembling that of a limited liability company in England. I think that one or other of these interpretations would be quite likely to appeal to the ordinary business man or banker, and I cannot think that the common sense view of the matter is that the word "company" adds nothing of significance to the individual names which precede it. In my opinion, the average person would assume that the addition of the word "company" to, e.g., "John & James Smith", was intended to have some meaning, and he would visualise from its presence something in the nature of a corporate entity, or, at all events, some juridical conception which would not have occurred to him had the individual names stood alone. It would, accordingly, follow, in my judgment, in the present case that the omission of the word "company" from the indorsement would reasonably give rise to a doubt whether in point of personality the payees and the indorsers were necessarily the same. If so, the bills cannot, as I think, be said to be "complete and regular" on their face.

This view of the matter appears to be in conformity with that of WRIGHT, J., and of SCRUTTON, L.J., in the Slingsby case (1) and also with the evidence of banking practice (assuming it to have been admissible) which was called by the defendant in the present case. Accordingly, subject to the point next mentioned, I would be in favour of allowing the appeal. I would add that I have not overlooked the considerations referred to by the learned judge which are special to this particular case and which I have previously mentioned, but they do not fect the conclusion at which I have arrived. On the assumption that the want of conformity " point was open to the defendant and that the point could be decided in his favour, counsel for the plaintiffs argued that the plaintiffs would, nevertheless, be entitled to succeed on the ground that they were holders for value. A claim on this footing was not pleaded, and my brethren both take the view that, on the principle that the greater includes the less, it was not necessary to plead it inasmuch as the plaintiffs' claim to be holders in due course necessarily involved also the assertion of their rights as holders for value. On this view the defendant must be taken to have pleaded all defences on which he relied as an answer to a claim by the plaintiffs as holders for value, and, as none of the defences which he did plead to the plaintiffs' statement of claim has succeeded, the plaintiffs are entitled to judgment in that capacity. I do not dissent from this view, but I feel that it is very desirable that pleadings should show as plainly as possible what the issues between the parties are, and that it would, at all events, be preferable that a plaintiff who intends to rely on his rights as a holder for value if he fails in his claim to be a holder in due course should say so expressly in his statement of claim. Had the plaintiffs done so in the present case, either in their original statement of claim or by amendment when counsel for the defendant introduced his argument under s. 29 (1) of the Act, it would have been clear beyond doubt what the issues were and the learned judge would not have felt himself precluded as, in his view, he was precluded, from forming or expressing a conclusion on the plaintiffs' position as holders for value. However, as I have indicated, I do not dissent from the views of my brethren on this matter, which is one of procedure in a somewhat specialised field, and, accordingly, I concur in the proposed order dismissing the appeal. With regard to the other matters which were argued before us I am entirely in agreement with the views which SOMERVELL and PENNING, L.J.J., have expressed on them and no useful purpose would be served by my adding any observations of my own.

Appeal dismissed.

BEAUCHAMP v. TURRELL.

QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Sellers, J.), October 16, 1951, February 27, 1952.]

Shipping—Limitation of liability—Loss of life—"Actual fault or privity of shipowner"—Negligence of shipowner's servants—Failure to provide safe system of work—Merchant Shipping Act, 1894 (c. 60), s. 503 (1).

While securing the mizzen sail of a steam drifter, a member of the crew stood on the canvas cover of a dinghy which was alongside, in accordance with the method of doing such work which was employed on board the ship with the knowledge of the master. Through the carelessness of a servant of the shipowner on board the ship the rope used for securing the sail was not of sufficient strength for the purpose, and, when the seaman in question pulled it, it gave way and he fell overboard and was drowned. In an action by the widow of the seaman for damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, in respect of her husband's death, the shipowner was found to be liable to the plaintiff because of the failure of his servants to exercise reasonable care and/or because of the breach by him of the duty which he owed to the seaman to provide a safe system of work.

Held: the failure of the shipowner's servants to exercise reasonable care and the breach of duty by the shipowner being in respect of matters within the province of the servants responsible, did not make the shipowner guilty of "actual fault or privity" in connection with the loss of the seaman's life so as to deprive him of his rights under s. 503 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, and he was, therefore, entitled to limit his liability to the damages under that sub-section.

ACTION for damages for negligence by the defendant or his servants.

The plaintiff was the widow of a seaman, a member of the crew of the steam drifter Covent Garden which was owned by the defendant. To secure the mizzen sail after it had been lowered on the boom the seaman stood on the canvas covering of a dinghy which was alongside in accordance with the method of doing the work employed on board the ship with the knowledge of the master. He was pulling on a small length of rope used for securing the mizzen sail, when it gave way and he fell overboard and was drowned. The plaintiff claimed damages for her loss under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and for the benefit of the seaman's estate under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. At the hearing at Norwich Assizes counsel for the shipowner was granted leave to amend the defence so as to raise a plea under s. 503 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which permits a shipowner in appropriate circumstances to limit his liability where any loss of life is caused to a person being carried in his ship. The issue of negligence or breach of duty was tried at the assizes, and SELLERS, J., found that, through the carelessness of some servant of the shipowner on board the ship, the rope must have been worn and of insufficient strength for the purpose, that the employee at the time of the accident was standing in an unsuitable place for securing the mizzen, and that this was an unsatisfactory way of doing the work for which the master of the Covent Garden was responsible. He held, therefore, that the death of the seaman was brought about by a breach of duty owed by the shipowner or his servants to the seaman for which the plaintiff was entitled to recover damages, subject to any right of the shipowner to limit his liability under the Act of 1894. The issue on this limitation of liability on the amended defence was tried in London, and the decision thereon is the subject of this report.

G. A. Draycott for the plaintiff.

J. F. Donaldson for the shipowner (the defendant).

SELLERS, J.: The plaintiff has established liability against the shipowner who is vicariously liable for the acts of his servants on board the ship, i.e., the master or whoever else was responsible for putting that piece of rope into use. Apart from that it was said that the shipowner was in breach of his common law duty in that at the time of this accident a proper system of work was not being adopted, i.e., the method of standing on the dinghy. It is said that that improper system of work was a breach of duty which the shipowner owed the deceased man—a type of duty which was personal to the shipowner and which he does not escape even if he can establish that he took all reasonable care to delegate to an appropriate and qualified person the task of performing it. If, in fact, it is not carried out in so far as reasonable care could have achieved it, it is said the employer is responsible.

It was that aspect of the case which called for consideration when the shipowner amended the defence so as to rely on the limitation provisions. Section 503 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, which is applicable, so far as is relevant to this case is in these terms:

“ The owners of a ship, British or foreign, shall not, where all or any of the following occurrences take place without their actual fault or privity; (that is to say,) (a) Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person being carried in the ship; (b) Where any damage or loss is caused to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board the ship; (c) Where any loss of life or personal injury is caused to any person carried in any other vessel by reason of the improper navigation of the ship; (d) Where any loss or damage is caused to any other vessel, or to any goods, merchandise, or other things whatsoever on board any other vessel, by reason of the improper navigation of the ship; be liable to damages beyond the following amounts . . . ”

Then the provisions for assessing those amounts are dealt with in detail. It is said that the breach of duty of the shipowner here is of that type which does not simply arise from vicarious liability for his servant's wrongdoing but is personal to the employer, being either a statutory duty such as arose in Lochgelly Iron & Coal Co., Ltd. v. M'Mullan (1), or a duty at common law within the decision of the House of Lords in Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (2). If it is established that it was a breach of one of those duties, the question is whether that of itself establishes the “ actual fault or privity ” of the shipowner so as to deprive him of the benefit of the limitation provisions of s. 503 (1).

This point was raised before WILLMER, J., in H.M.S. Truculent. Admiralty v. The Divina (Owners) (3). In my opinion he deals correctly with it. I propose to follow his decision and that answers this case in favour of the shipowner's claim to limit. H.M.S. Truculent being one of His Majesty's ships, it was contended that there was a breach, on the part of the Admiralty, of a statutory duty with regard to lights, and it was submitted that that breach of statutory duty was sufficient to defeat the claim which was made to limit. WILLMER, J., said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 977):

“ I was invited to say that, just as in Lochgelly Iron & Coal Co., Ltd. v. M'Mullan (1) the breach by colliery owners of their statutory duty under the Coal Mines Act, 1911, was held to amount to ‘ personal negligence or wilful act ’ on their part for the purposes of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1925, s. 29 (1), so also in this case the breach by the Admiralty of their obligation to obey the collision regulations, so far as these relate to the fitting of lights, should be held to amount to ‘ actual fault or privity ’ within s. 503 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894. In my judgment, this argument fails because the conclusion contended for does not follow from the premise. Let it be assumed that in the matter of the provision of lights the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, s. 419 (1), imposes on shipowners an absolute obligation, responsibility for the performance of which they cannot evade by delegation. Let it further be assumed that by publishing the King's Regulations and Admiralty Instructions the Admiralty have accepted, on behalf of His Majesty, a similar absolute obligation. It may well be true that in an action for damage caused by defective lights neither the owners of a merchant ship nor the Admiralty could successfully evade liability on the footing that they had delegated their duty to provide lights in accordance with the regulations to some competent person. But this goes only to liability, which is not in issue in the present case. The question of limitation only arises after liability has been determined, and it by no means follows that because liability cannot be evaded the right of limitation is lost. If the proposition contended for by the defendants were well founded, it would never be possible for shipowners to limit their liability where loss or damage has been caused, or contributed to, by defective lights or other defective equipment in their ships. Yet many cases are to be found in the reports in which, in such circumstances, shipowners have been able to satisfy the court of absence of fault or privity on their part and have been held entitled to limit their liability; see, e.g., The Warkworth (4), a decision of the Court of Appeal."

It is true that that related to a statutory duty, but there is no difference in principle between that case and the duty imposed absolutely, in the sense that it falls on the employer, although it is only a duty to take reasonable care at common law. In Lochgelly Iron & Coal Co., Ltd. v. M'Mullan (1), Lord Macmillan said ([1934] A.C. 18) :

"It appears to me quite immaterial whether the duty to take care arises at common law or is imposed by statute," and I apprehend that that was the view of the House, both in that case and in Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (2). Therefore, WILLMER, J.'s decision applies to this case, and I follow it. I think it is correct.

I was pressed by counsel for the plaintiff with some observations of VISCOUNT HALDANE in Standard Oil Co. of New York v. Clan Line Steamers, Ltd. (5), where it was said, in a passage ([1924] A.C. 113) which I think is more argument than precise finding and is based on supposition of event, that liability (in such circumstances as I have indicated here and as arose there) arising from responsibility for the unseaworthy ship brought about by the master not being informed was a personal obligation of the shipowners, so that there was actual fault or privity. However, that passage in LORD HALDANE's speech stands alone and is not the basis of the decision. Again, I would follow WILLMER, J., in dealing with that case in the judgment to which I have just referred. He said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 978) :

"I do not think, therefore, that it is possible to contend that the mere proof of defective lights on board H.M.S. Truculent is sufficient of itself to prevent the Admiralty, on behalf of His Majesty, from establishing absence of fault or privity. I do not see that this conclusion is inconsistent with anything that was said in Standard Oil Co. of New York v. Clan Line Steamers, Ltd. (5) to which I was referred by the defendants. In that case, the facts of which were very special, shipowners allowed their ship to put to sea without informing the master of certain peculiarities of the ship in relation to the filling of her tanks. The owners knew of these peculiarities, but the master did not. The master's lack of knowledge rendered the ship unseaworthy, and a loss occurred. In these circumstances it was held that the owners were not entitled to limit their liability, because they could not discharge the burden of showing that the loss occurred without their actual fault or privity. The fact that they had informed their engineer superintendent of the ship's peculiarities did not help the owners. They had not informed the master, and it was the master's ignorance that was the cause of the ship's unseaworthiness. I do not read this decision as any authority for the proposition that, where shipowners delegate the performance of a duty imposed on themselves, they can in no case limit their liability."

With that observation I respectfully agree.

Another authority which seems to be in point does not appear to have been cited in the case of The Truculent (3). Counsel for the defendant relied on it before me, although it arose in different circumstances. That is Paterson S.S., Ltd. v. Robin Hood Mills, Ltd. (6) where the shipowners had been held liable for damage to cargo because it had not been shown that due diligence had been exercised to make the vessel seaworthy, and, therefore, s. 6 of the Canadian Water Carriage of Goods Act did not operate to free the owners from responsibility. In Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (2) LORD WRIGHT thus refers to the duty to exercise due diligence as a personal obligation ([1937] 3 All E.R. 641):

"If I may take an analogy or instance of a similar personal obligation, I note that the Carriage of Goods by Sea Act, 1924, requires a shipowner to exercise due diligence or to take reasonable care to provide a seaworthy ship. The shipowner is almost certainly not an expert naval architect, engineer, or stevedore. So far as I know, it has never been claimed that this obligation is fulfilled by the shipowner taking reasonable care to appoint a competent expert: the shipowner is absolutely held to the fulfilment of the obligation. It is the obligation which is personal to him, and not the performance."

Notwithstanding that LORD ROCHE in Paterson S.S., Ltd. v. Robin Hood Mills, Ltd. (6) dealing, with the effect of the Merchant Shipping Act on a claim for limitation in which liability had been so established, says (58 Lloyd L.R. 39):

"Before dealing with the specific points involved, the general scope and effect of s. 503 of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894, may be briefly stated. Its scope and effect is not to excuse or except a shipowner from liability for tort or breach of contract, but to limit the amount for which he can be liable for the faults of others than himself. The meaning of fault and privity in s. 502 of the Act, which in that respect is identical with s. 503 has been authoritatively declared by the Court of Appeal and the House of Lords in the case of Lennard's Carrying Co., Ltd. v. Asiatic Petroleum Co., Ltd. (7). 'The words "actual fault or privity" in my judgment infer something personal to the owner, something blameworthy in him, as distinguished from constructive fault or privity such as the fault or privity of his servants or agents' (per BUCKLEY, L.J., [1914] 1 K.B. 432). 'Actual fault negatives that liability which arises solely under the rule of respondeat superior' (per HAMILTON, L.J., ibid., 436). So in the case of a company: 'It must be . . . the fault or privity of somebody who is not merely a servant or agent for whom the company is liable upon the footing respondeat superior, but somebody for whom the company is liable because his action is the very action of the company itself' (per VISCOUNT HALDANE, L.C. [1915] A.C. 713)."

It was held that the shipowners were entitled to limit their liability.

On those grounds I do not find that the shipowner—by the mere fact that he is liable in law because of the failure of his servants to exercise reasonable care or because of the breach of duty which is owed by him to his servants under the principle of Wilsons & Clyde Coal Co., Ltd. v. English (2)—is guilty of "actual fault or privity" so as to deprive him of his rights under the Merchant Shipping Act. On the facts which have been adduced there has been no evidence which establishes that the shipowner himself knew of anything defective, or failed in any care in appointing competent servants, and so forth. He delegated these matters to other people, and, wherever the fault lay, it was not due to his own personal failure and it did not occur with his knowledge.

That would be sufficient for the purpose of deciding this case in favour of the shipowner, but it is, perhaps, possible to view this case in another way. The obligation is on the employer to have a proper system of work with regard to a vessel at sea. It may well be the province of the shipowner to arrange that the ship shall be properly provided with a crew and with adequate officers so that the watches can be properly fulfilled on the bridge, on the deck, and in the engine room, and, if he so arranges the routine of the ship that the system is faulty and defective, that may indeed be brought home to him. That is a breach of his common law duty. However, I apprehend that, once a vessel is at sea with the master in command he will be the person to decree how many things requiring attention are to be done. If one of the ship's boats had broken loose and the master ordered it to be secured in a way which was dangerous and someone was injured, that might be said to be an unsafe system of work, but it would fall within the province of the master, and the shipowner, on land and not in control of the situation, would not be held responsible for it as a breach of his duty to his servants. The principle of Winter v. Cardiff Rural District Council (8) would, I think, apply. That principle is that there may be tasks which properly fall within the sphere of the workman's activities, where he decides how the work shall be done, and, if he decides in a way which is defective and dangerous, the responsibility is his. Other and major matters fall within the sphere of the employer and it is those matters of systems of work, provision of plant, and provision of competent servants which are the duty of the employer. The particular act in this case, of doing this work on the top of the canvas cover of a dinghy, was selected by the skipper of the vessel. He was responsible for it. I would be prepared to find that there was no breach of common law duty by the shipowner. I do not find on any view of the facts that there was any actual fault or privity of the shipowner in this action. I, therefore, find that the shipowner is entitled to limit his liability, in accordance with s. 503 (1) of the Merchant Shipping Act, 1894.

The extent of that limitation has been the subject of agreement. The Act provides, in the case of loss of life, that the rate is £15 a ton, and worked out in accordance with the tonnage that limits the liability to a total of £975, which is the maximum liability of the defendant in the circumstances of this case.

HIS LORDSHIP assessed the damages which it would have been appropriate to award the plaintiff if she had succeeded in the action without any limitation on the amount which she could recover at £250 under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and at £2,750 under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and he gave judgment for the plaintiff for £975.

Rent Restriction—Statutory tenant—Forfeiture of tenancy—"Non-occupying" tenant—Animus revertendi—Tenant leaving with intent to live elsewhere for three years.

The statutory tenant of a dwelling-house within the Rent Restrictions Acts went to live in other premises, leaving his furniture in the house, and his son and the son's family took up residence in the house. On a claim by the landlord for possession on the ground that the tenant had ceased to reside in the house, the tenant gave evidence that he contemplated retiring from his profession in about three years' time and he would then be unable to maintain the other premises and intended to return to the house, of which meanwhile his son was merely a caretaker on his behalf. The county court judge having refused an order for possession,

HELD: the question whether the intention of the tenant to return to the house, although after so long a period as three years, constituted sufficient animus revertendi was one of degree for the county court judge, and it was impossible to say that, in answering that question in the affirmative, he had erred in law.

Brown v. Brash & Ambrose ([1948] 1 All E.R. 922), applied.

Per SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: The court should be somewhat cautious in giving the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts to what have been called "two-home men", and should look somewhat critically at cases which, if repeatedly extended, would soon go far to defeat one of the main purposes of these Acts, which is to make the best use of the limited housing resources.

APPEAL by the landlord from an order of His Honour JUDGE FORBES, Birmingham County Court, dated Nov. 22, 1951, refusing an order for possession against the statutory tenant and an occupant of a dwelling-house.

R. K. Brown for the landlord.

A. W. M. Davies for the tenant and his son, who was in occupation of the dwelling-house.

JENKINS, L.J.: This is an appeal from an order of His Honour JUDGE FORBES refusing the claim of the plaintiff landlord to possession of premises known as No. 75, Abbey Road, Erdington, Birmingham. Those premises were within the protection of the Rent Restrictions Acts and were let weekly, at 12s. 1d. per week, to the first defendant, Mr. Charles Tommis senior, who is the father of the second defendant. It appears that the contractual tenancy ended with the expiration of a notice to quit on Oct. 8, 1951.

The relevant ground on which possession was sought was that the tenant, Mr. Tommis senior, had gone out of possession of the premises and ceased to reside there and so could no longer claim the benefit of the Rent Restrictions Acts. Mr. Tommis senior clearly did remove his own physical presence from No. 75, Abbey Road, but he left behind him his son, Mr. Tommis junior, who remained on the premises with his wife and child. It seems that Mr. Tommis junior and his family came in at or about the same time as Mr. Tommis senior removed himself. Mr. Tommis senior's absence was thus accounted for by him in his evidence. He said he had been tenant of the premises since 1914; in 1937 he started to build a house single-handed which was not completed at the date when the evidence was given in November, 1951; he had, however, moved into this new house on Aug. 29, 1951, with his wife and daughter; he was a teacher and the retiring age applicable to him was sixty-five, although he could retire at sixty; and when he retired (which he contemplated doing in about three years' time) his pension would be one-third of his then present income and he would not be able to keep the new house. He said he had left his furniture at Abbey Road, and when he retired he would have to sell the new house. His son was at Abbey Road as caretaker. The learned judge accepted that evidence and delivered a short judgment in these terms:

"I find there is an intention on the part of Charles Tommis to return to No. 75 Abbey Road, Erdington, in or about three years' time. In the meantime the second named defendant is residing there as caretaker on his behalf. Charles Tommis has shown an intention not to abandon the tenancy, and I, accordingly, give judgment for the defendants with costs."

So far as that judgment involves a finding of fact, it cannot be challenged in this court except on the ground that there was no evidence to support it. Counsel for the landlord does not dispute that, and he accepts, as he is bound to do, the learned judge's finding that it was Mr. Tommis senior's intention to return in about three years' time, but he says that it follows as a matter of law that for the purposes of the Rent Restrictions Acts Mr. Tommis senior must be taken to have given up any animus revertendi except an animus revertendi postponed to such a distant future date that it ought not to be taken into account by the court. In my judgment, that contention cannot prevail. The learned judge was clearly entitled to accept the genuineness of Mr. Tommis's evidence about his intention, and, having found the intention, the question whether it amounted to sufficient animus revertendi, as it seems to me, must be a question of degree, and, as such, eminently a question for the learned judge. He held that it fell, as it were, on the tenant's side of the line in this case, and, perhaps, the tenant was fortunate in securing that finding. But, the learned judge having taken that view, it does not seem to me to be possible to say that he erred in law in so deciding.

Counsel for the landlord also sought to make a point on the aspect of what I may call constructive possession, that is to say, the corpus possessionis, to the effect that there was not sufficient evidence to show that Mr. Tommis junior was really occupying the premises on behalf of his father as his father's licensee. But the evidence of the father to the effect that the son went into the house as caretaker was not challenged in cross-examination, and I think it is impossible for this court now to do anything else but accept the statement of the father in his evidence-in-chief. Therefore, there was on the evidence a caretaker in No. 75, Abbey Road, holding possession of it on behalf of his father. There was also evidence that the father left furniture in the house.

In all these circumstances, I find it impossible to hold that the learned judge committed any error in law in taking the view that the father was still entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts on the principle stated in the judgment of ASQUITH, L.J. in Brown v. Brash & Ambrose (1) ([1948] 1 All E.R. 925, 926). In the present case, subject to the question of the length of the projected absence, three years, all the elements which ASQUITH, L.J., specified as necessary in order that the protection of the physically absent tenant should continue seem to me to be present. I think it is significant that the learned lord justice said (ibid., 926):

"To suppose that he can absent himself for five or ten years or more and retain possession and his protected status simply by proving an inward intention to return after so protracted an absence would be to frustrate the spirit and policy of the Acts . . .”

Observe that the time mentioned as excessive is five or ten years, and that the learned lord justice seems to envisage the possibility that even where an absence of that duration is in question, nevertheless a sufficiency of outward and visible signs of the intention to return—sufficient indicia of the animus revertendi and corpus possessionis—may, even in such a case, oust a prima facie conclusion that the tenant has abandoned his possession of the premises. For these reasons, in my view, this appeal fails.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: I agree. I think, with JENKINS, L.J., that the learned county court judge might well have come to a conclusion on the facts adverse to the defendants, particularly in a case such as this where, as counsel for the landlord emphasised, the absence from Abbey Road on the part of the first defendant is a purely voluntary act on his part and has not been occasioned by the necessities or conveniences of his business or other occupation. In saying that I am not, of course, criticising the learned judge, for I have not had the advantage of seeing the witnesses. Still, I agree with counsel for the landlord that the court ought, as I think, and as I said in Hallwood Estates, Ltd. v. Black (2), to be somewhat cautious in giving the protection of these Acts to what have been called “two-home men.”

It is, perhaps, worth emphasising that the formula used by ASQUITH, L.J., was animus possidendi and corpus possessionis. In other words, the tenant, though physically absent, must still in the eye of the law retain his possession of the first house. If he gives it up, an intention, however truthfully and sincerely entertained, to return there at some future date will not, as I understand the law, suffice. The learned judge accepted the evidence of the first defendant that his departure to the house over the erection of which he had taken such a very long time was temporary and only intended to last until he had to retire from his profession when he would be unable to afford to continue to live there. In addition, he left in his original home his furniture and his son. I think the learned judge, having treated the matter properly as a matter of degree, had evidence which justified him in concluding as he did that there was no abandonment by the first defendant of his possession of No. 75 Abbey Road, but I venture to repeat that judges ought to look somewhat critically at cases which, if repeatedly extended, would soon go far to defeat one of the main purposes of these Acts, which is to make the best use of the unfortunately limited housing resources. I agree, however, that the appeal fails.

HODSON, L.J.: I agree.

Appeal dismissed.

FEYEREISEL v. PARRY AND OTHERS.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), March 3, 4, 1952.]

Rent Restriction—"Dwelling-house let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house"—Camping site and bungalow—Dominant purpose of lease the carrying on of business of letting out camping sites—Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939 (c. 71), s. 3 (3).

By an agreement dated Nov. 1, 1946, a landlord let to a tenant a camping site and a bungalow situated thereon, the rateable value of the whole being less than £75 a year. The tenant occupied the bungalow and carried on the business of a camping site proprietor. On a claim for possession of the demised premises,

HELD: the camping site was the main object of the letting and the bungalow was merely an adjunct to the business carried on by the tenant on the site, and, therefore, the bungalow was a dwelling-house "let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house" within the meaning of s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and the Rent Acts did not apply to the premises.

APPEAL by the tenant from an order of PARKER, J., dated July 25, 1951, on a claim by the landlord for possession of a bungalow and camping site.

In October, 1946, the tenant leased a bungalow from a Mr. Price at a weekly rent of 14s., the tenant having the use of certain articles of furniture the property of Mr. Price. The bungalow was one of a number situated on a site owned by Mr. Price, who let them out to campers. On Nov. 1, 1946, an agreement was drawn up by Mr. Price as follows: "I hereby grant to Mr. J. Feyereisel part of the camping site known as the 'Smugglers Leap' situated on the north and east side of the road running through the ground. This part contains three bus bodies and two trailers on ground rents, and three bus bodies on hire, also shop, shed, garage and bungalow occupied by himself. The tenant is to maintain and keep in fair condition buses and bungalow, replace any broken windows, and provide two coats of good paint in the period of renting. This at a rental of £3 per week, the payment of £13 to be made on the first of each month. The other side of the site contains one bungalow, cabin, greenhouse, orchards and garden occupied by myself, and is kept privately. Option is given to Mr. J. Feyereisel to purchase the whole property freehold including two bungalows, three bus bodies, cabin, shop, garage, etc., for the sum of £2,500 within three years of the signing of this agreement." Under the agreement, which PARKER, J., held to be for a period of three years, the tenant went into possession. In 1948 Mr. Price died and his property passed to the first defendant, Mrs. Parry, as administratrix, who appointed the second defendant, Mr. Turnidge, as manager of the property. Shortly afterwards the first defendant sold the property to the second defendant who, on Dec. 30, 1948, served one month's notice to quit on the tenant. On Apr. 26, 1949, the tenant issued a writ against the first defendant claiming damages for, inter alia, breach of an implied term of the agreement of Nov. 1, 1946, that the tenant should hold the demised premises without disturbance, and against the other defendants for damages for, inter alia, injuring the tenant in his business as a camping site proprietor. By their defence the defendants denied the allegations contained in the statement of claim and the second defendant counterclaimed for possession, arrears of rent and damages for breach of covenant to repair. By his reply the tenant denied the validity of the notice to quit and in the alternative claimed that the bungalow was protected by the Rent Acts. PARKER, J., held that the primary purpose of the agreement was to enable the tenant to carry on the business of letting camping sites and that the bungalow was an adjunct to that business and, therefore, the bungalow was "let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house" within the meaning of s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and was not protected.

The first, third and fourth defendants were not represented.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The only question with which we are concerned is whether the tenant is entitled to the protection of the Rent Acts. The learned judge summed up the nature of the agreement of 1946 and its subject-matter as follows:

"It is quite true that the facts here are somewhat different [from Pender v. Reid (1)], but I have little doubt here, having heard the [tenant] himself, that what was really let to him was land to enable him to carry on the business of letting out camping sites, and, as it were, as an adjunct to that, he was let the bungalow on that site to enable him to live in it and carry on the business. The [tenant] said: 'I entered into the agreement on Nov. 1, 1946, with the object of sub-letting the land to campers'. If one visualises part of this dis-used chalk pit with various bus bodies and this wooden hut on it, it is really idle to think of a dwelling-house being let with land as an adjunct to that dwelling-house. It is really a case of the letting of land on which somebody can earn money by letting out camping sites, and, as an adjunct to that, letting them live in a wooden shed on that site."

There seems to be ample evidence on which the learned judge could summarise the effect of the letting in those words, and they are consistent, in my opinion, with the terms of the document. The question, therefore, is whether in those circumstances the dwelling-house is within the Rent Acts? In using the word "adjunct" the learned judge had in mind the decision in Pender v. Reid (1). In that case a tenant carried on business as a coal merchant in premises which consisted of a dwelling-house (with a small yard behind it) where the tenant and his family lived, and a coal ree, garage and workshop which were used exclusively for the purposes of his business. The area occupied by the house and the yard was less than a third of the whole area. The whole premises had been let in the same form to successive tenants for many years and each tenant had carried on a coal merchant's business. It was held that, since the dominant purpose of the letting was the carrying on of the business of a coal merchant and not the provision of a dwelling-house, the dwelling-house being merely an adjunct to the business part of the premises, the tenancy was not protected by the Rent Restrictions Acts. The LORD JUSTICE-CLERK (LORD THOMSON) and LORD MACKAY examined in detail the relevant provisions of s. 3 (3) of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, and the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK said (1948 S.C. 385):

"... it is not possible to dispose of the case on the broad ground that the mere presence of the dwelling-house in the composite let is enough to bring the whole subjects within the Acts."

Counsel for the tenant argued in the present case that, even where one finds what, on the face of it, can be described as the letting of business premises, by reason of certain words in s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 a lessee, if the subject-matter is within the required rateable value, can claim the protection of the Acts if, within those business premises, there is a house or part of a house which can be described as a dwelling-house. LORD MACKAY posed the question in this way (ibid., 392):

"Is one thing [i.e., the business premises or premises other than the dwelling-house] the adjunct of the other, or the other of the one?"

In other words, is the non-dwelling house which is let an adjunct of the dwelling-house, or is the dwelling-house an adjunct of the non-dwelling house? The learned judge accepted that proposition and applied it.

When rent restriction legislation was first introduced, the problem of the scope of the word "dwelling-house" was realised by Parliament. By the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (War Restrictions) Act, 1915, s. 2 (2), the problem was dealt with in this way.

"This Act shall apply to a house or part of a house let as a separate dwelling where such letting does not include any land other than the site of the dwelling-house and a garden or other premises within the curtilage of the dwelling-house . . ."

That, apparently, was found to be unduly narrow and by the Increase of Rent and Mortgage Interest (Restrictions) Act, 1920, s. 12 (2) (iii) it is provided:

"for the purposes of this Act, any land or premises let together with a house shall, if the rateable value of the land or premises let separately would be less than one quarter of the rateable value of the house, be treated as part of the house, but, subject to this provision, this Act shall not apply to a house let together with land other than the site of the house."

That provided a rateable value test which may or may not have been easy to apply, but which, at any rate, is simple to understand.

In 1939 the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Act, 1939, was passed and s. 3 (1) sets out the rateable values on the appropriate day of the properties to which the Act was to apply. It is common ground here that the rateable value of the whole of the subject-matter of the lease is within the applicable limit. Sub-section (2) excepts (a) licensed premises, (b) furnished premises, and (c) certain local authorities' houses. Sub-section (3) provides:

"Subject to the provisions of para. (a) of the last preceding sub-section the application of the principal Acts, by virtue of this section, to any dwelling-house shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade or professional purposes; and for the purposes of the Rent and Mortgage Interest Restrictions Acts, 1920 to 1938, as amended by virtue of this section, any land or premises let together with a dwelling-house shall, unless the land or premises so let consists or consist of agricultural land exceeding two acres in extent, be treated as part of the dwelling-house; but, save as aforesaid, the principal Acts shall not, by virtue of this section, apply to any dwelling-house let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house."

It will be noted that in the latter part of that sub-section there is, first, a reference to land or premises let together with a dwelling-house, and, later, following the words "save as aforesaid", to any dwelling-house let together with land. I think the LORD JUSTICE-CLERK in Pender v. Reid (1) based his conclusion as to the construction of the sub-section in part on that difference, and, indeed, particularly on the words following "save as aforesaid."

With respect, I would have come to the conclusion that on the learned judge's finding the tenant fails in limine because he is not the lessee of a dwelling-house and the Act is dealing with dwelling-houses. There was a time when business premises were protected by the Acts, but it is common ground that the Act of 1939 applies to dwelling-houses. My conclusion is supported by the earlier words of sub-s. (3) which are to be found in earlier Acts, namely, "the application of the principal Acts, by virtue of this section . . . shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade or professional purposes". If all one had to seek was a dwelling-house within the whole subject-matter of the lease, that provision would be quite unnecessary. It implies that it is not enough to find a dwelling-house in what is covered by the lease. If counsel for the tenant is right, what would in ordinary language be described as a lease of business premises, if within the rateable value, would obtain the protection of the Act if one could find a dwelling-house within it. I think the words used at the beginning of this section by necessary implication negative that proposition. Counsel, assuming he could get past that initial difficulty, relied on the very wide words where it is said that any land or premises let together with a dwelling-house shall, unless the land or premises so let consist of agricultural land exceeding two acres in extent, be treated as part of the dwelling-house. Having regard to the general language of the Acts and their plain purpose to protect dwelling-houses, and having regard to the words, and the implication which, in my opinion, arises from the words, earlier in the section with which I have just dealt, it seems to me impossible to give the words on which counsel relies the meaning which he seeks to put on them. It would mean that, however subordinate and minor the dwelling-house, the whole premises being within the rateable value, the protection of the Act would be obtained. I do not agree, as was submitted on behalf of the tenant here, that the construction placed on this section by the Court of Session in Pender's case (1), raises any difficulty. With respect, I agree with it. In considering the words "any land or premises let together with a dwelling-house" one implies the words "as an adjunct to that dwelling-house". If one has three acres of waste land or a shed or other such premises, so long as one can describe them as an adjunct to the dwelling-house, then one has only to consider the rateable value to see whether the Acts apply. The part of the sub-section after the words "save as aforesaid", is not as clearly worded as it might be. That part of the sub-section is negating a construction of the intermediate words which would bring everything in except premises containing more than two acres of agricultural land, and re-affirming, subject to the exceptions in sub-s. (2) (a) (b) and (c), the general principle to be found in the Act of 1915, that the Acts are designed to protect dwelling-houses.

Counsel for the tenant submits that we ought to regard what was said by the House of Lords in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (2), as negating or throwing doubt on the decision in Pender's case (1). The problem in the Langford Property case (2) was, to my mind, quite a different one. There the house had originally been let without a garage. It came back into the landlord's hands and was re-let with a garage. The question was whether, for the purpose of fixing the standard rent with the garage, the dwelling-house was the same as that which was previously let without the garage? It was held that the second letting of the house with the garage was a new letting of a new dwelling-house. In the course of the argument reliance was placed by the tenant on Pender v. Reid (1), and, according to a report of the argument, it was examined in some little detail. LORD PORTER, LORD OAKSEY and LORD RADCLIFFE referred to s. 3 (3) because the actual words of that section had been regarded as important and as leading to the conclusion that there was not a new letting of a new house. LORD PORTER, in particular, sets out the various sections to which I have referred. In dealing with s. 3 (3) he says ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1083):

" . . . any land (except a certain quantity of agricultural land, which is immaterial to the question at issue) let with the dwelling-house forms part of the dwelling-house and the only question is whether the rateable value of the combined entity is less than or exceeds the figures prescribed in s. 3 (1) of the Act."

Counsel for the tenant asked us to read those words—which I do not think are intended to be anything more than a statement of the words to be found in the section—as negating the conclusion in Pender v. Reid (1). There are other passages on which he relies in the same sense. There is a sentence in LORD RADCLIFFE'S opinion which supports the general view which has led me to the conclusion to which I have come when he says (ibid., 1086):

"The basic thing, therefore, which is protected is the structure forming a house or part of a house and the site that it occupies."

It would be wrong to regard the citing and summarising of those sections for the purpose of the different problem which their Lordships had to consider as indicating any view on the decision in Pender v. Reid (1). In fact, I would have said that, reading these speeches, if there was any conclusion to be drawn it was that the noble and learned Lords saw nothing to doubt in that decision. If they had felt a doubt, they would have expressed it. Therefore, so far as one can gather anything from the Langford Property case (2), I would have been inclined to think that the noble and learned Lords saw no reason to think that there was anything wrong with Pender v. Reid (1).

Reference was made to a decision of HALLETT, J., in Thompstone v. Simpson (3) in which Pender v. Reid (1) was applied, and we were also referred to Vickery v. Martin (4). In Vickery v. Martin (4) it was sought to cut down the earlier words of s. 3 (3), namely, that a "dwelling-house shall not be excluded by reason only that part of the premises is used as a shop or office . . .", by saying that it must be a non-substantial part which is used as a shop or office. The court negatived that view. There is one sentence in the judgment of LORD GREENE, M.R., which again bears out the general principle which I have tried to apply. In construing s. 3 (3) he says ([1944] 2 All E.R. 170):

"Once a house is a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act, it is not sufficient to exclude it from the operation of the Act merely to show that part of the premises is used as a shop or office or for business, trade, or professional purposes."

Therefore, it is first necessary to find that the letting is a letting of a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act. For the reasons which I have tried to give I think that, on the learned judge's findings, there was not here a letting of a dwelling-house within the meaning of the Act and the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: This is the familiar contest between a literal interpretation of an Act of Parliament and a liberal or reasonable interpretation of it. It is not a very promising case in which to ask the court to give it a literal interpretation. It arises in this way. A landlord let to a tenant a two-roomed bungalow at a rent of 14s. a week. The bungalow contained furniture which the judge found was sufficiently substantial to make the letting of the bungalow a furnished letting not protected by the Rent Acts. Some time later the landlord let to the tenant, not only the furnished bungalow, but also a camping site with several bus bodies, sheds, and so forth, at an inclusive rent of £3 a week. The camping site was a good business proposition, being let in the summer to people for their holidays. The tenant says that, by reason of the addition of the camping site, he is now protected by the Rent Acts, whereas previously he was not.

Counsel for the tenant argues that the case falls precisely within the second part of s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939. He contends that the bungalow was a dwelling-house and the camping site was "land or premises let together with the dwelling-house". It was not agricultural land, and, therefore, he says, it is to be treated, for the purposes of the Acts, as part of the house. Thence his argument runs thus: The whole is under £75 rateable value, and, therefore, is protected. The furniture in the bungalow forms so small a proportion of the whole rent that it does not deprive the tenant of the protection of the Act. Thus, the second part of s. 3 (3) is satisfied, and the third part does not apply, because that only applies where the second part does not. I agree that, taking the words of s. 3 (3) in their literal meaning, they do lead to the result contended for by counsel. So do the words used in some of the speeches in Langford Property Co., Ltd. v. Batten (2), but it is a mistake to take a few words out of an Act of Parliament and to rely on the letter of them. Every word of the Act must be read in the light of the Act as a whole. The guiding light through the darkness of the Rent Acts is to remember that they confer personal security on a tenant in respect of his home. The Acts apply to dwelling-houses, not to business premises. This is shown by the opening words of s. 12 (2) of the Act of 1920 which applies the Acts to houses "let as a separate dwelling", and s. 3 of the Act of 1939 which applies the Acts to a "dwelling-house". Those are the governing words. The remaining words of those sections are concerned with marginal cases, such as a house where the front rooms are used as a shop and a house let with a field.

We are here concerned with the problem of a house let together with land or premises. The Act of 1920 solved the problem by making protection depend on the relative rateable values. If the house was three times as valuable as the rest, then the whole was protected, but if not, then none of it was protected. The Act of 1939 discarded this test, owing, no doubt, to changes in the rating law. For instance, in between the two Acts, agricultural land had become exempted from rates and had presumably no rateable value. In 1939, therefore, some new test had to be found for a house let with agricultural land. The legislature solved it by saying that, if the agricultural land was less than two acres, the whole was protected, but, if it was more, then none was protected. The position about agricultural land is, therefore, clear enough. But what is the position when other land or premises (not agricultural land) is let together with a dwelling-house? In respect of such land or premises the legislature in 1939 discarded the rateable value test and put nothing in its place. They left the courts to grapple with two contradictory provisions. Under the second part of s. 3 (3) such land or premises is to be treated as part of the dwelling-house, but under the third part the Acts are not to apply to the house or the land. In order to resolve this contradiction we must, I think, read the second part as limited to cases where the land or premises is or are an adjunct to the house. This means that the words "as an adjunct to the dwelling-house" have to be read into that part of the sub-section. I acknowledge that this involves a departure from the literal interpretation, but it does, I think, carry out the intention of Parliament, because it fulfils the fundamental conception that the Acts are intended to protect dwelling-houses, not business premises.

The decisions of the Court of Session in Pender v. Reid (1) and Cargill v. Phillips (5) are directly in point. English judges have followed those decisions and I think we should do the same. They are fully in line with the recent decisions of this court such as Court v. Robinson (6) where it was held that premises let as a social club were not protected by the Acts even though the steward lived there. Cases such as Vickery v. Martin (4) and Kitchen's Trustee v. Madders (7) are distinguishable because they turned on the first part of s. 3 (3) and not on the second and third parts. In those cases there was one house let and used as a single entity for dwelling purposes. It was not let together with other land or premises.

The effect of s. 3 (3) is, therefore, as follows:—First, a dwelling-house does not cease to be protected simply because a substantial part of it is used for business purposes. Secondly, a dwelling-house does not cease to be protected simply because it is let with something else which is an adjunct to it, such as a garden, a yard, a garage or a paddock. But, thirdly, a dwelling-house is not protected if it is let with more than two acres of agricultural land or if something else such as a factory or a business is the main object of the letting and the dwelling-house is merely an adjunct to it. The present case comes within the third category. The camping site was the main object of the letting and the bungalow was merely an adjunct to it. The premises are not protected by the Acts. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. I agree with counsel for the landlord when he suggests that this case is really one substantially of fact. When one looks at the description of the property in the agreement and at the agreed plan one finds that the subject-matter of this letting was a piece of land applied to commercial purposes and having on it a bungalow or shed for the convenience of the owner or occupier. In those circumstances the judge was well justified in expressing the view that this is really a case of the letting of land on which somebody can earn money by letting out camp sites, and, as an adjunct to that letting, the tenant lives in a bungalow on the site. I agree with my Lord that, taking the facts as they have been established, this bungalow cannot properly be regarded as a dwelling-house for the purposes of the Act. But, assuming that one has to look to the provisions of s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939, it appears to me that the case is precisely within the last part of that sub-section because here there is a dwelling-house let together with land other than the site of the dwelling-house. I regard that part of the sub-section as being the general law applicable to composite lets. Anybody who wants to get out of that general rule must show that they are brought within the excepting words "save as aforesaid", and when one looks to the words which precede that provision one finds the middle part of the section which deals with "any land or premises let together with a dwelling-house". Both historically and on construction that middle part deals only with cases where the primary subject-matter of the letting is a dwelling-house, and, as is common with dwelling-houses in this country, a small piece of land goes with the dwelling-house and is an adjunct thereto. It is to save cases of that kind that the middle part of this sub-section was introduced. That view of the matter is entirely consistent with what LORD RADCLIFFE said on the subject of this legislation in the Langford Property case (2) where he said ([1950] 2 All E.R. 1086):

"The basic thing, therefore, which is protected is the structure forming a house or part of a house and the site that it occupies. If something beyond that is also to come within the protection of the Act [the Act of 1920, s. 12 (2)] it must be brought within it by the operation of some positive enactment to be found between the beginning and the end of sub-s. (2)."

It is wrong to say that the present case is one brought within the purview of the middle part of s. 3 (3) of the Act of 1939 and is, therefore, taken out of the words in the general rule at the end which, as I think, are precisely apt. I would only add that, if any further ground be wanting for rejecting the submission which was put before us by counsel for the tenant, it is to be found in this, that on the construction which he was asking us to adopt, although the final part of sub-s. (3) was plainly intended to be the generally operative provision relating to a composite dwelling, there would be practically no cases to which that general rule would apply having regard to the width of the interpretation which was sought to be put on the excepting provisions to be found in the middle of sub-s. (3). I, accordingly, agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

SHOTT v. SHOTT.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Jenkins and Hodson, L.J.J.), December 19, 1951.]

Divorce—Maintenance—Application for leave to apply for order eighteen years after decree absolute—No default in payment and deed not impeached—Discretion of court—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 190 (1).

In October, 1932, the wife obtained a decree nisi of divorce and on Apr. 24, 1933, a week before the decree was made absolute, an agreement was entered into under which the husband covenanted to pay certain sums for her maintenance. The wife accepted that covenant in full satisfaction of any claim she had for maintenance or alimony, and she agreed that, so long as the husband performed his covenants, she would not "proceed with any petition or other legal proceedings for maintenance against him." Payments were made under the deed and no action was taken by the wife until 1951 when she applied to the court for leave to apply out of time for an order for maintenance under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (1) on the ground that, in consequence of the decisions of DEVLIN, J., in Bennett v. Bennett ([1951] 1 All E.R. 1088) and of the Court of Appeal in Combe v. Combe ([1951] 1 All E.R. 767), she would no longer be able to enforce the deed or obtain a decision of the court on its construction. The husband contended that the wife's application was groundless, as he had always paid under the deed and would continue to do so.

HELD: the decisions reported on the construction of the words "on any decree for divorce" in s. 190 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, showed great latitude, and it was not possible to lay down any general rule that an application eighteen years out of time must be refused; it was entirely a matter of discretion; and in the present case the court had proper material on which to refuse the application.

EDITORIAL NOTE. Section 190 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, was repealed by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, s. 34 (1) and schedule, and was re-enacted by s. 19 (2) of that Act.

It should also be noted that the decision of DEVLIN, J., in Bennett v. Bennett (supra) was affirmed by the Court of Appeal (ante, p. 413).

APPEAL from a decision of BARNARD, J., on Nov. 29, 1951, dismissing the appeal of the wife from the decision of the registrar refusing her application for leave to file out of time an application for maintenance. The decree nisi was made in October, 1932, and in April, 1933, before the decree absolute, the parties entered into a deed under which the husband covenanted to pay and the wife agreed to accept certain sums for maintenance. In view of the decisions given in 1951 in Bennett v. Bennett (3) and Combe v. Combe (4), the wife was advised to apply for an extension of time in which to ask for maintenance on the ground that those decisions deprived her of the right to enforce the covenants of the deed in the event of non-payment or to seek the construction by the court of its provisions. The husband replied that he considered the deed binding on him, whatever the legal view might be, and that he had always paid and was prepared to continue his payments.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a decision of BARNARD, J., who dismissed a wife's appeal from a decision of the registrar refusing her application to be allowed to file an application for maintenance out of time. The power of the court to make an order for maintenance is contained in the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 190 (1), which provides that "the court may, if it thinks fit, on any decree for divorce or nullity of marriage" make such an order. Cases have come before the courts as to what the word "on" means. In Scott v. Scott (1) it was held that the words "on any decree for dissolution of marriage" in s. 1 (1) of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1907, did not confer on the judge an unfettered discretion as to the time within which he would allow a petition for maintenance to be filed, but that they meant that the petition must be filed "at" or "within a reasonable time after" the decree, having regard to all the circumstances of the case. In Fisher v. Fisher (2) a wife who had obtained a decree for dissolution of marriage in 1934, relying on a continuance of alimony paid by her former husband and his undertaking to settle certain property on her, made no application to the court for permanent maintenance until 1941, when all payments to her and negotiations for a settlement had come to an end. It was held that in the circumstances the wife ought to be given leave to apply to the court for an order for permanent maintenance. LORD GREENE, M.R., referred in the course of his judgment to some words that he had used in an earlier case, which, if taken out of their context, might have suggested that he had laid down a hard and fast rule with the result that an application in 1941 with respect to a decree made absolute in 1934 could never in any circumstances be entertained. In Fisher v. Fisher (2) LORD GREENE, M.R., used words on which the wife in the present case relies, when he said ([1942] 1 All E.R. 440):

"When the payments have come to an end, and the whole situation has changed in that way, it does seem to me that it would be unfortunate, to say the least of it, if the lady had to be stopped, at the threshold of the court, by failing to obtain an order which would enable her to have the case decided on its merits . . . Although I agree it is a matter upon which different minds might take different views, it seems to me that, in all the circumstances of this case, it is fair to say that an application now made for permanent maintenance could properly be said to be an application made within a reasonable time after the decree nisi, having regard to all the circumstances of the case."

I refer to those cases at the outset to show that there is a considerable latitude in construing the word "on". It might be thought that the fact that this application is made eighteen years after the decree absolute would be a bar in limine, but I think it would be wrong to take that view. One must consider the circumstances and whether there has been a proper exercise of the discretion by the judge. The decree nisi in this case was pronounced on Oct. 14, 1932, and on Apr. 24, 1933, about a week before the decree was made absolute, there was an agreement entered into under which the husband covenanted to pay to the wife not more than £400 and not less than £200 per annum. There was a provision that, if his total income was less than £800 in any year, the sum to be paid to his wife for that year should be half of his income, and there was a further provision that it would be reduced to £200 when the youngest child became twenty-one years of age. It also contained these words:

"The wife hereby accepts the said covenants by the husband in full satisfaction of all claims by her against the husband whether for maintenance or alimony and hereby covenants with the husband that so long as he shall properly discharge and perform such covenants she will not enter or proceed with any petition or other legal proceedings for maintenance against him."

Payments have been made under that deed ever since, and the ground for asking for leave to apply after this long time is contained in the wife's affidavit where she says:

"I am advised that having regard to the decisions in Bennett v. Bennett (3) and Combe v. Combe (4) I would not be able to enforce the said deed nor obtain the court's decision as to the construction of its provisions."

There was an answer by the former husband, in which he said that he had no intention of endeavouring to evade his obligations under the deed. He added: "In spite of any legal consideration I consider myself bound by it, and will continue to pay under it. I, therefore, submit that on the facts disclosed the petitioner has no grounds for making this application."

The decision in Bennett v. Bennett (3) was one of DEVLIN, J. It concerned a deed which was entered into in anticipation of the dissolution of the marriage, which would itself make it, if not objectionable, at any rate something which would have to be given very careful scrutiny. The husband covenanted to make financial provision for the wife and their younger child in consideration of the wife's not proceeding with her prayers for alimony pending suit, maintenance for herself and her younger child, consenting to those prayers being dismissed, and not presenting any further petition for maintenance. She obtained a decree and was granted custody, and later she brought an action in the King's Bench Division to recover sums alleged to be due under the deed. DEVLIN, J., held that the deed was contrary to public policy, because the consideration moving from her was an undertaking the effect of which would be to exclude the jurisdiction of the court, and he based his judgment on the fact that there were children whose interests clearly made this a matter of public policy. He did not say that he would have decided the other way if there had only been the wife, but he based his decision on public policy in relation to the interests of the children. He referred to the decision of the House of Lords in Hyman v. Hyman (5) which he regarded as leading to that conclusion, although the facts there were different.

In Combe v. Combe (4) the question was whether there was consideration for a promise by the husband to pay the wife a sum for maintenance and whether his promise could be enforced as a contract. I need not say anything about that, but I want to refer to what was said by ASQUITH, L.J., with regard to Hyman v. Hyman (5). In Combe v. Combe (4) the husband had promised his wife to allow her £100 a year, but she had not made any express promise in return not to apply to the court, nor had he in any way asked her to forbear from applying. ASQUITH, L.J., having said that he could not regard what had happened as constituting a contract made after decree absolute, said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 774):

"... but, if it were so, I consider on the whole that Hyman v. Hyman (5) (a decision of the House of Lords) is not to be construed as applying only to agreements made before decree absolute. I think its application is general. It contains no such limitation in time as has been suggested."

We were referred to Hyman v. Hyman (5), but, as the facts are different, I do not propose to say anything about it. There are, however, undoubtedly passages in the judgments of LORD HALLSHAM, L.C., and LORD ATKIN which would apply to a case of this kind and would make the agreement here invalid. Counsel for the husband does not dispute its invalidity before us.

The registrar declined to decide that point, though it appeared that he would still have refused the application on the basis that the agreement was invalid. Its invalidity is the basis of the wife's application, which I will put in this way. She says: "Over all these years I have regarded myself as having enforceable rights against my husband under this deed, and I was content so long as I thought that they were enforceable. It is only since Bennett v. Bennett (3) that it has been brought home to me"—meaning, no doubt, through her legal advisers—"that this deed is invalid, and I am, therefore, a wife in receipt only of voluntary payments and at the mercy of my husband if he should choose to stop them, unless I can get an order against him made by the court". She submits that those circumstances entitle her to apply for an order even at this very late hour. Counsel for the wife relied not only on what was said by LORD GREENE, M.R., in the passage which I read from Fisher v. Fisher (2), but also on the statement, which was obiter, by BIRKETT, L.J., in Combe v. Combe (4), where he said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 773):

"It was said in the course of the argument of counsel for the husband that, if an application was made to the court at this date for maintenance, it would be necessary to explain the long delay in the making of the application. As one of the material circumstances for the court to consider, I cannot conceive of a better ground to be put forward by the wife than that mistakenly she had relied on an agreement which was to fulfil for her all that she could ever hope to acquire by making an application for maintenance, but, much to her surprise, when that agreement came before the court, it was held to be invalid."

That was a case where the wife was claiming a sum which she said was due to her under the agreement.

Those are all the authorities to which I need refer. There is, as the cases show, some latitude, and, perhaps, a greater latitude than one might have anticipated, in construing these words "on any decree for divorce", and I am not seeking to lay down any hard and fast rules or to say that on any matter of principle or law leave might not be given after even eighteen years. It is a matter of discretion, and I think the judge had proper material on which to refuse this application and I agree with the conclusion to which he came. It is important here that the husband is not setting up the invalidity of the deed, and, indeed, he has stated in his affidavit that he has no intention of endeavouring to evade his obligations under the deed.

There is another point of some importance which, we were told, was made before the registrar and the judge, and that is that in the correspondence, and, indeed, before us, the wife was not seeking to validate a document which she had suddenly found to be invalid. She was asking for something more than that. In a letter, written at a time when there had been a mistaken reduction by the husband in the sum payable under the deed, her solicitors said: "If such an application is made there seems no doubt that Mrs. Shott will be entitled to an order for maintenance more than twice as large as the pittance on which she has had to exist and educate and maintain your two boys for nearly twenty years". That is, in substance, repeated in a letter in July which was written after the mistake had been explained. I am also impressed by the fact that, although the facts in Hyman v. Hyman (5) were different from those in the present case, and although some people, I gather, did not regard it, as ASQUITH, L.J., regarded it, as of more or less general application to all deeds where it was sought to oust the jurisdiction of the court on this subject, it was, at any rate, a decision which would give a warning to those who deal with these matters that this kind of deed might well be invalid. For all those reasons, I think the appeal should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. The wife's case is, in effect, that she refrained from applying to the court for maintenance in proper time in reliance on the deed of Apr. 24, 1933, and believing that deed imposed enforceable obligations on her husband. She thus claims, in effect, in the words of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Fisher v. Fisher (2), to have been "lulled to a sense of security". She says that she received a rude shock when she was advised of the effect of the decision of DEVLIN, J., in Bennett v. Bennett (3) as, until that moment, she and her advisers were under the impression that the deed was valid. She claims, accordingly, that, though she is eighteen years out of time, the delay has been due to a misapprehension and, therefore, should not be held against her.

For my part, I am not satisfied that the wife is entitled to rely on her alleged ignorance of the law for the purpose for which she now seeks so to do. I observe that Bennett v. Bennett (3) was decided in April, 1951. Her advisers were sufficiently alert and abreast of the current decisions to write their first letter raising the point with the husband on June 26, 1951, and, that being so, I am by no means satisfied that it would have been right to impute to the wife and her advisers to the detriment of the husband ignorance of the law as laid down by the House of Lords in Hyman v. Hyman (5) in 1929. Furthermore, it is to be observed that the husband has always faithfully paid the amounts that he covenanted to pay, subject to certain delays and misunderstandings which do not argue any lack of good faith on his part.

The position, therefore, is that the wife comes here after eighteen years, during which time she has received the benefit of the deed, and she now sets up its invalidity and claims that on that account the matter must now be considered as being at large and she must be allowed to apply to the court for maintenance notwithstanding the lapse of time. In my judgment, that contention ought not to be accepted. I think it would be out of all reason, in circumstances such as those of the present case, to treat an application made eighteen years after the decree as an application made "on the decree". The wife is "crying out before she is hurt", and I think there is justification for the comment that she is really using this point about the invalidity of the deed as a pretext to enable her now to make an application to the court in the hope that the court will give her a larger sum than the sum agreed to be paid under the deed. I have only to add that, like SOMERVELL, L.J., I am not seeking to lay down any general principle, and, in particular, I would wish to reserve my view as to what the position might be in a case comparable to this one, but where it was the husband and not the wife who set up the invalidity of the deed and left the wife without any provision. In a case of that kind I think—I am not deciding it now, but I think—that on the principle stated by LORD GREENE, M.R., in Fisher v. Fisher (2) it might be proper in some circumstances for an application to be entertained even after a very substantial lapse of time. In the circumstances of the present case I see no reason whatever to interfere with the decision of the registrar or the judge.

HODSON, L.J.: By r. 44 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), no application for maintenance can be made later than two months after the final decree, except by leave. That confers a discretion on the court to give leave after two months, but that discretion is subject to the words contained in s. 190 (1) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, which directs that the court "may . . . on any decree for divorce or nullity" make orders for maintenance. The word "on" has been judicially construed in Scott v. Scott (1) as meaning "at" or "within a reasonable time after" the decree, having regard to all the circumstances. In the present case the wife now seeks to say that, having recently discovered that this deed is invalid by reason of the decision in Bennett v. Bennett (3) she should be entitled to say that her present application for maintenance is, having regard in particular to that circumstance, "on the decree". I think that that contention is wrong. One circumstance which tells against it is that the husband has regularly paid under the agreement and has not sought to maintain that he is entitled to cease payment, but, indeed, has expressed his intention to continue the payments under the deed. If he had refused to pay, I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., that it would be necessary to consider the position in the light of his refusal, as, indeed, LORD GREENE, M.R., did in Fisher v. Fisher (2), where it was said that a wife who had received voluntary payments over a period of years was "lulled to a sense of security". The payments having been stopped, there was something to be said for holding that that was a circumstance which would entitle the court to regard the application as having been made "on the decree". It is otherwise here. Indeed, it is relevant that the wife made it plain by her solicitors' letter which opened the campaign that she was intending to get, if she could, a much larger amount than the amount provided for her by the deed. In her affidavit in support of the application she says that her husband's income has very much increased, and, therefore, the circumstances of this case are much the same as those of Scott v. Scott (1), where LORD STERNDAL, M.R., said ([1921] P. 121):

"The present application . . . is really in substance an application for an order to increase the amount of the payment, because the husband's means have increased, for if that were not the object, I do not suppose an application for an order would ever have been made."

For those reasons, as well as those which have been given by my Lords, I think that it cannot truly be said that this application has been made "on the decree". If it could be said that it was made "on the decree" this court would be in the position of hearing an appeal from a judge who had exercised against the wife a discretion which he had under the rules, he having all the circumstances before him and it not being shown that he had taken into account any circumstance which he ought not to have taken into account or left out of consideration any circumstance which he ought to have considered or acted on any wrong principle. For that reason, I think, this is not a case in which this court should interfere. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

Re WOOD'S WILL TRUSTS. WOOD AND ANOTHER v. DONNELLY AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Wynn-Parry, J.), March 4, 1952.]

Will—Condition—Condition subsequent—Certainty—Name and arms clause—
"Discontinue to bear and use".

By his will the testator provided that those persons, with certain exceptions specified therein, who became entitled under the sub-clauses preceding should "assume and use the surname and arms of Wood either alone or together with his or her own surname and arms and . . . in case any such person shall refuse or neglect within [a certain period] (unless prevented by death absence or unavoidable cause) to assume and use such surname and arms or shall at any time afterwards discontinue to bear and use such surname and arms" then his or her beneficial interest should be determined.

Held: the meaning of the phrase "discontinue to bear and use" in its context was indistinguishable from that of the word "disuse" in its context in Re Bouverie (ante, p. 408), and, therefore, the phrase rendered the clause in which it appeared incapable of sufficiently precise construction by the court, and, consequently, void for uncertainty.

WYNN-PARRY, J.: This question concerns the validity of the name and arms provisions contained in cl. 11 (3) of the testator's will, by which he seeks to provide that every person, with the exceptions there specified, who becomes entitled under the preceding provisions of the clause in question shall "assume and use the surname and arms of Wood either alone or together with his or her own surname and arms And . . . in case any such person shall refuse or neglect within such period as aforesaid (unless prevented by death absence or unavoidable cause) to assume and use such surname and arms or shall at any time afterwards discontinue to bear and use such surname and arms . . ."

Then follow the defeasance provisions which are to take effect on that discontinuance to bear and use.

The nearest authority to the present case is the recent decision of VAISEY, J., in Re Bouverie (1). In that case, the name and arms clause was, except in one respect, for all material purposes similar to the one which I have to consider, the difference being that instead of the phrase "discontinue to bear and use", the verb "disuse" was employed. The relevant part of the clause read:

"And if the person so entitled as aforesaid or in the case of a married woman her husband shall refuse or neglect within such year to assume such surname or to apply for such authority as aforesaid or shall at any time afterwards disuse such surname from any cause . . ."

other than those specified, and then follow the provisions for defeasance. In the course of his judgment, VAISEY, J., considered certain prior authorities. VAISEY, J., as I am informed by Mr. Foster who appeared for the second defendant in that case, had his attention drawn to the various editions of the books of precedents in which the name and arms clauses appear, and he made this statement ([1952] 1 All E.R. 410):

"I am fully aware of the fact that these name and arms clauses have been used in accordance with well known precedents for a very great number of years, but, in my judgment, the cases to which I have alluded have put a very different complexion on the manner in which these conditions subsequent are approached. I am not, and I cannot, indeed, be, moved by the fact that my decision may affect a large number of other cases in which this point has not been taken."

In the result, the learned judge held that the clause in question was void for uncertainty.

It has been urged on me that I am not bound by that decision because, in the first instance, the words which I have to construe are "discontinue to bear and use", whereas the word which VAISEY, J., had to construe was "disuse", and that, in the second place, the learned judge approached the problem from the wrong point of view. So far as the first point is concerned, the learned judge said (ibid., 411):

"Although, as counsel for the infant defendant pointed out, the word 'discontinue' is probably in not much better case, I thought at one time that it was more descriptive of a single act than the word 'disuse'."

The learned judge was referring to an earlier decision of his in Re Lewis' Will Trusts (2).

"I am, however, not at all certain that the word 'discontinue' is not open to the same objection as the word 'disuse', but I am not going to say anything further about that because that is not the word which is in question here. I think that 'disuse' is a word which signifies in a vague manner the slipping of a custom or a tendency and is not referable to a definite act which would enable anybody, either prospectively or retrospectively, to say on what day and at what moment this estate was forfeited."

It has been very properly emphasised by counsel on behalf of those supporting the clause that the words used in the clause in Re Bouverie (1) differed from the phrase with which I am concerned. But I have heard no argument which persuades me that, in the context in which I find the phrase "discontinue to bear and use", I could give it any different meaning from that which VAISEY, J., attributed to the word "disuse" in the context in which, in Re Bouverie (1), the learned judge had to consider that word.

I pass next to the criticism that the learned judge approached the case before him from the wrong point of view. It is perfectly true, as emerges so clearly from the judgment of SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., in Re Wilson's Will Trusts (3), that the mere fact that ([1950] 2 All E.R. 964)

"... a document is difficult of construction is not the same thing as saying that it is so vague and obscure as to be unintelligible, and, therefore, unenforceable."

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., goes on to say (ibid.):

"It is a common event for these courts to have to construe provisions in wills and settlements, and it could not surely be said that a clause such as this failed in effect if it raised a point of construction such that it was thought desirable to take on it the opinion of the court . . . Suffice it for me to say that I am not satisfied that those points are of such obscurity that a court would be forced to say that the clause is so uncertain in expression as to be ineffective. I am strongly moved to that conclusion for the reasons which [JENKINS, L.J.] has already mentioned, namely, the long and respectable ancestry which this particular clause has, deriving its origin from the early precedent of MR. DAVIDSON."

In the House of Lords, to which that case was taken sub nomine Bromley v. Tryon (3), LORD SIMONDS, L.C., in the course of his speech, said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 1064):

"I come then to the point which was not argued before HARMAN, J., but was chiefly relied on in the Court of Appeal and in this House, viz., that the clause is altogether void for uncertainty. It is a question which I must approach with this familiar principle in the foreground of my mind: ' . . . that where a vested estate is to be defeated by a condition on a contingency that is to happen afterwards, that condition must be such that the court can see from the beginning, precisely and distinctly, upon the happening of what event it was that the preceding vested estate was to determine.'"

I accept the view that the guidance to be found in those passages is that the proper approach to a question such as this is not what questions must the party ask himself or herself or what difficulties may face that party on the reading of the will, but whether or not the court can, on consideration of the clause, attribute to it a sufficiently precise meaning. It is said that VAISEY, J., failed to apply that test. The relevant passage in his judgment is ([1952] 1 All E.R. 410):

"Applying the test to the present case, I ask myself: Can Mrs. Marshall and her husband say precisely and exactly what they have to do or refrain from doing in order to prevent any transfer of the lady's estate under the gift over?"

If the passage stopped there, then, indeed, there would be force in the criticism that the learned judge was looking at the problem through the eyes of the persons concerned and not through his own eyes, but he goes on (ibid.):

"It does not require very much ingenuity to imagine a large number of borderline cases. Of course, if the lady ceased to use the name Bouverie altogether, and never used it again, never mentioned it, and never allowed it to be used in conjunction with her own name, then that would be an obvious case. But to what extent and for what period of time has the 'disuse' referred to in the clause to take effect? Would it be a breach of it if from time to time the lady, having adopted the name of Bouverie for general purposes, occasionally referred to herself by her former name of Mrs. Marshall, and occasionally used that name when giving an order in a shop in London? How often would she have to omit the use of the word 'Bouverie' to bring about the forfeiture for which the clause provides? What percentage short of one hundred per cent. of the disuser of the name would amount to a disuser of it within the meaning of the clause? Those questions, in my judgment, are incapable of being answered, and, that being so, it seems to me that this condition is not so framed as to satisfy the exacting requirements of the law as laid down in the highest tribunals in the cases to which I have referred."

I have read that passage in extenso in view of the invitation extended to me to inquire whether the learned judge had applied the right test, because it seems to me that only if I could be satisfied that the learned judge had applied the wrong test could I properly do otherwise than follow his decision. It seems to me to be plain, when the whole passage is read, that, although the learned judge started off postulating the question asked by Mrs. Marshall and her husband, he was dealing with this clause from the point of view of the court. That, I think, is demonstrated by the sentence at the end of the passage which I read: "Those questions, in my judgment, are incapable of being answered".

Taking the view, as I do, with all respect, that the learned judge has applied the correct test—the test indicated in Re Wilson (3)—and, bearing in mind that, as I am informed, the old precedents were cited to him and the passage earlier in his judgment which I have quoted, which makes it clear that he had taken into consideration fully that these name and arms clauses had been used in accordance with well known precedents for a great number of years, and, finally, taking into consideration that I can find in its context no difference in effect between the phrase which I have to construe, "discontinue to bear and use", from the word "disuse" which VAISEY, J., had to consider, I think there are left no grounds on which it is open to me, sitting as a judge of first instance, to differ from the decision of VAISEY, J., and, therefore, I follow it. In my view, so far as this court is concerned, this question is concluded by the authority of Re Bouverie (1), and I propose to declare accordingly.

Order accordingly.

MINISTRY OF HEALTH v. STAFFORD CO Reversed. C.A. [1952] 2 All E.R. 386 AND ANOTHER.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Danckwerts, J.), March 4, 1952.]

National Health Service—Hospital—Transfer of property—Property held by local authority—Two local authorities respectively owning freehold and leasehold interests in hospital premises—National Health Service Act, 1946 (c. 81), s. 6 (2).

From 1907 onwards the S. corporation used certain premises which it owned in fee simple as an isolation hospital. On May 27, 1943, the M.S. joint hospital board, constituted under the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 6 (1), by agreement with the corporation acquired a tenancy of the premises for ten years from Oct. 1, 1941, with an option to extend the tenancy for a further period of ten years. Immediately before July 5, 1948, the "appointed day" under the National Health Service Act, 1946, the premises were being used by the joint hospital board as an isolation hospital. Both the corporation and the joint hospital board fell within the definition of "local authority" in s. 79 (1) of the Act of 1946. On the question what interests in the said premises vested in the Minister of Health under s. 6 (2) of the said Act,

HELD: the effect of s. 6 (2) was to transfer to the Minister all the interests in the hospital which immediately before the appointed day were vested in a local authority, and, therefore, both the fee simple and the term of years held respectively by the corporation and the joint hospital board were thereby transferred to and vested in the Minister.

But, semble, aliter so far as the fee simple was concerned if it had been owned by a private person and not by a local authority.

FOR THE NATIONAL HEALTH SERVICE ACT, 1946, s. 6 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 15, p. 339.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the National Health Service Act, 1946, certain premises, used as an isolation hospital, comprised in an agreement dated May 27, 1943, and made between Stafford Corporation (the owner of the fee simple) and the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital Board, whereby the latter was granted a tenancy of the said premises for a term of ten years from Oct. 1, 1941, were, on July 5, 1948, transferred to and vested in the Minister of Health both as to the leasehold interest and the fee simple reversion or only as to the leasehold interest.

Denys B. Buckley for the plaintiff, the Ministry of Health.

Russell, Q.C., and J. V. Nesbitt for the defendants, Stafford Corporation and the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital Board.

DANCKWERTS, J.: In or about 1880 some land was acquired by the corporation of Stafford which, from 1907 onwards, was used by the corporation for the purposes of what I will call an isolation hospital, i.e., for the accommodation of persons suffering from infectious diseases other than smallpox. It was so used by the corporation down to the formation of a joint hospital board and an agreement of tenancy which was made between the corporation and that board, the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital Board, on May 27, 1943. The origin of that agreement is to be found in the provisions of the Public Health Act, 1936, s. 6 (1) of which provided for the union, by order made by the Minister of Health, of districts for purposes which included the provision of hospitals. The governing body of a united district was a joint board: see s. 6 (2); and it was provided by s. 7 (1) that:

"A local authority having jurisdiction in any part of a united district shall cease to discharge in relation thereto any functions which are functions of the joint board . . ."

That was subject to two provisos the operation of which depended on authorisation by or the approval of the Minister of Health. A provision in s. 6 (4) of the Act compelled a provisional order made by the Minister, if it was opposed, to be confirmed by Parliament. In pursuance of those provisions the Minister made an order which was opposed by the Stafford Corporation and which, therefore, had to be approved by Parliament, it being eventually brought into effect by the Minister under the title of the Ministry of Health Provisional Order Confirmation (Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital District) Act, 1938. Pursuant to that, the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital Board came into being, and, after some attempts by the corporation to secure the continuance of their operations notwithstanding the order, finally, on the footing that it would take ten years for the joint board to provide the isolation hospital which was to be built, the agreement of May 27, 1943, was entered into by which the joint board acquired a tenancy for ten years from Oct. 1, 1941, of the property in question, with an option for a further period of ten years after the expiration of that primary term. The result was that immediately before the appointed day operative under the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, this property was being used by the joint board for the purposes of an isolation hospital, the joint board holding the tenancy for the term of ten years from Oct. 1, 1941, with a possible extension for a further ten years, subject to which the fee simple in the property was vested in the corporation.

The question which I have to decide is whether, in addition to the leasehold term which indisputably vested in the Minister under the provisions of the National Health Service Act, 1946, there also vested in the Minister under the Act the fee simple reversion which was retained by the corporation. It is claimed by the Minister that under s. 6 (2) of the National Health Service Act, 1946, the fee simple is vested in him as well as the term of years. Section 6 (1) provides:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act all interests in or attaching to premises forming part of a voluntary hospital or used for the purposes of a voluntary hospital, and in equipment, furniture or other movable property used in or in connection with such premises, being interests held immediately before the appointed day by the governing body of the hospital or by trustees solely for the purposes of that hospital, and all rights and liabilities to which any such governing body or trustees were entitled or subject immediately before the appointed day, being rights and liabilities acquired or incurred solely for the purposes of managing any such premises or property as aforesaid or otherwise carrying on the business of the hospital or any part thereof, but not including any endowment within the meaning of the next following section or any rights or liabilities transferred under that section."

Referring to the definition section, s. 79 (1), I find that the word "voluntary" is defined as meaning "not carried on for profit and not provided by a local or public authority". I also find that "local authority" means

"the council of a county or county borough, the Common Council of the City of London, the council of a metropolitan borough and the council of a county district", which last would apply to Stafford Corporation. The same definition also includes: "(a) any joint board constituted under the Public Health Act, 1936 . . ." or under the other Acts which are mentioned in the definition, so not only Stafford Corporation, but also the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Board, would be included in the definition of a local authority.

With those provisions in mind I turn to s. 6 (2), which is in these terms:

"Subject to the provisions of this Act, there shall also, on the appointed day, be transferred to and vest in the Minister by virtue of this Act all hospitals vested in a local authority immediately before the appointed day, and all property and liabilities held by a local authority, or to which a local authority were subject, immediately before the appointed day, being property and liabilities held or incurred solely for the purposes of those hospitals or any of them or for the purpose of securing accommodation for persons in the area at any hospital not vested in the authority".

The first thing which strikes one on reading that sub-section after having also read sub-s. (1) is that, whereas sub-s. (1) refers to "interests in or attaching to premises", which suggests that the quality of ownership was evidently before the mind of the draftsman when he was dealing with voluntary hospitals, when one comes to sub-s. (2) one finds no reference to interests at all, but a reference to "all hospitals vested in a local authority". It would appear that the draftsman of the Act, when he dealt with hospitals belonging to a local authority, if I may use that term, had in mind simply the corporeal existence of the hospital as a building or an activity which was conducted by or on behalf of the local authority, and it does not appear to have occurred to him that the hospital might not be vested solely in the local authority so far as all interests in land were concerned otherwise than for all time in fee simple. It does not appear to have occurred to him that a local authority might be carrying on a hospital on land in which it had only a very limited interest, such as a short term of years. It appears to have been assumed that nobody other than the local authority would be interested in the land on which the hospital stood, and so, if a certain construction were put on the sub-section, it might result in the appropriation of a citizen's property entirely without compensation. If I look at a hospital merely as a building or activity carried on by a local authority immediately before the appointed day, I might find that there was a short leasehold interest vested in the local authority and that, subject to that, the site of the hospital belonged in fee simple to some private person. If I then construe the sub-section as simply vesting the hospital without further consideration in the Minister without regard to the interests of other persons in the land concerned, it would appear that the sub-section would have the effect of depriving a private person of his fee simple without any provision for compensation.

I cannot believe that that was the intention of the sub-section, and I conclude, therefore, that some limitation must be put on the apparently all-embracing words "all hospitals vested in a local authority". I think what must be vested in the Minister of Health must be a hospital, meaning the site and activities to the extent to which the site or the interests in the site are vested in a local authority. Accordingly, I find that there is a further question to be considered before I can reach the conclusion in the present case. Two local authorities were concerned. First, there was the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Hospital Board, which had a leasehold term and was actually carrying on the activities of an isolation hospital on the site in question. Secondly, there was Stafford Corporation, which, subject to the rights conferred by the agreement of May 27, 1943, owned the land in fee simple, and was by no means tied to the use of that land for the purposes of a hospital because the land was owned by the corporation as corporate property and, under the provisions of s. 163 of the Local Government Act, 1933, it could be applied by the corporation, subject to the approval of the Minister, to any other purpose for which the local authority were authorised to acquire land. Consequently, it is urged that, if I hold that the fee simple is vested by this sub-section in the Minister of Health, the result is also to deprive without compensation the Stafford Corporation of its property applicable for other purposes than a hospital.

It is a matter which appears to me to be of considerable difficulty. I have taken one step, which is to limit the interests transferred by this sub-section to interests in the land vested in a local authority, and the question is whether I ought to impose a further limitation on the construction of this sub-section. It seems to me that I must apply the sub-section according to the words which are used, and that, if there is any interest in land which is used for the purposes of a hospital immediately before the appointed day, I must regard this sub-section as transferring to the Minister the interests in that land which are vested in any local authority. Therefore, while in some respects the result is rather surprising, I come to the conclusion, invoking the Interpretation Act, that the provisions of this sub-section may apply to two or more local authorities as well as to one. Consequently, it seems to me that, this being land on which the activities of a hospital were carried on immediately before the appointed day, whatever interests in that land were vested in a local authority are transferred by this sub-section to the Minister of Health, and that not only the leasehold term, which was held by the Mid-Staffordshire Joint Board, but also the fee simple interest, which was owned by Stafford Corporation, were vested in the Minister by the provisions of s. 6 (2) of the Act of 1946.

Order accordingly.

LAWES v. CAULCUTT.

[QUEEN'S BENCH DIVISION (Gorman, J.), February 25, 28, 1952.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Notice to quit—Resumption of occupation by landlord—Occupation by landlord for twelve months immediately before tenancy—Need of personal occupation—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 24 (3) (a).

After being in occupation of an agricultural holding for seven years the owner died on Feb. 7, 1946, leaving his wife (hereinafter called "the landlord") as sole executrix and sole beneficiary. She continued to occupy the holding, and on Sept. 21, 1946, she let the holding to a tenant from Oct. 11, 1946, "on a yearly tenancy until twelve months' notice to quit in writing is given by either party to the other of them upon the express terms that if the landlord desires to resume occupation before the expiration of seven years from Oct. 11, 1946, the landlord shall be entitled to give notice to quit without becoming liable to pay the tenant any compensation for disturbance in accordance with s. 12 (7) (g) of the Agricultural Holdings Act" (the Act in force at that time being the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923). By a notice dated Oct. 10, 1950, and purporting to be a notice within s. 24 (3) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, the landlord gave the tenant notice to quit on Oct. 11, 1951, on the following grounds: "(i) The holding was let upon the express terms that if the landlord desired to resume occupation before the expiration of seven years from Oct. 11, 1946, the landlord should be entitled to give notice to quit without becoming liable to pay to the tenant any compensation for disturbance in accordance with s. 12 (7) (g) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, and (ii) The notice is given pursuant to s. 24 (3) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, so as to enable the landlord to resume occupation of the holding within the specified period." On Oct. 28, 1950, the tenant gave the landlord a counter-notice under s. 24 (1) of the Act of 1948 requiring that that sub-section should apply to the notice. The landlord did not seek the consent to the notice of the Minister of Agriculture under s. 24 (1), and, therefore, the Minister had not consented to the operation thereof.

HELD: the landlord entitled by reason of s. 24 (3) (a) of the Act of 1948 to serve a valid notice to quit without obtaining the consent of the Minister was a landlord who had himself been in occupation of the agricultural holding for not less than twelve months immediately before the creation of the tenancy; occupation during part of that period by the landlord giving the notice to quit and during part of it by a preceding landlord did not constitute "occupation" within s. 24 (3) (a); and, therefore, as the landlord in the present case had not personally been in occupation for the necessary period, she was not entitled to take advantage of s. 24 (3), and, the consent of the Minister to the notice not having been obtained, the notice was invalid.

ACTION for a declaration that a notice to quit, dated Oct. 10, 1950, served by the landlord, Mrs. Gladys Marguerite Lawes (formerly Mullett), on the tenant requiring him to quit Thorley Manor Farm, Yarmouth, Isle of Wight, was a valid, effective and operative notice to quit, and that, by virtue of it, the tenant was bound to quit and yield up possession of the farm on Oct. 11, 1951. The tenant counterclaimed that there was no valid, effective, or operative notice requiring him to quit the farm, and that he was entitled to remain in occupation after Oct. 11, 1951, by virtue of a memorandum of agreement dated Sept. 21, 1946.

Thorley Manor Farm was an agricultural holding comprising a farm house, five cottages, land, and buildings of an area of 398 acres, which was acquired by a Mr. R. S. B. Mullett on the death of his father in 1939, and until 1946 was occupied and worked by him, his wife (the present landlord and the plaintiff in the action), and one son. On Feb. 7, 1946, Mr. Mullett died, leaving the landlord his sole executrix and beneficiary. She continued to occupy and work the farm. By a memorandum of agreement dated Sept. 21, 1946, less than twelve months after the landlord became owner of the farm, she agreed to let the farm to the tenant

“from Oct. 11, 1946, on a yearly tenancy until twelve months’ notice to quit in writing is given by either party to the other of them upon the express terms that if the landlord desires to resume occupation before the expiration of seven years from Oct. 11, 1946, the landlord shall be entitled to give notice to quit without becoming liable to pay the tenant any compensation for disturbance in accordance with s. 12 (7) (g) of the Agricultural Holdings Act [1923].” *

In pursuance of the agreement in October, 1946, the landlord left the farm and the tenant went into occupation and worked it. By a notice dated Oct. 10, 1950, the landlord, through her solicitors, gave the tenant notice to quit the farm in the following terms:

“As solicitors and agents for Gladys Marguerite Lawes (formerly Mullett) your landlord, we hereby give you notice to quit and deliver up to her possession of all that holding and premises known as Thorley Manor, and situate at Yarmouth in the Isle of Wight, which you hold of her as tenant thereof, on Oct. 11, 1951, or at the expiration of the year of your tenancy which shall expire next after the end of twelve months from the date of service of this notice. This notice is given on and for the following grounds and reasons: (i) The holding was let upon the express terms that if the landlord desired to resume occupation before the expiration of seven years from Oct. 11, 1946, the landlord should be entitled to give notice to quit without becoming liable to pay to the tenant any compensation for disturbance in accordance with s. 12 (7) (g) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. (ii) The notice is given pursuant to s. 24 (3) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, so as to enable the landlord to resume occupation of the holding within the specified period.”

The tenant gave the landlord a counter-notice, dated Oct. 28, 1950, in the following terms:

“I hereby give you a counter-notice that I require s. 24 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, to apply to the notice to quit all that holding of premises known as Thorley Manor and situate at Yarmouth in the Isle of Wight which I hold as tenant thereof and which notice to quit is dated Oct. 10, 1950, it being maintained by me that s. 24 (3) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, pursuant to which the said notice to quit was given to me has no application to the said holding for the reason that the landlord had not for a period of not less than twelve months immediately before the creation of the said tenancy been in occupation of the said holding.”

The Minister of Agriculture and Fisheries was not asked to consent to the operation of the notice to quit.

The landlord contended that the farm had been occupied by the landlord of the farm for the twelve months immediately before the creation of the tenancy, i.e., by herself as landlord for seven and a half months immediately before the tenancy and by her husband as landlord for the preceding four and a half months, the need to obtain the consent of the Minister to the operation of the notice to quit under s. 24 (1) of the Act of 1948 was dispensed with by virtue of s. 24 (3). The tenant submitted that the twelve months' occupation by the landlord immediately before the creation of the tenancy meant continuous occupation for the twelve months by the landlord who actually created the tenancy, and that, as the plaintiff had been landlord for only seven and a half months before the tenancy, s. 24 (3) of the Act did not apply and the notice to quit was bad.

Molony for the landlord.

Heathcote-Williams, Q.C., and Aggs for the tenant.

Cur. adv. vult.

Feb. 28. GORMAN, J., stated the facts and continued: At the time of the agreement of tenancy the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923, was in force. The Agriculture Act, 1947, and the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, were subsequently passed, and the Act of 1948 was in operation when the notice to quit was given by the landlord to the tenant. Section 12 (7) (g) of the Act of 1923, referred to in the memorandum of agreement, although the date is not mentioned, provides that compensation shall not be payable under s. 12

"where a written contract of tenancy has been entered into (whether before or after the commencement of this Act) for the letting by the landlord to the tenant of a holding, which at the time of the creation of the tenancy had then been for a period of not less than twelve months in the occupation of the landlord, upon the express terms that if the landlord desires to resume that occupation before the expiration of a specified term not exceeding seven years the landlord should be entitled to give notice to quit without becoming liable to pay to the tenant any compensation for disturbance, and the landlord desires to resume occupation within the specified period, and such notice to quit has been given accordingly."

It is said that the present tenancy agreement had in contemplation that section of the Act. By s. 57 (1) of the same Act:

"In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires . . . 'Landlord' means any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any land."

There was, therefore, in the Act a protection given in respect of compensation, but not in respect of a notice to quit.

Section 30 of the Agriculture Act, 1947, dealt with compensation for disturbance, replacing most of the provisions of ss. 12 to 14 of the Act of 1923. Section 30 (8) provided:

"Nothing in this section shall apply to a notice to terminate a tenancy of a holding subsisting under a written contract entered into before Mar. 25, 1947—(a) where immediately before the creation of the tenancy the holding had been for a period of not less than twelve months in the occupation of the landlord; (b) the holding is let upon the express terms that if the landlord desires to resume that occupation before the expiration of a specified period not exceeding seven years the landlord shall be entitled to give notice to quit without becoming liable to pay to the tenant any compensation for disturbance; and (c) the notice to terminate the tenancy is given so as to enable the landlord to resume occupation of the holding within the specified period."

That sub-section excluded the landlord's liability to pay compensation for disturbance where before Mar. 25, 1947, he entered into an agreement with the tenant that he should have the right to resume possession of the holding within a specified period not exceeding seven years, provided the landlord had been in occupation of the holding for a period of not less than twelve months immediately before the creation of the tenancy and provided the notice to determine the tenancy was given so as to enable him to resume occupation of the holding within the specified period. It will be seen that, by virtue of s. 31 (10), where ability for compensation was so excluded by s. 30 (8) of the Act, the protection given to the tenant by the requirement in s. 31 (1) that the Minister must consent to the operation of the notice was also excluded. Section 31 (1) of the Act of 1947 (which had no counterpart in the Act of 1923) gave to the tenant an additional form of security. It provided:

"Where notice to quit a holding or part of a holding is given to the tenant thereof, and not later than one month from the giving of the notice to quit the tenant serves on the landlord notice in writing requiring that this sub-section shall apply to the notice to quit, then subject to the provisions of the next following sub-section the notice to quit shall not have effect unless the Minister consents to the operation thereof."

Under that section, if a counter-notice was given to a notice to quit, the consent of the Minister was necessary to the operation of the notice. By s. 31 (10):

"Nothing in this section shall apply to any such notice as is specified in "

s. 30 (8), which I have just read. The requirement of the consent of the Minister under s. 31 (1), therefore, did not apply to a notice given under s. 30 (8).

The Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, repealed s. 30 and s. 31 of the Act of 1947, s. 24 replacing the sections relevant in this case. The marginal note of s. 24 of the Act is: "Restrictions on operation of notices to quit." By sub-s. (1):

"Where notice to quit an agricultural holding or part of an agricultural holding is given to the tenant thereof, and not later than one month from the giving of the notice to quit the tenant serves on the landlord a counter-notice in writing requiring that this sub-section shall apply to the notice to quit then, subject to the provisions of the next following sub-section, the notice to quit shall not have effect unless the Minister consents to the operation thereof."

The provisions of that sub-section have been complied with here. A notice to quit was given, and also a counter-notice in writing requiring that the sub-section should apply. No consent of the Minister has been given or sought. By sub-s. (3):

"Nothing in this section shall apply to a notice to terminate a tenancy of an agricultural holding subsisting under a written contract entered into before Mar. 25, 1947—(a) where, immediately before the creation of the tenancy, the holding had been for a period of not less than twelve months in the occupation of the landlord; (b) the holding is let upon the express terms that, if the landlord desires to resume that occupation before the expiration of a specified period not exceeding seven years, the landlord shall be entitled to give notice to quit without becoming liable to pay to the tenant any compensation for disturbance; (c) the notice to terminate the tenancy is given so as to enable the landlord to resume occupation of the holding within the specified period."

This sub-section creates an exception to the operation of sub-s. (1), removing, if it is complied with, the protection given to the tenant by the requirement that the consent of the Minister shall be obtained to the operation of a notice to quit under that sub-section. This lessens the protection given to the tenant vis-à-vis the landlord and gives the landlord more freedom to determine the tenancy. I have also been referred to s. 34, relating to compensation for disturbance. By s. 94 (1) (the interpretation section):

"In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say . . . 'landlord' means any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any land."

This definition of "landlord" is as in the Act of 1923, but (and this is of crucial importance here) it must now be read with the opening words of s. 94 (1).

The landlord contended that the case comes under s. 24 (3) of the Act of 1948, and that the notice to quit does not require the consent of the Minister to its operation because these terms of s. 24 (3) (a)—

“where, immediately before the creation of the tenancy, the holding had been for a period of not less than twelve months in the occupation of the landlord”— had been complied with. She said that for a period of not less than twelve months before the tenancy the farm was occupied by her as landlord or her husband as landlord. The present landlord succeeded to the farm on Feb. 7, 1946, and the tenancy agreement was made on Sept. 21, 1946, but for seven years before that the present landlord's husband had been in occupation as landlord. The present landlord, therefore, had been in occupation as landlord some seven and a half months before the date of the agreement and her husband for the balance of the twelve months before that. Counsel contended that, although there was a break in the identity of the landlord, there was no time in the previous twelve months when a tenant was in occupation, and that the break in the continuity of the personality of the landlord was immaterial. It was submitted that the test under the Act was: Was there a landlord in occupation? If there was, the fact that there was a change in the personality of the landlord within the continuity of the occupation by a landlord, by death, by a voluntary assignment, by an involuntary act, by a mortgagee going into possession, or otherwise, was immaterial. If that contention is right, it followed that, however many times the landlord changed in the course of the twelve months before the creation of the tenancy, provided each landlord was in occupation, each landlord got the protection of the Act and the tenancy could be terminated without the consent of the Minister. A landlord, it was urged could even sell the holding with the benefit of this protection, and it was claimed that the fact that the landlord in this case succeeded, not as a result of a sale, but as the beneficiary under her husband's will, would not affect the position.

In support of his contention counsel referred to s. 92 (5) and s. 25 (1) (d) of the Act of 1948, and submitted that the landlord was a legal conception who might be a different person at different times. He said that the word “landlord” in s. 24 (1) obviously might apply to different persons since, whoever created the tenancy, the person entitled to give the notice to quit under that sub-section must be the landlord at the time of the giving of the notice and not a former landlord who might then be dead. He said that “landlord” in s. 24 (1) meant the person entitled for the time being to receive the rents and profits of the land, that the provision in s. 24 (3) (c) was simply specifying that the notice must be given within a certain time, and that the word “landlord” must have the same meaning in sub-s. (1) and in sub-s. (3) (a), (b) and (c) of that section since there was nothing in the context which required the word to have different meanings in different provisions of the Act. Section 24 (3), however, was an exception to s. 24 (1).

Counsel for the tenant, basing his argument on s. 24 (3) (a), contends that the notice was bad because the landlord who in fact gave it was not in occupation of the farm for a period of not less than twelve months before the creation of the tenancy. He says that one cannot add together the period of occupancy of different landlords to make the total period of occupation up to the requisite twelve months, and he called my attention to the opening words of s. 94 (1) of the Act:

“In this Act, unless the context otherwise requires, the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say . . . ‘landlord’ means any person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of any land.”

He contended that the context here required that the person whose occupancy for twelve months was to be considered was the actual person creating the tenancy and this limited the meaning of “landlord” in the definition. He said that the words "immediately before the creation of the tenancy" were only applicable to the person who created the tenancy and were not of general application to all landlords in occupation during the vital twelve months. Sub-section (3), it was argued, was an exception to sub-s. (1) conferring special privileges on a special landlord, and "landlord" did not mean the landlord and his predecessors in title. He said that what was envisaged here was that, if for some reason a landlord in occupation had to give up his occupation and subsequently desired to come back into occupation within the specified period not exceeding seven years, he could do so without suffering the disability of having to obtain the consent of the Minister. The wording of s. 24 (3) (b) was important:

"the holding is let upon the express terms that, if the landlord desires to resume that occupation before the expiration of a specified period not exceeding seven years, the landlord shall be entitled . . ."

In the phrase "to resume that occupation" what was the meaning of "that occupation" except the occupation in which the landlord was before the creation of the tenancy agreement? Could it be said that a man could resume something which he had never previously had? If the contention of the landlord was right and, so long as a landlord was in occupation during the necessary twelve months, it mattered not how many landlords there were, or who of those numerous landlords was the person who could resume occupation? If there was a sale of the land during that period and each of the persons becoming landlord was in occupation, who could demand to go back? Was it the first, second, third, or the one who was in occupation "immediately before the creation of the tenancy"? The contention of the tenant in sum was that the landlord was, not a mere legal conception, but the person who had enjoyed occupation for a continuous period of twelve months, and it was only to such a person that the legislature gave the right to resume his occupation without getting the consent of the Minister. Counsel dealt also with the point raised by counsel for the landlord in respect of s. 92 (5) and s. 25 (1) (d), saying that there was no possible ambiguity in s. 24 of the Act as there might well be in the other two sections, that the scheme of the Act was to prevent eviction, and that s. 24 (3) was by way of an exception to the landlord's general obligation under s. 24 (1) to get the Minister's consent to the operation of the notice to quit before it could be deemed to be a good one.

In my view, s. 24 (3) is clearly an exception to s. 24 (1). It may well be contemplated that in s. 24 (1) the landlord is the person for the time being entitled to receive the rents and profits of the land, but, if the landlord's contention is right, any person being a landlord in occupation during the twelve months is protected by s. 24 (3), and that however he became landlord, whether as an executor, a mortgagee in possession, or a purchaser with a saleable right, for it was not contended that the act of devolution by which a person became the landlord affected the position. I have considered also the possible effects on s. 24 (3) (b) of the landlord's contention that the landlord under s. 24 (3) (a) is any landlord in occupation irrespective of person. Looking at the whole position and interpreting s. 24 (3) as I think it should be interpreted, I am of the opinion that the tenant's contention is right and that the obligation under s. 24 (3) (a) that the landlord shall have been in occupation for a period of not less than twelve months is not covered by the submissions made to me on behalf of the landlord. The present landlord was not in occupation of the farm during the period of twelve months before the creation of the tenancy. In my opinion, the context of the enactment connotes a particular landlord—the landlord who granted the tenancy and was himself in occupation not less than twelve months immediately before the granting of the tenancy. The present landlord does not fulfil those requirements, and, therefore, the notice to quit was not valid and the landlord's claim fails.

ALFORD v. NATIONAL COAL BOARD.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Normand, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker and Lord Cohen), January 16, 17, March 6, 1952.]

Mine—Coal mine—Shot-firing—Shot fired by unqualified miner—Apparatus operated by pair of pliers—Cable left in wrong position by authorised shot-firer—General Regulations, 1913 (S.R. & O., 1913, No. 748), reg. 28, made under Coal Mines Act, 1911 (c. 50), s. 86—Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934 (S.R. & O., 1934, No. 6), cl. 2 (h), cl. 2 (i).

On Nov. 11, 1948, the appellant, a miner employed by the respondents, prepared shot holes in the face of his working place, No. 5 room, and was on the way to take shelter while the shots were fired. The authorised shot-firer, having to fire shots both in that room and in the adjoining room (No. 6), coupled up the holes in the two rooms to different cables, but left both outbye cable ends near the same shot-firing apparatus. In breach of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934, cl. 2 (h) and cl. 2 (i), another miner, M., who had prepared the shot-holes in No. 6 room and who was not an authorised shot-firer, connected the cable from No. 5 room to the firing apparatus, in the mistaken belief that he was connecting the cable from No. 6 room. He then operated the apparatus by inserting a pair of pliers, or similar instrument, into the socket meant for the handle, and fired the shots before the appellant had reached shelter, with the result that the appellant was injured. In a claim against the respondents for damages for breach of statutory duty, the appellant alleged breaches of cl. 2 (h) and cl. 2 (i) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934. He further alleged a breach of reg. 28 of the General Regulations, 1913, in that the authorised shot-firer had contravened proper and normal mining practice by failing to lead the outbye end of the cable from No. 5 room to a point between No. 4 and No. 5 rooms in the heading with the result that M. was misled into firing the shots in No. 5 instead of No. 6 room.

HELD: (i) as M. was not acting within the scope of his employment in operating the firing apparatus, the respondents were not liable for his breach of cl. 2 (h) and cl. 2 (i) of the order of 1934.

M'Aulay v. James Dunlop & Co., ([1926] A.C. 377), followed.

(ii) the words "handle or plug" in cl. 2 (i) (i) of the order of 1934 suggested simple tools and not something of an intricate pattern for which no substitute could be found, and the obligation in the sub-clause that the shot-firer should keep the handle or plug in his possession, did not imply any specialty of design; the obligation that the handle should be kept in the custody of the shot-firer could be regarded as a precaution against the act of an unauthorised person who might find the handle lying beside the battery, and as an indication that such an act should be kept in view by a shot-firer as a likely cause of danger, but there was no obligation on the respondents to provide a "fool-proof" handle; and, therefore, there was no breach of cl. 2 (i) (i).

(iii) there was no breach of reg. 28 of the General Regulations, 1913, unless it was proved that the act or omission complained of was negligent or wilful, and, where (as in this case) the act was alleged to be negligent, negligence in the common law sense had to be proved; (per LORD NORMAND, LORD TUCKER and LORD COHEN) to establish that the respondents, by their servant, the authorised shot-firer, were in breach of reg. 28, in that the shot-firer had contravened proper and normal mining practice by failing to lead the outbye end of the cable from No. 5 room to a point between No. 5 and No. 4 rooms in the heading, it would be necessary to show that such a practice existed, and, if it did, what its purpose was; and, therefore, the case should be remitted for evidence on these points.

Per LORD REID: even if the practice of leading the outbye end of the cable from No. 5 room to a point between No. 4 and No. 5 rooms in the heading was proved to have existed, it was not open to the appellant on his averments to lead evidence to show why it existed.

APPEAL from an interlocutor of the First Division of the Court of Session (LORD COOPER (Lord President), LORD CARMONT and LORD KEITH), dated Dec. 12, 1950, adhering to the interlocutor of LORD BLADES (Lord Ordinary), dated June 22, 1950, dismissing an action by the appellant, a miner, in respect of injuries sustained by him on Nov. 11, 1948, in the course of his employment by the respondents, the National Coal Board. The accident occurred as the result of a shot being fired by another miner, who was not an authorised shot-firer and who had operated the shot-firing apparatus by inserting a pair of pliers, or similar instrument, in the apparatus. The appellant contended that the respondents were guilty of breaches of statutory duty (i) under the General Regulations, 1913, reg. 28, made under the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 86, (ii) under the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934, cl. 2 (h) and cl. 2 (i), and (iii) under cl. 2 (i) (i) of the order of 1934. LORD BLADES (Lord Ordinary) held that there had been no breach of statutory duty on the part of the respondents and his decision was upheld by the First Division of the Court of Session.

Mar. 6. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, in this appeal the question has to be decided whether the appellant has relevantly averred breach of statutory duty on the part of his employers, the respondents. The facts averred are as follows. The appellant and another man, employed as ordinary miners, having prepared shot holes in the face of their working place, No. 5 room off No. 2 heading in Thornton Mine, were about to leave their working place to take shelter while the shots were fired. The electric cable for firing the shots had been coupled up to these holes by the authorised shot-firer, Moir, but had not been connected to the firing battery. In the adjoining working place, No. 6 room, in the same heading, shot holes had been bored and stemmed by another miner, named Morgan, Moir had coupled up these also to another electric cable and he had left the outbye end of this cable close to the outbye end of the cable connected to the holes in No. 5 room. Both outbye cable ends were left by Moir near the same firing battery in the heading. Morgan connected the cable from No. 5 room to the firing battery in the mistaken belief that he was connecting the cable from No. 6 room. He then operated the battery by inserting into the socket meant for the handle a pair of pliers, or a similar instrument, and so fired the shots in No. 5 room injuring the appellant, who had not reached shelter. It is agreed that Morgan was not an authorised shot-firer.

Three grounds of action are alleged. The first is a breach of reg. 28 of the General Regulations, 1913, made under the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 86. Regulation 28 provides:

"No person employed in or about the mine shall negligently or wilfully do anything likely to endanger life or limb in the mine, or negligently or wilfully omit to do anything necessary for the safety of the mine or of the persons employed therein."

The averments of breach of this regulation will have to be closely examined, but in the meantime it is enough to say briefly that Moir is charged with contravening proper and normal mining practice by failing to lead the outbye end of the cable from No. 5 room to a point between No. 4 and No. 5 rooms in the heading with the result that Morgan was misled into firing the shots in No. 5 instead of in No. 6 room. The second ground of action is that Morgan infringed cl. 2 (h) and cl. 2 (i) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934, made under the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 61. Clause 2 (h) provides:

"Where shots are fired electrically they shall only be fired by a person authorised in writing by the manager for the purpose. The authorised person . . . shall . . . himself couple the cable to the firing apparatus."

Clause 2 (i) provides:

"No unauthorised person shall open or interfere with any electrical shot-firing apparatus."

The third ground of action is that the respondents were in breach of other provisions of cl. 2 (i) which follow immediately after those already quoted. These provisions are:

"Every electrical shot-firing apparatus shall be so constructed and used (i) that it can only be operated by a removable handle or plug. This handle or plug shall not be placed in position until a shot is about to be fired and shall be removed as soon as a shot has been fired, and it shall at all times whilst the authorised person is on duty be kept in his personal custody."

LORD BLADES, Lord Ordinary, held that the averments in support of each one of these grounds of action were irrelevant and his judgment was affirmed by the First Division. The Lord President (LORD COOPER) delivered the only judgment, LORD CARMONT and LORD KEITH concurred.

My Lords, I have felt no difficulty about the second and third grounds of action, and I shall dispose of them first. The second ground of action is clearly excluded by the decision of this House in M'Aulay v. James Dunlop & Co. (1). That was a workmen's compensation case in which a miner, not being an authorised shot-firer, coupled a cable to the detonator while the shot-firer was moving the battery handle, which had jammed. The result was an explosion in which a miner was killed. It was necessary to determine whether the miner who coupled the cable to the detonator, and who was not an authorised shot-firer, was acting within the scope of his employment. It was held that he had overstepped the limits of his employment and, therefore, that his employers were not answerable for his breach of the regulations, which were in the same terms as those in the instant case. There are in the present case averments that the motive in infringing the regulations was to speed up production. But motive is irrelevant to the question whether Morgan was doing what he was employed to do. I entirely agree with the opinions of the Lord Ordinary and the Lord President on this branch of the case and need say no more.

On the third ground of action the Lord Ordinary held that, esto there was a breach of the regulations, that breach did not cause the injury suffered by the appellant. The Lord President held that there was no provision whereby a coal owner is guilty of negligence if he provides shot-firing batteries which are not incapable of being operated by a person who makes an attack on them with a pair of pliers, and, further, that the fundamental and sole operative cause of the injury suffered by the appellant was the act of interference by Morgan. My Lords, I think that it is first necessary to construe cl. 2 (i) (i) of the order of 1934 and to determine whether there has been a breach. The appellant's submission was that the regulation requires that the handle should be of special design, like that, for example, of the key of a Yale lock, and that the socket into which it fitted should be designed so that only its special key would fit it. He also submitted that, if that were so, the inference would inevitably arise that the purpose and intention of the regulation was to make the apparatus "fool-proof" against the interference of an ordinary miner disposed to trespass beyond the sphere of his employment and to fire the shot by using an instrument like a pair of pliers. On that view of the meaning of the regulation, there could be much to be said for the averment that the breach of the regulation caused the accident. But, if it was intended to prescribe a key of peculiar design, it would be difficult to choose words less apt for that purpose than the words "handle or plug". "Handle" does not suggest any specialty of design, and "plug" suggests a plain blunt piece of wood or other material. The obligation that the shot-firer shall keep the handle or plug in his possession does not imply any specialty of design. All that is prescribed about the form of the handle is that it shall be removable and the purpose so far may only be to provide against the firing of a shot through an accidental or negligent contact with a fixed handle. The further obligation that the handle shall be kept in the custody of the shot-firer may go further than that and it may be possible to regard it as a precaution against the act of an unauthorised person who might find the handle lying beside the battery, and an indication that such an act should be kept in view by a shot-firer as a likely cause of danger. But there is no obligation to provide a "fool-proof" handle, and there has been no breach of the regulation. The battery could not be operated except by a movable handle or plug. The handle was kept in Moir's custody, but unfortunately Morgan operated the battery by what was in his hands a movable plug. I think, therefore, that the averments on this branch of the case are irrelevant, though not altogether for the reasons given in the courts below.

On the first ground of liability alleged, the Lord Ordinary and the First Division held that the shot-firer had no duty to provide against the acts of unauthorised persons acting contrary to statutory prohibition and that the alleged fault of the shot-firer could not in any event be held to have caused or contributed to the accident. Again, the first question is: What is the meaning of reg. 28 of the General Regulations, 1913? Counsel for the appellant argued that it was more than a formulation of a common law duty. His argument was subtle and refined, and I am not sure that I followed it completely. But it led to the conclusion that anyone who did anything likely to endanger life or limb in the mine, or omitted to do anything necessary for the safety of the persons employed therein, must be deemed to have acted, or omitted to act, negligently or wilfully. The argument was supported by the submission that the regulation must be supposed to have done more than enact the common law of negligence unless it was to be held superfluous. These arguments are, in my opinion, fallacious. The words "negligently" and "wilfully" have a well recognised significance in law and it will not do to treat them as having a meaning so artificial and recondite that they really cease to have any effect. And the formulation of a common law duty as a statutory regulation has the formidable effect of subjecting those who infringe it to penal consequences. It also has the effect in a civil action of depriving the infringer of the benefit of the plea of volenti non fit injuria. To give statutory sanction to the common law obligation is by no means an otiose procedure. In my opinion, therefore, there is no breach of the regulation unless it is proved that the act or omission was negligent or wilful. Then it was said that there could be no negligence unless there was, at least, a duty to foresee a likelihood of some danger arising from the act or omission, and that there was no averment that the shot-firer ought to have foreseen that anyone would act in the way in which Morgan acted. Similarly, it was said that Morgan's unforeseeable action in disobedience to the statutory prohibition "broke the chain of causation". It was conceded, on the other hand, that if there had been an averment that accidents had recently occurred in the mine through the breach of cl. 2 (h) and cl. 2 (i) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934, the case might have been different and that there might then have been a sufficiently relevant case to go to proof. In view of some of the contentions advanced by counsel for the appellant, I wish to make it clear beyond all cavil that it would be incompetent to allow evidence that there had previously been other infringements of cl. 2 (h) and cl. 2 (i) either in this mine or in any other. There is no notice on record that such a case will be made and it is a fundamental rule that without notice on record a fact material for the pursuer's case or for the defence shall not be proved. But that does not end the question. What is averred is that it was the duty of the shot-firer to obey the terms of the regulation and that it was his duty and in accordance with proper and normal mining practice to lead the outbye end of the cable from No. 5 room to a point between No. 5 and No. 4 rooms in the same heading, that he failed to do this, and that but for this failure there would have been no risk of anyone confusing the cable with the cable to No. 6 room. These averments, construed without straining them seem to mean that the alleged practice was a precaution against the confusion by the shot-firer or others of one cable with another and the firing of shots in the wrong room, and that conformity with the practice was part of the duty flowing from the general duty not negligently to do anything likely to endanger life or limb in the mine and not negligently to omit to do anything necessary for the safety of those employed in the mine. If that is the meaning of the averments, I think that there is a sufficient averment of negligence and a sufficient averment that the negligence caused or contributed to the injury. It will, in my opinion, be competent to ask witnesses whether the practice averred exists, and, if it does, what its purpose is. But it will not be competent to carry the matter much further in view of the fact that neither party has averred any facts and circumstances to explain the origin of the practice.

The case is certainly narrow and difficult, and it would not be right to anticipate the questions which may arise. I wish not to hamper or embarrass the lord ordinary who may have to decide the case after the proof and I hope I have made it clear that I decide nothing except (i) that, on a sound construction of reg. 28, negligence in the common law sense must be proved, (ii) that there are averments which, reasonably construed, may infer a duty on the part of the shot-firer to have regard to the risk of confusion about the cables and of the consequent firing of shots in the wrong room, and (iii) that even the unlawful interference of a miner who is not an authorised shot-firer will not necessarily lead to absolvitor of the respondents on the ground that their breach of duty did not cause or contribute to the injury. All else is left for further decision after proof, which will technically be a proof before answer. In my opinion, this ground of action cannot be disposed of without proof, and I would allow the appeal to the extent of reversing the interlocutor so far as it sustains the respondents' first plea in law quoad the averments of breach of reg. 28. The case will be remitted to the Court of Session.

LORD REID stated the facts and said that, in regard to the second ground of action, he was in complete agreement with LORD NORMAND. Dealing with the third ground of action (viz., the alleged breach of cl. 2 (i) (i) of the Explosives in Coal Mines Order, 1934), HIS LORDSHIP read the sub-clause and continued: Was it a breach of cl. 2 (i) (i) for the respondents to provide an apparatus which could be operated by the use of a pair of pliers? There appear to me to be two possible meanings of the regulation. One is that the apparatus must be so constructed that it cannot be operated by hand, but can only be operated by using some instrument or tool as a handle or plug. The other is that it must be impossible to operate the apparatus without using a handle or plug of a particular pattern: it must be like a well made lock which requires its own key. I do not think that the regulation can mean that anything which can properly be called a handle or plug may be usable, but that, if anything else can be used, there is an infringement. If a variety of handles or tools could be used, I do not see how the apparatus could be designed to make it impossible to use a makeshift handle or tool. In this case, Morgan appears to have used his pliers as a makeshift handle. To my mind, the words "handle or plug" suggest simple tools and not something of an intricate pattern for which an effective substitute cannot readily be found. I think that, if the Board of Trade had intended that it was to be an offence to provide an apparatus which could be operated by a makeshift handle or plug, this should have been made clear. But it was argued that the purpose of cl. 2 (i) is to ensure safety, that safety is not ensured if the apparatus can be operated by something other than its own handle or key, and that, therefore, the regulation should be so construed as to require that the apparatus cannot be so operated. I cannot accept this argument. An apparatus which could be operated by hand without the use of any tool might be most unsafe. An unauthorised person might operate it by mistake or carelessly or acting on the spur of the moment. All these possibilities would seem to be excluded merely by ensuring that some tool is necessary and that it shall be taken away by the shot-firer when he is not using the apparatus. The only purpose of making it necessary to use a tool of a particular pattern would be to provide against serious and deliberate breaches of the law (for it is a serious offence for an unauthorised person to operate a shot-firing apparatus) and I see nothing in these regulations to indicate that this was the object of cl. 2 (i). I am, therefore, of opinion that, if the appellant's averments were proved, no infringement of this regulation would be established and, therefore, his averments on this matter are irrelevant.

The other alleged breach of a regulation involves much more difficult questions. It is alleged that Moir, the shot-firer, was in breach of reg. 28 of the General Regulations of July 10, 1913, made by the Home Secretary under the Coal Mines Act, 1911, s. 86. [LORD REID read the regulation, stated the relevant facts, and continued:] The fault alleged against Moir is that he had left the outbye ends of both cables at the same place in the heading. It is averred that proper and normal mining practice required him to lead the cable from Morgan's room to a different point in the heading and that, if that had been done, there would have been no risk of anyone mistaking the cable leading to the appellant's room for the cable leading to Morgan's room. Before considering the relevancy of these averments, I think it is necessary to determine the meaning of reg. 28. That regulation has no application unless the act or omission is negligent or wilful. It was argued that the word "negligently" in this regulation has a wider or different meaning from that which it has at common law. I can see nothing to support this argument. The principal purpose of the regulation appears to me to be subject to penalties conduct which, if it caused injury, would be a civil wrong giving rise to a right to reparation. In the present case, I do not think that the appellant's rights under the regulation are in any way different from his common law rights. If he could not recover damages at common law, he cannot do so under the regulation.

The question, then, is whether on his averments the appellant is entitled to prove enough to establish common law liability against Moir and, therefore, against his employers. This appeal must be decided on the assumption that the appellant will prove all that he has averred but nothing else, because he will not be entitled to lead evidence to prove any essential fact which he has not averred. So regarding the case, I have the greatest difficulty in seeing how the appellant can succeed, but, as your Lordships are, I understand, of a different opinion and the case must go back for proof on this matter, I think it better not to express my views at length. I shall, therefore, only state my views in a brief and tentative way and I shall not formally dissent.

In general, I do not think that a person is liable in damages because he has created an opportunity for another to break the law and thereby cause injury to a third person, but he may be liable if he ought to have known that it was likely that advantage would be taken of this opportunity. If facts had been averred to show that Moir knew or ought to have known that someone was likely to try to fire a shot if he left a cable near the shot-firing apparatus, I would have had no difficulty. But that is not averred, all that is said is that Moir failed to act in accordance with proper and normal mining practice. No doubt, if the practice is proved to have existed, Moir knew or ought to have known of it, and, if the mere fact that the practice existed was enough to show that breaches of the law might be expected, and that the practice was intended to lessen the risk of an accident if such a breach occurred, then I would agree that the appellant's averment is sufficient. But it is not clear to me that the practice may not have existed for other reasons and I do not think that it is open to the appellant on his averments to lead evidence to show why it existed. I agree with my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, that it is not open to the appellant, on his averments, to prove that there have been previous breaches of the law and I think it will be equally incompetent to prove any other facts to show that Moir had reason to suppose that a breach of the law might occur, and it seems to me that evidence that the practice existed because such breaches had occurred in the past, or because there had been reason to anticipate such breaches, would be open to the same objection. If the appellant intends to prove something beyond the mere existence of the practice, then he ought to have averred it. If he does not, then I am far from being convinced that he can succeed.

LORD TUCKER and LORD COHEN concurred in the opinion delivered by LORD NORMAND.

Appeal allowed to the extent of reversing the interlocutor so far as it sustained the respondents' plea in law in regard to the alleged breach of the General Regulations, 1913, reg. 28.

BOON v. BOON.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Collingwood, J.), February 25, March 7, 1952.]

Execution—Exemption from civil process—Airman—Debt exceeding £30—Costs of legal proceedings—Air Force Act, s. 144 (1).

The wife obtained a decree nisi against the husband and an order for costs. which were taxed at £59 5s. The husband made no payment under the order and the wife issued a judgment summons. The husband was an airman in the regular air force, and, by the Air Force Act, s. 144 (1): "An airman of the regular air force shall not be liable to be taken out of His Majesty's service by any process, execution, or order of any court of law or otherwise, or to be compelled to appear in person before any court of law, except . . . (b) On account of any debt . . . when the amount exceeds £30 over and above all costs of suit."

HELD: costs were not to be taken into account in computing the amount of the "debt", and, therefore, costs alone could not be a debt within the meaning of the exception, the husband was entitled to the protection of the section, and the wife's remedy was barred.

Case referred to:

(1) Flanders v. Nicholls, (1737), Barnes 433; 94 E.R. 990.

JUDGMENT SUMMONS issued by the wife against the husband in respect of his failure to pay the costs, taxed at £59 5s., of divorce proceedings brought by her against him.

The husband was an airman in the regular air force. It was contended for the wife that the costs were a debt within the meaning of the exception contained in s. 144 (1) (b) of the Air Force Act, that a judgment summons was a suit separate and distinct from the divorce suit, and that it was the latter suit and not the former which was referred to in s. 144 (1) (b). It was contended for the husband that a judgment summons was the successor of such part of the old remedy of "capias ad satisfaciendum" as was preserved by s. 5 of the Debtors Act, 1869, and was, therefore, a form of execution within the meaning of s. 144 (1), and that "costs of the suit" must mean the costs of the suit in which the execution was had.

Baskerville for the wife.

P. E. Lewis for the husband.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 7. COLLINGWOOD, J., read the following judgment. On July 26, 1951, the wife obtained a decree nisi on the ground of the husband's adultery. The decree was made absolute on Sept. 11, 1951, and on Sept. 21, 1951, the wife obtained an order for payment of £59 5s. being the amount of her taxed costs. Nothing having been paid under this order, the wife obtained the issue of this judgment summons.

The husband is an aircraftman 1st class, an airman of the regular air force, and, in accordance with the Air Force Act, s. 144 (5), complaint has been made by the commanding officer of the Royal Air Force Station, Felixstowe, under whose command the husband is serving, that the judgment summons has been issued in contravention of s. 144 (1) of the Act.

Section 144 (1) of the Air Force Act provides:

"An airman of the regular air force shall not be liable to be taken out of His Majesty's service by any process, execution, or order of any court of law or otherwise, or to be compelled to appear in person before any court of law, except in respect of the following matters, or one of them; that is to say, (a) On account of a charge of or conviction for crime; or (b) On account of any debt, damages, or sum of money, when the amount exceeds £30 over and above all costs of suit."

It was contended on behalf of the wife that, though the husband's liability had its origin in costs, it had, by reason of the judgment, become a debt, and, it being above the statutory limit of £30 (irrespective of the costs of the judgment summons proceedings), the section had no application.

The exemption of members of the forces of the Crown from civil process was first granted under the Conscription Act, 1705 (4 & 5 Anne, c. 21)—a temporary measure, the object of which was to secure the personal service of volunteers, not to protect their goods from seizure. By 9 Anne, c. 4, in order, as the preamble states, to remedy the "evil practices" which had ensued, the privilege was limited, in case of arrest for debt under £20, to soldiers sent abroad beyond the seas. The Mutiny Act (1 Geo. I, st. 2, c. 3) granted exemption to volunteers in the same words as those in 4 & 5 Anne, c. 21. By an Act of 1718 (4 Geo. 1, c. 4) the exemption was limited to debts under £10. In 1780 (20 Geo. 3, c. 12) the amount was raised to £20, and in 1830 (11 Geo. 4 & 1 Will. 4, c. 7) to £30, where it now stands. By the Act of 1718 the exemption was expressed to be:

"unless for a real debt, or other just cause of action, and unless before the taking out of such process or execution the plaintiff shall make affidavit: that to his knowledge the sum justly owing to the plaintiff from the defendant in the action on which such process shall issue, or the debt or damages and costs for which such execution shall be issued out, amounts to the value of £10 at least."

In the Mutiny Act, 1739 (13 Geo. 2, c. 10), the wording is changed, and the affidavit must be to the effect:

"that to his knowledge the original sum, justly due and owing to the plaintiff from the defendant in the action or cause of action, on which such process shall issue, or the original debt for which such execution shall be issued out, amounts to the value of £10 at least, over and above all costs of suit in the same action, or in any other action on which the same shall be grounded."

This new provision was considered as follows by the Court of Common Pleas in Flanders v. Nicholls (1) (Barnes 433):

"Defendant, a soldier in His Majesty's service, was sued by plaintiff in the Marshal's Court for a debt of £3 17s. 4d., and after a writ of inquiry executed in that court, the costs were taxed at £7 14s., and plaintiff signed final judgment for the sum total, being £11 11s. 4d. Defendant moved the judge of the Marshal's Court, that no execution might be issued against his person, which upon hearing both sides was ordered, and the judge directed defendant to apply for costs, in case his person should be taken in execution. Plaintiff brought an action in this court upon the judgment, and defendant moved that the bail-bond might be delivered up, on entering a common appearance, and obtained a rule to show cause, and for costs. The court on showing cause were of opinion, that though the clauses in the former Acts of Parliament to prevent soldiers being taken out of the King's service have hitherto been defective, yet the clause in the last Act, 13 Geo. 2, is sufficient, the original debt being under £10, and plaintiff having proceeded to hold defendant to bail after he knew the opinion of the judge of the Marshal's Court, the rule was made absolute in omnibus."

From this account it would appear that the court held the view that, if the original debt was below the figure in the Act (then £10), but with costs it amounted to more than that sum, and then debt were brought on the judgment, the soldier was entitled to the benefit of the Act.

If, in computing the amount of the debt in order to ascertain whether it exceeds the statutory minimum, costs of the suit must be excluded, then, in my opinion, it follows that in the present case, where there is no debt apart from the costs of the suit, the airman is protected by the section. It would, I think, be a strange result if, while a judgment for an amount under the statutory minimum but amounted with costs over than sum, was within the Act, an order for the latter alone was not. The unfortunate result of such protection may well be to deprive a wife (or where, as here, she is a legally assisted person, the taxpayer) of all effective remedy for the recovery of the costs of the suit—a result, I suggest, clearly not envisaged by the Act and quite outside the mischief at which the provision was originally aimed.

Summons dismissed.

McINTOSH (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. MANCHESTER CORPORATION.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 4, 5, 1952.]

Income Tax—Industrial building allowances—“Cutting”—Excavation of land by water undertaking—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 14 (1) (b), and proviso.

A corporation incurred capital expenditure on the construction of buildings or structures in use for the purposes of its water undertaking, which were admittedly industrial buildings or structures within Part I of the Income Tax Act, 1945. Part of the expenditure, relating to the excavation of land for extending reservoirs, deepening channels, making chutes, settling pools, etc., was disallowed for the purpose of claiming industrial building allowances on the ground that the work was “cutting” within the meaning of s. 14 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, and the proviso to the sub-section.

HELD: the word “cutting”, both in s. 14 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, and in the proviso, meant any incision of the earth which severed the continuity of the soil, and was not limited to the making of an open way through land which rose above the level of the way, and, therefore, the corporation’s expenditure on excavation was properly disallowed in computing its claim to industrial building allowances.

FOR THE INCOME TAX ACT, 1945, s. 14 (1) (b), see HALSBURY’S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 12, p. 626.

CASE STATED by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The corporation claimed income tax annual allowances under s. 2 of the Income Tax Act, 1945, on capital expenditure incurred by it on the construction of industrial buildings or structures which formed part of its waterworks undertaking, but that part of the expenditure which related to excavation work was disallowed on the ground that the work was “cutting” within the meaning of s. 14 (1) (b) of the Income Tax Act, 1945, and the proviso thereto. On an appeal by the corporation to the Special Commissioners the corporation contended that the excavating was not cutting, since the word “cutting” was to be construed as relating to operations which resulted in “cuttings” in the sense of open ways through land, such as railway cuttings. The Crown contended that the word was to be construed in the unrestricted sense of any incision which severed the continuity of the soil. The Special Commissioners accepted the corporation’s contention, and allowed the appeal. The Crown appealed.

The Solicitor-General (Sir Reginald Manningham-Buller, Q.C.), and Sir Reginald Hills for the Crown.

Grant, Q.C., and Tribe for the corporation.

VAISEY, J.: This is a short point arising on the construction of the Income Tax Act, 1945, Part I, which consists of fourteen sections grouped together under the heading of “Industrial Buildings and Structures, etc.”. Section 1 provides that where a person incurs capital expenditure on the construction of a building or structure which is to be an industrial building or structure occupied for the purposes of a trade, he shall be entitled to an allowance, referred to as an “initial allowance”, equal to one-tenth thereof. Section 2 provides that where a person is entitled to an interest in a building or structure which is an industrial building or structure and that interest is the relevant interest in relation to the capital expenditure incurred on the construction of that building or structure, an allowance, referred to as an “annual allowance”, equal to one-fiftieth of that expenditure shall be made to him. Section 8 (1) of the Act defines an industrial building or structure as including a building or structure in use for, among other purposes, the purpose of a water undertaking. Section 14 (1) reads as follows:

“References in this Part of this Act to expenditure incurred on the construction of a building or structure do not include—(a) any expenditure incurred on the acquisition of, or of rights in or over, any land; or (b) any expenditure incurred on preparing, cutting, tunnelling or levelling any land.”

To that sub-section there is a proviso which reads as follows:

“ Provided that para. (b) of this sub-section shall not apply to expenditure on work done on the land to be covered by a building or structure for the purposes of preparing the land to receive the foundations of the building or structure, being work which may be expected to be valueless when the building or structure is demolished and not being work which consists of cutting or tunnelling.”

The word “cutting”, on which the present question turns, is used once in the body of s. 14 (1) and once in the proviso. The question is: What does it mean?

The building or structure, so called, regarding which the question arises is the totality of the extensive works of the taxpayers, Manchester Corporation, as water undertakers in the city of Manchester, such works including their reservoirs at Longdendale, Thirlmere and Haweswater, and the many miles of conduits, aqueducts, pipes, culverts and other apparatus through and by which the water is, or is intended to be, brought to that city. It is admitted that the works of the corporation constitute an industrial building or structure, though one of an unusual type. The only point I have to consider is the meaning of the one word “cutting”. Counsel both for the Crown and for the corporation are agreed that the word must have one and the same meaning in the body of the sub-section and in the proviso, but they are, of course, not agreed in their submissions as to what that meaning is.

Counsel for the Crown contends that the cutting meant is a participle of a verb, which means breaking the surface of the land quite generally. Counsel for the corporation submits that “cutting”, although he agrees it is a participle of a verb, means making a cutting in the sense in which “cutting” (a noun) is used, somewhat colloquially as I think, in reference to railway cuttings in contrast with tunnels. The Special Commissioners adopted the latter view. They did not accept what is called in the Case the unrestricted definition of “cutting”, that is to say, any incision of the earth which severs the continuity of the soil. They accepted the definition of it as making an open way through land which rises above the level of the way to be made through it—a definition which is eminently unsatisfactory in that it raises without attempting to solve the questions how far must the banks of a cutting be before it becomes a cutting?, and when is a trench not a trench but a cutting? I ask these questions, but I think neither I nor anyone else can answer them.

In my judgment, the words “preparing”, “cutting”, “tunnelling” and “levelling” land are all descriptive of processes applied to land, and do not describe the results or consequences of operating those processes. It is on this short ground that I prefer the unrestricted definition which the commissioners have rejected. The words describe things which are being done and not things which would be produced. Thus “tunnelling” is not, as described there, making a tunnel, and “cutting” is not the same as making a cutting. “Cutting” and “tunnelling” are really, I think, only an extended way of describing excavating, the former being an operation more or less in a downward direction and the latter an operation more or less horizontal. I do not find any inconsistency between the body of s. 14 (1) and the proviso, when it is observed that the proviso deals with what I may call foundation works for which allowances may be made on a special basis and on special terms. I, therefore, come to the conclusion that this appeal succeeds and that the items of expenditure sought to be disallowed by the tax authorities were properly disallowed.

Appeal allowed.

HUNWICK v. ESSEX RIVERS CATCHMENT BOARD.

[CHELMSFORD ASSIZES (Croom-Johnson, J.), February 28, 1952.]

Negligence—Sea wall—Duty of catchment board to repair—Footpath on wall—Collapse of wall—Injury to person on path.

Under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 4 (1) (a), and the Essex Rivers Catchment Board Transfer Order, 1932, the defendant catchment board were the authority responsible for the repair of an ancient sea wall on the coast of Essex. As a result of people walking along the top of the wall, a footpath had come into existence over forty-three years ago and was used by the public. In July, 1948, part of the wall collapsed while the plaintiff was standing on it and she was injured. In an action against the board for damages for negligence, HELD: (i) the duty of the board, as the successors in title of the commissioners of sewers, was to keep the sea wall in repair, but they were not in occupation of the wall as a result of that duty and they were not empowered to maintain, construct or dedicate a highway on the wall, and, therefore, assuming that there was an ancient highway along the top of the wall on which the public had the right to pass, there was no duty on the board to keep it in repair and they were not liable to the plaintiff for failure to do so.

(ii) the duty of the board was to repair the sea wall so as to restrain the sea water and they were under no duty to repair it so as to prevent persons going on it from being injured; the plaintiff was not on the sea wall at the invitation of the board; and, therefore, they owed no duty to protect her from, or warn her of, a hidden danger and were not liable to her in damages.

ACTION for damages for personal injuries.

In July, 1948, the plaintiff was walking along the top of a sea wall on the coast of Essex, and, while she was standing to let some other people pass, part of the wall collapsed and she was injured. In an action against the Essex Rivers Catchment Board, who were the authority responsible for the repair of the wall, she contended inter alia (a) that there was a public footpath along the sea wall, that the board were the owners or occupiers of the wall, and, alternatively, that, under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 4, and the Essex Rivers Catchment Board Transfer Order, 1932, the rights, obligations and liabilities over and in connection with the sea wall and the footpath were vested in and to be discharged by the board, and, therefore, they were under a duty to keep the footpath and the sea wall in a proper state of repair, and were liable to her in damages for breach of that duty, and (b) that the board had failed to protect her from or warn her of a hidden danger on the sea wall.

J. M. Shaw for the plaintiff.

Jukes and P. M. O'Connor for the catchment board.

CROOM-JOHNSON, J.: On the coast of Essex, in the neighbourhood of St. Osyth, an ancient sea wall (the age of which was not proved by either party) was erected either by the Crown direct or by the Commissioners of Sewers in whom for a long time were vested the powers of the Crown to create and keep in order sea walls so as to prevent the incursion of the sea into the land behind the wall. On the top of this sea wall, which is constructed of clay with a slope towards the sea, is a pathway, which has been there for over forty-three years. It is in no sense made a pathway; it came into existence as a result of people climbing up the sea side of the wall and walking on the top of it. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts in regard to the plaintiff's accident, and continued:] The question that arises is: Is the plaintiff, in the circumstances of the case, entitled to maintain an action against the particular defendants against whom she has elected to proceed? That has given rise to a number of problems posed for me by counsel for the plaintiff with a view to suggesting various pegs on which this claim can be hung, and, accordingly, it is necessary that I should examine what the position is and has been in regard to the sea wall.

The circumstances in regard to the wall, so far as is known, have already been examined by the Court of Appeal in Symes & Jaywick Associated Properties, Ltd. v. Essex Rivers Catchment Board (1). To save expense, counsel has directed my attention to certain statements made in the judgments in that case, and no objection has been taken to that method of procedure. This sea wall is part of a length of sea wall which is under the care of the defendants. It forms three sides of a parallelogram. In the space between it and the top of the beach, as it now exists at the material point, a number of dwellings have been erected in a series of straight paths or roads, and the district has now become a populous one. To protect the dwellings, those responsible for them made a path or roadway, known as "Brooklands", on the top of the shingle or beach. But, apparently, Brooklands is not likely to be an efficient substitute for the sea wall except in a temporary way. No one knows when the wall was constructed, but it must be very old. There is no doubt that at common law it was the duty and the prerogative of the Crown to protect the realm against the incursion of sea water, just as a wall of a fort is erected to prevent the attack of an enemy: see per GREER, L.J. ([1936] 3 All E.R. 913), in Symes' case (1). The Commissioners of Sewers began to exercise jurisdiction in respect of land drainage under the Statute of Sewers, 1531 (23 Hen. 8, c. 5), but I do not think I need examine whether they took over the protection of the sea walls so constructed. It is quite plain that what was done was done to protect the land, to guard against the invasion of the sea as a destructive force, and to conserve the use of the properties inland. In A.-G. of Southern Nigeria v. John Holt & Co. (Liverpool) Ltd. (2) LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE, delivering the judgment of the Privy Council, said ([1915] A.C. 620):

"... it is recognised by law that it is the duty of the Crown to protect land from the incursions of the sea, and if, in the circumstances of the present case, a licence had been granted and duly recorded to the respondents to reclaim as was done, that licence would have been in entire accord not only with the right of the subject but with this duty of the Crown."

It seems to me, therefore, that the true position is that anything which interferes with the duty of the Crown or of the commissioners who took over the duty of protection, can and must be prevented. It is established in other cases that there cannot be permitted to exist a state of affairs where persons have the right to keep a sea wall in repair, but no precise obligation to do so.

This principle becomes important in view of one of the claims made in this action. It is said that a path was constructed at the top of the wall with the intention of dedicating it as a highway, and that thereby the path has become a highway. There is no question that a footpath may be a highway, and no difficulty, therefore, arises from that point of view. But, on the other hand, if people who have a duty to maintain drainage or other works for public utility proceed to do something which makes the carrying out of their duties impossible, then the ordinary results do not follow. The whole question on this point was examined in R. v. Inhabitants of Leake (3). The question in that case was whether trustees, in whom land was vested, by statute, for certain public purposes, were supposed to have dedicated the surface of some part of the land for use as a highway. DENMAN, C.J., and PARKE, J., held that, if the land were vested by the Act in the trustees so that they were thereby bound to use it for some special purpose incompatible with its public use as a highway, the trustees would have been incapable, in point of law, of making a dedication of it, but that, if the use by the public was not incompatible with the objects prescribed by the Act, they would have had the power. PARKE, J., said (5 B. & Ad. 478):

"The mere circumstance of their not being beneficial owners, cannot preclude them from giving the public this right."

In the case now before me, I think it is quite plain that the footpath on the top of the sea wall has been used by the public for generations, and, if so, the circumstance that that user has continued, apparently without objection or any inconvenience or interference with the duty to maintain the sea wall, makes me think that the use by the public of the footpath is not incompatible with what was prescribed by the law on whomever the duty was to maintain the sea wall. Therefore, I have come to the conclusion that it was possible for someone to dedicate the pathway as a highway. Whether the Crown could do it, I doubt very much, as that might have involved the question how far mere user can affect the property of the Crown and interfere with the prerogative. For the purpose of this judgment, however, I propose to assume that the path on the top of the sea wall is an ancient highway which was, at some time or another, dedicated for use of the public, and, accordingly, that the public had a right to pass along the path in the way that the plaintiff was doing on the day when she met with her accident. The trouble about that branch of the case is that, if the path is an ancient highway, it is repairable by the inhabitants at large, and, unless that duty has been specifically cast on some other person by legislation or by the proper construction of such legislation as there may be, the duty still persists in the inhabitants at large or in the inhabitants of the parish where the highway is situate. Therefore, unless the plaintiff can establish that the duty of maintaining this ancient highway was cast on the defendant board or their predecessors in title, they are not liable to maintain it. Moreover, even if they were liable, they would be liable only for acts of misfeasance, and not for acts of non-feasance. In R. v. Inhabitants of Leake (3) it was laid down that the inhabitants of a parish are bound by law to repair all roads within it dedicated to and used by the public, although there be no adoption of such roads by the parish. If that is the right approach to this part of the argument, the only question which could then arise would be: Has the duty of maintaining this highway been cast on the defendants? There is no evidence that there was ever a dedication either by the defendants or by any of their predecessors in title within modern times—I do not think I need go further back than the Sewers Act, 1833—and I do not think that it is the fact.

By the Sewers Act, 1833, s. 47:

"The property of and in all lands . . . erections, works, and other things which shall have been or shall hereafter be . . . obtained, erected, constructed, and made by or by the order of, or which are or shall be within or under the view, cognisance, or management of any commissioners of sewers . . . shall be and the same are hereby vested in . . ."

the Commissioners of Sewers. Under the Land Drainage Act, 1930, s. 4, and the Essex Rivers Catchment Board Transfer Order, 1932 (S.R. & O., 1932, No. 875), made under s. 4 (1) (a) of the Act of 1930, the powers and duties of the commissioners for the area in question were transferred to the defendant board, and it is contended that, in consequence, s. 47 of the Act of 1833 imposes on the board a liability to maintain the highway on the sea wall. It must be borne in mind, however, that the duty cast on the commissioners [by the Statute of Sewers, 1531, s. 1,] was to keep the sea walls in repair, and I can find no reference in any of the statutes to which I have been referred to any liability or power on their part to maintain, construct or dedicate a highway. I do not think that they were at any time in the position of being proprietors of land which they could dedicate, other than land which they had purchased. I am not satisfied that, for the purpose of this action, the catchment board, or any of their predecessors in title, were ever in occupation of the sea wall, and it is not one of those classes of cases in which a duty is cast on the individual or on a board in such a manner that, if the duty is discharged negligently, an action might lie for breach of that duty.

The argument of counsel for the plaintiff that with the duty to look after the bank arose the vesting of the bank itself as a right of property in the commissioners would, if correct, have some rather extraordinary results, as not only would the property be vested in the defendant board or their predecessors, but the real owner would be divested of it. It seems to me that the answer to this contention is that, if this is a highway, the people who are responsible for its repair, and the only people against whom an action could, in any event, be brought with regard to this particular part of the highway, are the persons or the authority in whom the duty of maintaining the highways in this particular locality is now vested. I think I have said enough to show that, unless there is some statutory provision in the Act of 1930 or in the order of 1932 which imposes that particular duty on the defendant board, not with regard to the bank but with regard to the highway, the plaintiff cannot succeed on this point.

Her claim is then put in a slightly different way. It is said, in effect, that she had a right, as against the catchment board, to have care taken so that she was not subjected to any hidden danger of which she had not been warned, and that there was a duty on the board either to protect her from the danger or to warn her of it. There seems to be a variety of answers to that. The plaintiff was not there at the invitation of the catchment board. The board never accepted responsibility for this footpath worn by the feet of passengers during the years—that is the only way in which it came to be a footpath—and they neither invited people there, nor did they wish people to be there. They did not endeavour to keep people off the sea wall, but, in the circumstances, it would have been impossible for them to attempt to do so. They were not in occupation, they were not the owners, and, furthermore, there is no evidence that anybody on behalf of the board knew, or should have known, of this particular danger. I am quite satisfied that the board do what they can to keep the sea wall in repair, not for the purpose of seeing that foot passengers, who happen to clamber on it, are not injured, but for the purpose of keeping out the sea water. It is their duty to protect the sea wall and to keep it in repair, and I have heard nothing in the course of this case which suggests that they are failing to do it. I can see no ground, therefore, for saying that they ought to have known that this place was likely to collapse. I am quite satisfied that, whatever caused the plaintiff's accident, it was due to no negligence on the part of the board or of their servants. I think that the attempt to suggest that this is a case of a hidden trap or danger, based on Indermaur v. Dames (4) and similar authorities, is quite hopeless on the facts. I have come to the conclusion that the action fails, and must be dismissed with costs.

Re HODGSON (deceased). HODGSON AND ANOTHER v.
GILLET AND OTHERS.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), March 6, 11, 1952.]

Will—"Survive"—Gift to such of children of son as shall survive testator—Son unmarried at date of will and date of death of testator.

By his will, dated Apr. 7, 1920, a testator, who died on Apr. 25, 1920, provided inter alia for the sale and conversion of his residuary estate and directed his trustees to stand possessed of his residuary trust funds and the income thereof "upon trust to pay and divide the said income equally between my said wife and my said son [Captain Hodgson] during their joint lives . . . and subject thereto my trustees shall hold the residuary trust funds in trust on the decease of my said wife [to make a certain payment] and subject thereto to pay the whole of the income of the remaining part of the residuary trust funds to the said [Captain Hodgson] if living at the death of my wife for his life and after his death my trustees shall hold the residuary trust funds (subject nevertheless as aforesaid) and the income thereof in trust for such of the child or children of the said [Captain Hodgson] who shall survive me and being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry under that age and so that as between his sons and daughters the share of each daughter shall be equal to one equal third part of the share of each son of my said son [Captain Hodgson] but if my said son . . . shall die in my lifetime without leaving issue as aforesaid or if any child of his being a son or sons shall die before attaining the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters shall not attain that age or previously marry my trustees shall subject as aforesaid hold the residuary trust funds in trust for such sons of my said daughter Noel . . . as shall attain the age of twenty-one years and if more than one in equal shares absolutely . . ." A condition relating to the adoption of the testator's surname was attached to the latter trust, and finally the testator provided that his residuary trust funds should be held "subject as aforesaid, in trust for that son of my said nephew Archibald . . . who shall survive me and first attain the age of twenty-one years". When the testator signed his will Captain Hodgson was unmarried and was not contemplating marriage with any particular person. At that time the nephew, Archibald, had three sons. The testator was survived by his wife, Captain Hodgson, and his daughter, Noel, but by no other child of his and by no issue of any child of his who predeceased him. Captain Hodgson was first married in 1923, and there were two children of that marriage.

HELD: the ordinary meaning of "survive" was that the propositus should be living at and after the relevant date, and, there being nothing in the will or the surrounding circumstances to displace that meaning, the phrase "such of the child or children of the said [Captain Hodgson] who shall survive me" did not include any child or children born after the date of the death of the testator.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine whether, on the true construction of the will of Charles Durant Hodgson, deceased, the residuary estate of the testator after the death of the defendant, Harold Edward Austen Hodgson, would be held on trust for such of the children of the said Harold Edward Austen Hodgson who being a son or sons had attained or should attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters should attain that age or marry under that age and so that the share of any such daughter should be equal to one third of the share of any such son.

P. W. E. Taylor for the sixth defendant, one of the legal personal representatives of Emily Hodgson, deceased, the widow of the testator.

The seventh defendant was not represented.

ROXBURGH, J.: The very difficult question in this case arises on the will, dated Apr. 7, 1920, of Charles Durant Hodgson who died on Apr. 25, 1920. The testator was survived by his widow, by his son, Harold Edward Austen Hodgson, and by his daughter, Noel Emily Beatrice Charteris, but by no other child of his and by no issue of any child of his who predeceased him.

The testator's son, Captain Hodgson, was first married to Catherine Phyllis Champneys, who died on Sept. 30, 1942. That marriage took place on Oct. 25, 1923, i.e., after the date of the testator's death. Captain Hodgson had by her two children only, viz., Charles Arthur Champneys Hodgson and Robert Basil Champneys Hodgson. Captain Hodgson was secondly married to Eileen Mary Drew who is still living, but he has had no children by her. Captain Hodgson has sworn two affidavits. Paragraph 2 of the first, sworn on Nov. 15, 1951, says:

"For a considerable time before my father's death I was living at his residence, The Hallams, Shamley Green, in the county of Surrey. In the latter part of 1919 my father was in poor health and was suffering from nervous trouble and blood pressure. From approximately Christmas, 1919, onwards a nurse was constantly in attendance upon him. In the early part of 1920 my father's health deteriorated and from approximately the beginning of March, 1920, until the time of his death he was bed-ridden and was in this condition when he signed his will on Apr. 7, 1920."

His second affidavit, sworn on Mar. 7, 1952, says in para. 2:

"When my father signed his will on Apr. 7, 1920, I was unmarried and was not contemplating marriage with any particular person. I was not at that date engaged to be married or about to become engaged to be married and had never previously been engaged to be married. To the best of my knowledge and belief when my father signed his said will there were no circumstances which might have led him to believe that I was about to become engaged to be married."

The testator also had a nephew, Archibald Sanford Hodgson, who had at least three sons. There is no evidence what their ages were when he made his will or when he died, and there is only indefinite and vague evidence of the testator's own age which appears to have been about sixty. The will is clearly drawn by a professional hand, and no part of the difficulties to which I refer can be attributed to the testator's bed-ridden condition.

It will be apparent from what I have read that at the date of the will the testator's son was a bachelor with no present intention to become married. Obviously, therefore, he had no children. It is that circumstance which gives rise to the difficult question which I have to attempt to decide. By the relevant trusts of the will the trustees are directed to stand possessed of the residuary trust funds and the income thereof

"upon trust to pay and divide the said income equally between my said wife and my said son [Captain Hodgson] during their joint lives . . . and subject thereto my trustees shall hold the residuary trust funds in trust on the decease of my said wife [to make a certain payment] And subject thereto to pay the whole of the income of the remaining part of the residuary trust funds to the said [Captain Hodgson] if living at the death of my wife for his life and after his death my trustees shall hold the residuary trust funds (subject nevertheless as aforesaid) and the income thereof in trust for such of the child or children of the said [Captain Hodgson] who shall survive me and being a son or sons shall attain the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters shall attain that age or marry under that age and so that as between his sons and daughters the share of each daughter shall be equal to one equal third part of the share of each son of my said son [Captain Hodgson] but if my said son . . . shall die in my lifetime without leaving issue as aforesaid or if any child of his being a son or sons shall die before attaining the age of twenty-one years or being a daughter or daughters shall not attain that age or previously marry my trustees shall subject as aforesaid hold the residuary trust funds in trust for such sons of my said daughter Noel Emily Beatrice Charteris as shall attain the age of twenty-one years and if more than one in equal shares absolutely . . ."

on condition that they adopt the surname of Hodgson. The clause continues:

"but if any such grandson shall neglect or refuse to take and use the said surname within the said period or if none of such grandsons shall attain the age of twenty-one years then my trustees shall hold the residuary trust funds or the share or shares therein of any such grandson or grandsons so neglecting or refusing to take and use the said surname as aforesaid as the case may be and the income thereof and subject as aforesaid in trust for that son of my said nephew Archibald Sanford Hodgson who shall survive me and first attain the age of twenty-one years absolutely."

The question is whether the bequest in favour of "such of the child or children" of Captain Hodgson "who shall survive me" is limited to those who were living at and after the death of the testator (in which case there was none), or does it comprehend a child or children of Captain Hodgson who, though not living at the date of the testator's death, was or were living after the testator, having been born after the date of the testator's death? The question is complex, not only because the will on any view is extremely difficult to construe, but also because the state of the authorities is in flux.

I start with Elliot v. Joicey (1). What is quite certain is that "survive", when used in relation to an event or point of time, predicates prima-facie that the propositus is alive at and after the point of time or the event in question. I must confess that I should have thought that that was so on the ordinary meaning of language, but, at any rate, whatever I may have thought, that much is now finally settled by the House of Lords. On the other hand, there is a decision of the Court of Appeal which bears a considerable resemblance to the present case, viz., Re Clark's Estate (2). In that case the gift was to M.C. for life and after her death to "all and every the children of the said M.C. who shall survive me". The only relevant surrounding circumstance which appeared to have existed in Re Clark's Estate (2) was that M.C. was only twelve years of age at the date of the testator's will. I cannot myself find any other surrounding circumstance. The report does not state how old the testator himself was. I think (and this is not unimportant to the decision of this case) the only surrounding circumstance really was that a disposition which differentiates between the children of a named person born before the death of the testator and the children of the same person born after the death of the testator would appear to be wholly capricious. I think I might adopt the argument of counsel in Re Clark's Estate (2). KINDERSLEY, V.-C., had decided that the prima facie meaning had to be applied to the gift and counsel submitted

"The Vice-Chancellor's construction gives a most unnatural effect to the will, and ought not to be adopted without necessity. It is most unlikely that in making a disposition in favour of the children of a girl twelve years old, he should intend none to take, except those who were born in his own lifetime."

Counsel added—and this has been a bone of contention ever since—

"The word 'survive' strictly means to live after; JOHNSON'S DICTIONARY: 'Survive'."

The reasons for the decision of the Court of Appeal reversing the decision of the Vice-Chancellor are very shortly stated. KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., says (3 De G.J. & Sm. 115):

"I am of opinion that we may without impropriety hold the words 'who shall survive me' to mean 'who shall be living after me'; and I am not sure that this is not their strictly correct meaning."

TURNER, L.J., concurred. That short judgment stirred up a long history of controversy. Few, if any, of the judges who have subsequently considered this question were prepared to agree with the lords justices that "who shall be living after me" was the strictly correct meaning of the words.

In Re Delany (3), which again, unfortunately, is very shortly reported, CHITTY, J., who was dealing with a similar question, said that (39 Sol. Jo. 468):

"... the common meaning of 'survivor' implied two lives running together. It would be a very forced use of the expression to say that Queen Victoria survived William the Conqueror. In one case—viz., Re Clark (2)—it was held that 'survive' meant 'live after'. With great respect ... that decision was right on the particular will."

So, there is CHITTY, J., disapproving of that part of the judgment of KNIGHT BRUCE, L.J., where he said: "I am not sure that this is not their strictly correct meaning", but none the less approving of the decision. He does not say what in the will seems to him to justify the decision. In fact, there was nothing in the will that had any bearing on the question, but, undoubtedly, CHITTY, J., meant the surrounding circumstances affecting that will.

That is the view which BUCKLEY, J., took of the problem in Re Heath (4). He said (48 Sol. Jo. 416):

"I have been pressed in argument with Re Clark (2), where it was held that the words 'who shall survive me', meant 'who shall live after me', and included all children of the tenant for life whether they were living concurrently with the testator or not. In commenting on that case in Re Delany (3) ... CHITTY, J., said ...", and then he quotes the passage which I have read, and adds (ibid.):

"I think the decision of Re Clark (2) must have been arrived at on the particular facts of that case. The court was struggling to get away from the ordinary meaning of the expression, and did not intend to lay down any general rule that 'survive' means 'live after'."

So, up to this point subsequent judges had disapproved of the proposition that "live after" was strictly the correct meaning of "survive", but had approved of the decision in Re Clark's Estate (2) which, indeed, they could not have overruled. Then came the decision of EVE, J., in Re Sing (5), in which he reached the same conclusion as was reached in Re Clark's Estate (2), but there was in that case a context which the learned judge said largely assisted him. There followed Elliot v. Joicey (1).

A The problem which I have to decide is a very nice one because it is beyond doubt that the approach which the Court of Appeal adopted in Re Clark's Estate (2) is no longer permissible, having regard to the decision of the House of Lords in Elliot v. Joicey (1). On the other hand, Re Clark's Estate (2) stands as a decision of the Court of Appeal. One question is whether it is possible to say that, if the Court of Appeal had adopted what has now been held by the House of Lords to be the right approach, they could have reached the conclusion they reached. A second question is whether, if they had adopted what is now held to be the right approach, they would have reached the conclusion which they did reach. Counsel for the fourth, fifth and eighth defendants propounded a proposition which may well be right, but which does not in the end find favour with me, viz., that once you have got it decided that there is a prima facie meaning for the words "survive me", you have to find a context in the will itself to displace that particular meaning. You must not look for it in the surrounding circumstances alone, and, therefore, Re Clark's Estate (2) is no longer good law. I am not prepared to go so far as that. I am not prepared to say that it is impossible as a matter of law to find enough in the surrounding circumstances to displace the prima facie meaning of the words. On the other hand, I am of the view that, now the prima facie meaning of the words has been so authoritatively determined, more care is required in drawing inferences from the surrounding circumstances than would have been necessary if the words had been held not to have a prima facie meaning. It is that consideration which is going to lead me to my conclusion.

E I have now to examine, first, the context of the will and then the surrounding circumstances to see if there is enough to justify me in departing from the prima facie meaning of the words. The first thing that is plain is that one half of the gift over is, as it stands, nonsense. The words "or if any child of his being a son or sons shall die before attaining the age of twenty-one years" must be erroneous in some respect. That is common ground between the parties. Counsel for the plaintiffs says that, if you read in the word "every" instead of "any", that very much supports his submission. Of course it does, but I am not prepared to do that. It seems to me to be plain that something has gone wrong, but equally it seems to me to be plain that what I have to add depends on the view which I take of the question which I have to decide. If I accepted the contention of counsel for the plaintiffs as to the gift to the children of Captain Hodgson, then I should write in "every", but, if I accept the submission of counsel for the fourth, fifth and eighth defendants, then I should not write in "every", but I should introduce some qualification into the clause. It seems to me that it would be most dangerous in this setting to apply the doctrine of falsa demonstratio to the gift over and then to construe the original gift by reference to the gift over as thus amended. I am not able, therefore, to find any corroboration for the submission of counsel for the plaintiffs in this inept gift over. On the other hand, at the end of this clause there is a gift in which the words "survive me" are certainly used in their ordinary and natural sense. I think counsel for the plaintiffs was disposed to agree that where the reference in the language is to only those sons (and there were already three of them) who were born before the death of the testator could have participated. I think that must be so.

"that son of my said nephew Archibald Sanford Hodgson who shall survive me and first attain the age of twenty-one years absolutely"

Therefore, if I am going to construe the words "who shall survive me" in connection with Captain Hodgson's children in the way in which counsel for the plaintiffs invites me to construe them, I shall undoubtedly be giving a different meaning to the phrase "survive me" in the two places in which it occurs in this same clause. I agree with counsel that that is not conclusive, but it seems to me a strong thing to give a different meaning to the same phrase in two different parts of the same clause. To my mind, that is all that can be extracted from the context in the will, but, such as it is, it is against the plaintiffs.

When I turn to the surrounding circumstances, I come at once to that circumstance which dominates the whole scene and is, indeed, so powerful that I really do not know how I ought to decide this case. Unless I construe these words in an unnatural way, the disposition is extraordinarily capricious, and that, as I see it, is a dominant consideration on the side of the plaintiffs. I can think of no conceivable reason why the testator should have wished to limit his beneficence to the children of a person then a bachelor who happened to be born during his own lifetime. Unfortunately, prima facie at any rate, that is what he has said. So far as the rest of the surrounding circumstances are concerned, they do not seem to me to throw much light on the problem. Counsel for the plaintiffs naturally emphasised the bed-ridden condition of the testator, but there are passages in this will which clearly show, to my mind, that the testator contemplated that he might live for many years after the date of this will. He knew that Captain Hodgson was a bachelor, and yet he talks about his son Harold (Captain Hodgson) dying in his lifetime "without leaving issue". That does seem to me to contemplate that he (the testator) might still be living when Captain Hodgson had married and had had an opportunity of having issue, but, in fact, had had no issue. That, perhaps, is not very strong, but in the last trust for the nephew it seems to me that the testator clearly does visualise that there might be one of the children of his nephew who should attain the age of twenty-one years and yet fail to qualify by reason of predeceasing the testator. That seems to me certainly to contemplate the possibility of a fairly long period ahead before the death of the testator.

I think that in the last resort the question is simply this: Am I entitled to give an unnatural meaning to the words "who shall survive me", because, if I do not do so, the will operates in a most capricious manner. I am not sure what is the right answer to that question, but, on the whole, I think that in a matter of this sort it is the duty of a judge of first instance to tread the conservative path, hoping, perhaps, that a higher court will be able to deal more radically with the situation. Therefore, by a narrow margin I must decide that I have not found anything in the context and not found enough in the surrounding circumstances to enable me to depart from the natural meaning of the words.

Declaration that the phrase "such of the child or children of the said Harold Edward Austen Hodgson who shall survive me" does not include any child or children born after the date of the death of the testator.

COMMISSIONERS OF CUSTOMS AND EXCISE v. POOLS FINANCE (1937) LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), February 25, 26, March 7, 1952.]

Gaming—Pool betting—Duty—Collector appointed by promoters of pool to receive stake money from bettor and pay it to promoters less commission—Duty chargeable on gross amount of stake money received by collector—Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947 (c. 9), s. 6 (1).

The defendants were promoters of football and racing betting pools and had appointed W. as one of their collectors. By the terms of his appointment it was agreed that W. should place with the defendants bets for himself and his "clients" in accordance with the defendants' rules and conditions. It was the duty of W. to supply members of the public wishing to bet with coupons obtained by W. from the defendants. The bettor filled up the coupon and returned it to W. who forwarded it to the defendants. If the bettor won money, the defendants would inform W. who would pay the bettor out of money supplied by the defendants. W. guaranteed to pay the defendants 14s. 6d. in the £ in respect of all bets made with him by bettors without any deduction if a bettor or bettors defaulted in his or their payments. By r. 11: "Coupons issued through a collector will only be accepted if received by us [the defendants] from the collector. It is understood the collector acts solely for the investor, and that winnings will be paid only to him, and that he alone shall be responsible to the investor therefor." The Commissioners of Customs and Excise claimed a declaration that duty under s. 6 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, was chargeable on the full amount of the stake money collected by W. and not on the amount remitted by W. to the defendants, i.e., the stake money less his commission of 5s. 6d. in the £.

HELD: the rules could not be read to contradict the position as between the defendants and W. proved by the evidence which showed that W. was the defendants' agent for the receipt of the bettors' stake money; even if W. was not an agent, the stake money was paid to him as a collector nominated by the defendants to receive it; and, therefore, duty was chargeable on the amount of the stake money paid by the bettors to W. and not on the amount paid by W. to the defendants after the deduction of his commission.

APPEAL by the defendants from an order of McNAIR, J., dated Oct. 24, 1951, whereby he held that the defendants were chargeable under s. 6 (1) of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, with pool betting duty on bets made through one, S. Wood, during the week ending May 8, 1948, calculated on the sum of £43 16s. 11d.

The defendants were at all material times promoters of betting pools, and Wood was employed by them to act as their collector on commission. In the week ending May 8, 1948, members of the public made bets amounting to £53 9s. 9d. on 404 coupons which were remitted by Wood to the defendants.

Wood collected from the bettors in respect of lost bets stake money amounting to £44 13s. 9d., the balance of £8 16s. constituting bad debts. The amount remitted by Wood to the defendants was £39 12s. 4d., i.e., the gross amount of the bets less commission at $17\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., plus 16s. 10d. representing the cost of the coupons. The Commissioners of Customs and Excise claimed that the defendants were chargeable with duty calculated on £43 16s. 11d. (£44 13s. 9d., less 16s. 10d.). The defendants contended that they were only chargeable with duty calculated on the amount remitted to them by Wood, £39 12s. 4d. or, alternatively, that sum less the cost of coupons. McNAIR, J., held that duty was chargeable on the amount of stake money paid to Wood by the unsuccessful bettors and not on the amount remitted by him to the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 7. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The broad issue in this appeal is set out concisely in the first paragraph of the learned judge's judgment, which I will read:

"In this case the Commissioners of Customs and Excise claim against the defendants, Pools Finance (1937) Ltd., a declaration as to their liability for pool betting duty in respect of stake money staked by a number of persons who entered one of the defendants' pools through a collector, one S. Wood. In outline the contest between the parties is whether, as the commissioners contend, the pool betting duty is chargeable on the full amount of the stake money collected by Wood, or whether, as the defendants contend, on the amount remitted by Wood to the defendants."

The defendants are promoters of football and racing pools. As part of the machinery of their business they appointed collectors, of whom a Mr. Wood was one. It will be convenient to state in the first instance the admitted course of business. Bets are made, by those who wish to bet, on coupons. Mr. Wood, as collector, obtained a number of coupons from the defendants. A member of the public who intended to bet could obtain a coupon from Mr. Wood. The latter, under the Paper (Use in Betting Schemes) Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 2247), art. 2, had to make a charge, which he did. The charge was a half-penny. The members of the public who betted were called "clients" by the learned judge and I will adopt this word. The client filled up the coupon and returned it to Mr. Wood. The betting was on credit, so no money was enclosed with the coupon. The stake, the amount of which depended on how the coupon was filled up, was to be remitted later within a week and normally would be enclosed by a regular client with the coupon of the following week. Mr. Wood would forward the coupons to the defendants. If any of the clients won money, the defendants would inform Mr. Wood of the clients' names and addresses and forward the amount of their winnings which would be paid to them by Mr. Wood. With regard to the stakes, the procedure can be made clear by the following figures. Assume in one week that clients had staked £100, Mr. Wood had undertaken with the defendants to pay the defendants the following week 14s. 6d. in the £, that is, $72\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. of the amount staked. If £100 had been staked, he would pay £72 10s. It would appear that in this business there are a number of bad debts. Mr. Wood might receive more or less than £72 10s. He had still to pay £72 10s. This case is concerned with a week's transaction in respect of which Mr. Wood received more than 14s. 6d. in the £. Though the actual figures were different, I will assume for the argument that on the above figures he received £85. The plaintiffs contend that the tax is exigible on £85, the defendants on £72 10s. The learned judge accepted the plaintiffs' contention.

The issue turns on the application of s. 6 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, which provides:

A " (1) There shall be charged on all bets made by way of pool betting, other than bets made by means of a totalisator set up on an approved horse racecourse by or under the authority of the Racecourse Betting Control Board, a duty of excise, to be known as the pool betting duty, equal to ten per cent. of the amount of the stake money paid. (2) The pool betting duty shall be paid, in the case of bets made by means of a totalisator, by the operator, that is to say, the person who (as principal) operates the totalisator, and, in the case of other bets, by the promoter. . . . (4) The supplemental provisions set out in sched. V to this Act shall have effect with respect to the pool betting duty. (5) Bets shall be deemed for the purposes of this section and the said sched. V to be made by way of pool betting whenever a number of persons make bets on terms that the winnings of such of those persons B as are winners shall be, or be a share of, or be determined by reference to, the stake money paid or agreed to be paid by those persons, whether the bets are made by means of a totalisator, or by filling up and returning coupons or other printed or written forms, or otherwise howsoever. (6) In this section and the said sched. V, the following expressions have the meanings hereby respectively assigned to them, that is to say— . . . ' promoter '
 C means, in relation to any pool betting, the person to whom the persons making the bets look for the payment of their winnings, if any."

Various documents were put in, and Mr. Wood gave evidence. The position, as will appear, is not as clear as it might have been. One of the defendants' documents put in, applicable to the pools in question—" National Pools "— was described as " Collectors' Conditions and Instructions." It was a document D drawn up for signature by collectors. Mr. Wood did not sign one of these. He had acted as collector previously for the defendants for a different pool scheme and his appointment for National Pools was oral. It is headed: " Commission including all expenses—Five shillings in the £." Five shillings should admittedly, so far as Mr. Wood is concerned, be 5s. 6d. In so far as the description of the 5s. 6d. as commission may be relevant, it appears in the account kept by the E defendants in respect of Mr. Wood's transactions. The amount bet by the clients is described as " stakes " and the 27½ per cent. as commission. The account then shows the halfpenny per coupon and with that adjustment the amount to be paid, and the amount paid, based on the 72½ per cent. The document further provides that the collector is to send in coupons received by him in any week to reach the defendants not later than 5 p.m. Saturday. A weekly account slip is F to be rendered by the defendants which is to be returned with any further coupons at the week-end with the amount indicated as due for the previous week, that is, the 72½ per cent. with adjustment for the halfpenny per coupon. At the foot is a statement to be signed by the collector of his willingness to act as a collector according to the conditions set out in the document, with a request for a number of coupons to be specified. That document sets out the relation of a collector to G the defendants and, though not signed by Mr. Wood, indicates his position as shown by the course of dealing.

In their defence, and particulars delivered under it, the defendants alleged the terms of their oral agreement with Mr. Wood as follows:

" The said bets were placed in pursuance of an oral agreement made between the said Wood and the defendants' manager acting on behalf of the H defendants at an interview at the defendants' office at the end of April, 1948.
 It was agreed that Wood should as from May 8, 1948, place bets for himself and his clients with the defendants in accordance with their rules and conditions for pools on horse races, that the defendants would supply him with copies of their said rules and conditions and the necessary coupons and would accept his bets, that he should be charged the gross amount of his bets less 5s. 6d. in the £, and that any winnings due to him should be paid to him in due course."

Counsel for the defendants in cross-examination obtained from Mr. Wood an admission that this was correct. This, counsel submitted, brings in rules which we have on a small printed card and which we were told were reproduced on all the coupons. I will read r. 1 and r. 2.

"1. The coupon (which is available to subscribers only) is an entry form governed by these rules in compliance with which it may be completed and submitted to us and on which alone we are prepared to receive it and, if we think fit, to accept it as an entry. 2. It is a basic condition of the sending in and acceptance of the coupon that it is intended and agreed that the conduct of the pools and everything done in connection therewith and all arrangements relating thereto (whether mentioned in these rules or to be implied) and the coupon and any agreement or transaction entered into or payment made by or under it shall not be attended by or give rise to any legal relationship, rights or duties or consequences whatsoever or be legally enforceable or the subject of litigation, but all such arrangements, agreements or transactions are binding in honour only."

Rule 3 deals with clients' remittances. There follow paragraphs of instructions to clients, a paragraph as to division of the pool, and then r. 11 on which counsel for the defendants relies:

"Coupons issued through a collector will only be accepted if received by us from the collector. It is understood the collector acts solely for the investor, and that winnings will be paid only to him, and that he alone shall be responsible to the investor therefor."

The evidence that Mr. Wood accepted these rules as part of his contract with the defendants was not, to my mind, very satisfactory, but I will assume that they are to be looked at in considering the defendants' position in relation to the words of the Act.

The learned judge had no hesitation in deciding that apart from r. 11, Mr. Wood was the defendants' agent. I agree. An agent is a person authorised to act on behalf of another who agrees so to act. Mr. Wood was authorised to distribute the defendants' coupons to clients who wished to make bets with the defendants. The coupons received were to be forwarded to the defendants, who accepted them as bets made with them, on which, if successful, they would pay through Mr. Wood. Mr. Wood was to account for and pay an agreed percentage of the amount staked. His commission was 5s. 6d. in the £, he taking the risk of bad debts. On this basis he was their agent. Does r. 11 affect the position? The learned judge decided that it did not, having regard to r. 2. He held that by reason of that rule the rules could not be read as affecting "the undoubted legal relationship established between the promoters and the collectors by the course of dealing". There is, if I may say so with respect, force in this. In any event, the position as between defendants and collectors is not set out in the rules. There is nothing there about 5s. 6d. in the £, the consideration for which collectors, including Mr. Wood, agreed to act. The rules assume the collector is entitled to issue the defendants' coupons. The rules provide, in effect, that, so far as clients are concerned, the defendants will not consider themselves bound in honour if the collector whom they have appointed fails in his manifest duty to them to pass on the coupons and the stake money. The expression "clients' collector" and the words "the collector acts solely for his clients" may be regarded, perhaps, as merely descriptive of the effect vis-à-vis the clients as I have stated it. They cannot be read as contradicting the position as between the defendants and Mr. Wood as evidenced by the oral agreement and course of dealing. Counsel suggested that the learned judge was proceeding on the basis that an "in honour" document could never be relevant to the application of the taxing section. I do not so read what the learned judge said. It seems to me he was expressing in one sentence what I have, having regard to the argument, expanded into two or three. Reference was made in the course of the argument to a sentence in the "Collectors' Conditions." that the collector was not to be regarded as an employee. These words do not assist the defendants' argument. An agent is not necessarily or usually an employee. I, therefore, agree with the learned judge that Mr. Wood was the defendants' agent. On this finding counsel for the defendants agreed that he must fail.

A We were, however, asked to consider the matter on the basis that this was wrong. The basis then would be that Mr. Wood, though nominated by the defendants and authorised to issue their coupons, and receive them if filled up for transmission, was not their agent quoad, at any rate, the receipt of stake money. I would still myself think that the stake money paid by the clients was stake money paid within s. 6 (1) of the Act of 1947. The stake money was in respect of a bet made by way of pool betting within the definition. The defendants were the promoters of the pool. The stake money was paid to a collector. B nominated by the defendants to receive it. The defendants seek to say that the 72½ per cent. which they receive is the stake money paid on which the duty is exigible, but, as the learned judge said, that is not the amount of the stake money paid, but a sum which the collector has guaranteed to pay whether the stake C money is paid or not. In the week with which we are concerned the stake money paid was in excess of the 72½ per cent. It was suggested on behalf of the plaintiffs that, if it was less, the duty could be exacted on the 72½ per cent. actually paid. This, in my view, cannot be right. The duty falls on the stake money paid and the 72½ per cent. is an irrelevant figure. This conclusion seems to me to carry out the intention of the Act. That intention clearly is (i) that the duty shall not D be paid on bad debts, (ii) that expenses are not deductible. The collector's lot is not a happy one if the stake money paid is less than the 72½ per cent. This happened in a number of weeks to Mr. Wood, who tendered his resignation, be it noted, to the defendants. The arrangement plainly contemplates that the stake money paid will on the average exceed the 72½ per cent. so as to provide, inter alia, for the collector's expenses and remuneration. If the defendants were E right, this excess would, in effect, be deducted, and this seems to me contrary to the intention of the Act. I, therefore, think the appeal should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: If we could disregard the rules set out in the printed form, it would be quite clear that the collector, Mr. Wood, was the agent of the promoters. What, then, is the effect of the rules? The promoters did every- F thing which is usually considered sufficient to make the rules binding on those concerned. They printed them on the coupons which were signed by the investors. They got Mr. Wood to agree to act in accordance with them. But the strange thing is that, if these rules are held to be literally binding, they will produce results which are quite contrary to the law and to the facts. Take r. 2, for instance. It purports to deny legal effect to any of these arrangements, and to deprive the transactions of any legal consequences. I venture to suggest that G this rule cannot be given so wide a scope. It cannot, for instance, stop the operation of the criminal law. Fraudulent conversion of stake money or the forgery of coupons will not go unpunished, despite the statement in the rule that nothing done is to have any legal consequences. Nor can the rule stop the operation of much of the civil law. If a collector has received winnings to pay over to an investor, he must account to the investor for them in an action for H money had and received, notwithstanding the statement in the rule that all transactions are binding in honour only. Likewise, the rule cannot stop the operation of the revenue law. If a collector is, in truth, the agent of the promoters, he remains their agent, despite the statement in the rule that the arrangements do not give rise to any legal relationship. The rule is, no doubt, effective to prevent an investor from suing the promoters at law for his winnings: Jones v. Vernons Pools, Ltd. (1), Appleson v. Littlewood (H.), Ltd. (2). To that extent it does not contradict the law on the facts. It merely puts the transaction on the same footing as a wager. But whenever the rule does contradict the facts or the law, then the truth must prevail over it.

Take now r. 11. It purports to make the collector the agent of the investors and not the agent of the promoters. It says that "the collector acts solely for his clients." This rule, again, goes too far. The true relationship of the parties is to be discovered from the facts, not from this clause. What, in fact, happens is that the promoters appoint a collector to canvass for business. He finds a member of the public whom he persuades to "invest" in the pool. The investor pays his stake money, let us say it is £1, to the collector. The collector then pays the money over to the promoters less 5s. 6d. for his commission. The total receipts form the pool which is distributed to the investors. The promoters reckon the pool as including the full £1 paid by the investor, but they deduct the 5s. 6d. as being part of their own expenses. The 5s. 6d. is the remuneration which they allow the collector for his services in issuing the coupons and obtaining the investments and for his guarantee in respect of bad debts. On those facts I cannot see how the promoters can say that the collector is not their agent. They cannot truthfully say the collector "acts solely for the investors" when they themselves appoint him and pay him. The rule contradicts the facts and is, to that extent, invalid.

This is no new doctrine. In life actions speak louder than words. So they do in law. If a landlord, who is entitled to forfeit a lease, knowingly accepts the rent, then by law he waives the forfeiture, and nothing which he can say by way of protest against the law will avail him anything: Matthews v. Smallwood (3) ([1910] 1 Ch. 786). If a seller of goods by auction warrants by word of mouth that they are sound, he cannot get rid of his liability by setting up an exempting condition which is in the catalogue: Harling v. Eddy (4). If a policy of insurance contains a printed clause which is inconsistent with the objects of the insurance, it is disregarded: Hydarnes S.S. Co. v. Indemnity Mutual Marine Assurance Co. (5). So, here, these conditions cannot, under the cloak of contract, be allowed to speak that which is false. They cannot assert that black is white and expect the courts to believe it. The courts do not willingly go behind the conditions of a contract in this way. They would far rather reconcile the conditions with the transaction as a whole than reject them altogether. But there does sometimes come a point when they must be overridden. We live in days when standardised conditions cover large fields of human activity. They have become a means whereby powerful interests seek to dictate to the public the conditions on which they will do business. The public cannot amend the conditions. They are offered the contract on the terms: "Take it or leave it. Accept my conditions or go without." The conditions thus come to resemble a legislative code applicable to all who take part in the business. They presume to define the relationship of the parties and to prescribe their rights and liabilities. This is, no doubt, to a large extent, permitted by law, but it is subject to important safeguards. The conditions cannot alter the true relationship of the parties, and they are subordinate to any terms expressly agreed between them. There are other safeguards shown in the books, but I do not stay to consider them now. Suffice it to say that r. 2 and r. 11 cannot alter the fact that the collector was the agent of the promoters and not of the investor. The "stake money paid" was the money which was paid by the investors to the collector. It was not the money paid by the collector to the promoters. The appeal must, therefore, be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: The defendants' argument that the collector, Wood, was not their agent, but the agent of the investors, was almost entirely founded on the view that r. 11 of the rules which appear on the coupons constituted a term of the legal relationship which existed between Wood and themselves. I am clearly of opinion (and apart altogether from the effect of r. 2) that this view is quite unjustified. In his evidence Wood said that in May, 1948, he decided to distribute National racing coupons and went to the defendants' office to make arrangements with the manager, Mr. Edwards, for a supply of coupons. He arranged with Mr. Edwards that his position would be a collector for racing coupons as he had been for Empire football coupons and that he should be responsible for all investments incurred and should remit to the defendants 14s. 6d. out of each pound of investments sent in. Counsel then handed to Mr. Wood a print of the defendants' "Collectors' Conditions and Instructions" and said:

"You told us you had been acting for National Pools for football before the racing season? A.—Yes. Q.—For Empire, was it? A.—Empire. Q.—Had you seen a document like the one you have got now? A.—Yes, I have seen one before."

In fact, the form of Collectors' Conditions and Instructions which had been used for the football season by Empire Pools was somewhat different from the form which was handed up to Wood, but for the purposes relevant to this appeal the two forms were substantially the same, and there can, in my judgment, be no reasonable doubt (although the contrary was argued before us) that any collector who—whether or not he signed it—acted on the footing of either of those forms stood in a relationship of agency towards the promoters. In the particulars which the defendants delivered of the oral agreement alleged to have been made between Wood and the defendants' manager, reference was made to the defendants' "rules and conditions for pools on horse races." A copy of these particulars was shown to Wood in cross-examination and he was asked whether they accurately set out the facts and he said they did. After a good many questions on another topic a small document was handed up to him on which were printed twelve paragraphs in very small print. He was told that No. 11 dealt with collectors and was asked whether he was fully acquainted with that document at the time he was acting as a collector in respect of National Pools. He said he remembered the rules and that they were printed both on the coupons and on the small documents (of which he had been shown a print) and on being asked whether he had a great number of documents like that in that form he said:

"I had these to distribute to our clients . . . to the clients we distributed them."

The learned judge found that, although it was not proved affirmatively that Wood signed the "Collectors' Conditions and Instructions" form in connection with the racing pools, it was quite clear that he acted on the basis of it, and that basis was, as I have already indicated, one of agency as between himself and the defendants. It is, to my mind, as obvious that the "Collectors' Conditions and Instructions" form was brought into being by the defendants to regulate the position as between themselves and the collectors as it is that the rules which appear on the coupons and the small document were evolved to order matters as between the defendants and the investors. It would, accordingly, as I think, require fairly clear and unequivocal evidence to show that a collector who was acting on the footing of the former—and appropriate—document must also be taken to have acted on the footing of one condition extracted from the latter—and inappropriate—document. There was, in my judgment, no such evidence in the present case. If the particulars are relied on, the "Rules and Conditions" therein mentioned might well be a reference to the "Collectors' Conditions and Instructions" and the learned judge said in his judgment that he was satisfied that Wood did not fully appreciate the full import of the particulars. As to the little card, Wood was not asked whether he regarded r. 11 as incorporated in his agreement with the defendants, nor did he say that it was. All he said was that he knew the rules and distributed the cards to the persons for whose edification they were obviously printed, namely, the clients. Apart from the questions and answers about the particulars and the cards there is no evidence whatever to suggest that r. 11 played any part in the relationship which existed between the defendants and Wood. I am clearly of the opinion that it did not, and there was nothing in the course of dealing between the promoters, Wood, and the clients to suggest the contrary.

In my judgment, the learned judge was quite right in holding that Wood acted as the defendants' agent in connection with the pool betting transactions in question and, on that view, the appeal accordingly fails. The question of the construction of s. 6 of the Finance (No. 2) Act, 1947, which was argued before us, therefore, does not arise. I desire, however, to express my complete concurrence in the conclusions on that question which my Lord has stated in his judgment.

Appeal dismissed.

CONWAY v. WINGATE AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.J.J.), March 5, 1952.]

Surtax—Inclusion in "income tax"—Covenant by partners to discharge outgoing partner's liability for "income tax".

An outgoing partner in a firm agreed to sell his share in the partnership to an incoming partner. A continuing partner and the incoming partner agreed to discharge "... all liability (including that of the vendor personally) for income tax excess profits tax and property tax of and relating to the said partnership down to the date of these presents ...". In an action by the outgoing partner against the two new partners for a declaration that they were liable to discharge his liability for surtax in respect of his share of the partnership profits,

HELD: although by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 66 (1), supertax was imposed as an "additional duty of income tax" and, therefore, surtax could rightly be described as "additional income tax", it was not income tax "of and relating to the partnership", since it was a liability of the individual partner and not of the firm, and, accordingly, the defendants were not liable to discharge the plaintiff's liability for surtax.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of PARKER, J., dated Nov. 7, 1951, dismissing the plaintiff's claim for a declaration that the defendants were liable to discharge the plaintiff's surtax liability under a covenant to discharge liability for income tax. The plaintiff appealed.

Lloyd-Jones, Q.C., and N. C. Bridge for the plaintiff.

Lincoln, Q.C., and E. K. I. Hurst for the defendants.

SINGLETON, L.J.: For some years from 1936 onwards the plaintiff and the second defendant were in partnership in a business. In 1949 there were differences of opinion between them which were solved by a deed described as "Assignment of share in partnership" and dated Oct. 21, 1949. It was made between the plaintiff, described as the vendor, of the first part, the second defendant, of the second part, and the first defendant, described as the purchaser, of the third part, and it was said to be supplemental to the partnership agreement of Aug. 20, 1936. After certain recitals, cl. 1 of the deed provides for the assignment of the plaintiff's half share of the partnership business to the first defendant. Thus the plaintiff was to go out of the partnership, and in future the partners would be the first and second defendants. Clause 4 of the deed, on which the argument has been based, reads:

A "The purchaser and Mrs. Wingate [the first and second defendants] hereby further jointly and severally covenant with the vendor [the plaintiff] to pay and discharge all the debts and liabilities of the said partnership business subsisting or accruing at the date of these presents and all liability (including that of the vendor personally) for income tax excess profits tax and property tax of and relating to the said partnership down to the date of these presents and shall in respect of all such matters keep the vendor indemnified from all actions proceedings claims demands and liability in respect thereof."

B Under that clause it is claimed by the plaintiff that the defendants are bound to pay to the plaintiff not only the income tax, but also the surtax, payable by him in respect of the amounts derived from his share of the partnership at the relevant times. The statement of claim, having referred to cl. 4 of the deed, sets out:

C " (4) On the said Oct. 21, 1949, the income tax payable by the said partnership for all years of assessment beginning with the year 1945-46 and the surtax payable by the plaintiff for each of those years was unpaid. (5) By virtue of the said clause the defendants are liable to discharge and to indemnify the plaintiff against such proportion of the plaintiff's liability to surtax in respect of the years of assessment 1945-46 to 1950-51 inclusive as his share in the profits of the said business bore to his total income for each of the said years."

D Thus it is said that for six years of assessment the income tax and the surtax of the plaintiff in respect of that income was unpaid, and it is claimed that the defendants are responsible to the plaintiff, not only in respect of the income tax, but also in respect of the surtax. The plaintiff claims:

E "A declaration that the defendants are jointly and severally liable under the deed of Oct. 21, 1949, to discharge and to indemnify the plaintiff against such proportion of his liability to surtax for the years of assessment 1945-46 to 1950-51 inclusive as his share in the profits of the said partnership bore to his total income for each of the said years."

F The plaintiff's claim is based on certain decisions of the courts as to tax on annuities. The one to which our attention was directed mainly is in Re Reckitt (1), in which this court upheld a decision of EVE, J., that an annuity given by the will of a testator "free of tax" was payable free of surtax. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in the course of his judgment in that case, said ([1932] 2 Ch. 148):

G "Now what is super-tax? It was originally imposed by the Finance (1909-10) Act, 1910, s. 66. By sub-s. 1 it is declared that: 'In addition to the income tax charged at the rate of . . . under this Act, there shall be charged, levied, and paid for the year . . . in respect of the income of any individual, the total of which from all sources exceeds' a certain standard, 'an additional duty of income tax (in this Act referred to as a super-tax).'"

H On that decision and those words counsel for the plaintiff submits that the words "income tax" in cl. 4 of the deed which we have to consider include surtax. It is true that in Re Reckitt (1) LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said (ibid., 149):

"I feel myself, therefore, unable to recognise any distinction between income tax and super-tax when construing the words 'income tax', as used in cl. 12 of the testator's will";

but towards the end of his judgment he said (ibid., 151):

"As I have already pointed out, it is not prescribed in what instalments that sum is to be paid. No reference is made to the system of, or the power of the trustees to make, deductions; there is simply a direction that a total sum in each year is to be paid free of income tax. As I have pointed out, super-tax or sur-tax is in essence an additional income tax, and, as there is no indication to restrict the words to income tax as known for so many years, it must follow that freedom is given to the widow in respect of both income tax, as we know it, and the additional income tax which has now been given the name of sur-tax."

ROMER, L.J., said (ibid., 153):

"For the reasons given by the Master of the Rolls it is, in my opinion, clear that, prima facie, the words 'income-tax' include super-tax."

Counsel for the plaintiff draws our attention also to the words of cl. 4, and, in particular, to the words in brackets, "(including that of the vendor personally)".

I will come back to the clause. By the deed:

"The purchaser and Mrs. Wingate hereby further jointly and severally covenant with the vendor to pay and discharge all the debts and liabilities of the said partnership business subsisting or accruing at the date of these presents . . ."

Pausing there, that which the parties are considering is the liability of the partnership—a liability which might fall on the vendor in part unless provision was made for it. The clause continues:

". . . and all liability (including that of the vendor personally) for income tax excess profits tax and property tax of and relating to the said partnership down to the date of these presents and shall in respect of all such matters keep the vendor indemnified from all actions proceedings claims demands and liability in respect thereof."

As counsel for the defendants pointed out, the clause not only contains an undertaking to pay and discharge debts, but gives to the vendor an indemnity from all actions, proceedings, claims, demands and liability in respect thereof.

In the ordinary course a trading partnership is assessed for the purpose of income tax, the assessment is normally made on the firm, and each member of the firm becomes liable to pay the amount of tax due on that assessment according to his share in the firm. The assessment, in the first instance, is on the firm. It is said that, that being so, the words in brackets "(including that of the vendor personally)" can mean nothing but surtax. That was the mainspring of the argument adopted by junior counsel for the plaintiff. It seems to me, however, that these words may have been introduced for more than one reason. It may have been thought it would make the matter clearer, if there was a liability, even though in a sense it was a partnership liability, on the plaintiff and he paid it, that under the indemnity he could recover any amount paid by him, or, if he were sued, he could, perhaps, bring in the other parties to the deed as third parties. I should think that the words probably were introduced from an abundance of caution. With regard to the argument on behalf of the plaintiff that those words can only mean surtax, I find it impossible to believe that that can have been the reason for their introduction in cl. 4. Solicitors were discussing the proposal to assign a half share in the partnership. This deed, we are told, was put forward by the plaintiff's solicitors. If they intended those words to cover surtax, they would have put in the word "surtax". If the words "(including that of the vendor personally)" were put in to cover surtax, I should regard it as a very peculiar proceeding, and I cannot believe that they were.

Let us consider the position of the parties to this contract for a moment. We do not know whether the plaintiff had been paid any share of profits for the last few years or not. We do know that he did not want to pay tax on them if there were any. He may have known what the accounts showed—I expect he did—but the accounts had not been settled with the inspector of taxes. I think it can be taken that the parties, certainly the first defendant (who was manager of the business at the time), would know what the assessment put on the firm by the inspector of taxes was for each relevant year, so he and the second defendant would know the highest liability to income tax that there could be in any year. But if it is said that the deed was intended to cover questions relating to surtax, it is obvious that they could not know the extent of their liability. Each party would know the highest claim which could be made for income tax. The defendants could not know anything as to any claim which might be made for surtax in respect of the plaintiff's income. Whether they knew that the plaintiff was a surtax payer I do not know, but, if he was liable to surtax, they could not have any idea of the amount of his liability thereto. For that reason it is too much to expect one to think that any solicitor would introduce those words "(including that of the vendor personally)" with the idea of covering surtax. The question, however, is one of construction. Does this clause in fact, or in law, cover surtax? The covenant is to pay and discharge the debts and liabilities of the partnership business and all liabilities for income tax, excess profits tax, and property tax of and relating to the said partnership. Income tax, excess profits tax, and property tax arise from the business: surtax has nothing to do with it. True, surtax is, in one sense, an additional income tax, but it is levied on the individual and not on the partnership. Surtax is in no sense a liability of the partnership, nor is it anything that can be said to be covered by the words "of and relating to the said partnership". That by itself leads me to think that surtax was not intended to be covered by a clause which dealt with liability arising out of or related to the partnership business. I accept, I need not say, the reasoning of this court in Re Reith (1). I have drawn attention to the words of LORD HANWORTH, M.R., in which he pointed out that there was in that case no indication to restrict the words to income tax, and to the words of ROMER, L.J., that, prima facie, the words "income tax" include supertax, but in the present clause there is, in my view, something to show that surtax was not intended to be covered. First, the clause deals with partnership matters; secondly, it provides for the discharge of all liability for income tax, excess profits tax and property tax. In respect of income tax there is a liability on the partnership and on the partners. In respect of excess profits tax the liability is on the firm or partnership, and in default of payment by the firm the partners may become liable individually. The same applies to property tax. But I cannot conceive that, if these parties intended to cover surtax, they would not have included surtax in this clause, when they do, in fact, mention three separate heads—income tax, excess profits tax and property tax. The setting out of those three items appears to me to be an indication that only those items were covered, and that surtax was not intended to be included. I cannot think that in circumstances such as these an unknown liability would have been undertaken by the defendants—not, at least, without some inquiry, and there is nothing to show that there ever was any.

My view on this case is formed on the clause itself. PARKER, J., was of opinion that the plaintiff had not established his claim. In that I think he was right, and that this appeal ought to be dismissed. I should add that the claim to a declaration made by the plaintiff is in respect of "such proportion of his liability to surtax . . . as his share in the profits of the said partnership business bore to his total income for each of the said years."

The proportionate claim which is made is based on the judgment of SARGANT, J., in Re Bowring (2). In that case various annuities had to be considered, and the question arose as to the manner in which surtax (then supertax) should be borne. Various ways were put forward as to how the liability should be borne. SARGANT, J., said ([1918] W.N. 265):

"An intermediate course, in favour of which he should give judgment, was that the super-tax should be charged rateably as between the outside income on the one hand and the £4,000—increased, of course, by the fact that that was free of income tax . . ."

SARGANT, J.'s, decision related to what was the fair and right way to deal with the supertax on certain annuities. Counsel for the plaintiff said in the present case that his client had sought to adopt the same course in order likewise to be fair and not to ask for too much. But it seems to me, on the terms of the claim to an indemnity, that, if the plaintiff is right and income tax includes surtax, it is open to him (the plaintiff) to say: "I paid my 1945-46 surtax a good many years ago. Now I get some more income you have agreed to indemnify me not only against income tax, but also surtax. In the result I have to pay more surtax, and my indemnity means that you must pay at the highest rate at which I have to pay." The indemnity would cover that, I am inclined to think, and there is no reason why the plaintiff should be so moderate in his demand, as he is, if he is right. However, it is unnecessary to say more as the claim fails.

BIRKETT, L.J.: I agree.

MORRIS, L.J.: I agree. Under cl. 4 the vendor is given an indemnity against all liability for income tax, excess profits tax, and property tax of and relating to the partnership. The partnership, as such, is not liable to surtax. I consider, therefore, that, having regard to the context, there is a clear indication that the phrase "income tax" is used in its limited sense and not as including surtax. As to the words "(including that of the vendor personally)", I think that, whether they were strictly necessary or not, they were inserted to make it clear that the vendor was protected at all times from liability for income tax, excess profits tax, and property tax of and relating to the partnership, and that this protection applied even if, on a failure to pay, some kind of demand was made on him personally.

Appeal dismissed.

HAMER v. CUNARD WHITE STAR, LTD. THE QUEEN MARY.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P.), February 18, March 3, 1952.]

Costs—Taxation—Money recovered by widow—Re-marriage after writ issued—R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11).

A By R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (1): "In any cause or matter in the King's Bench Division and in any Admiralty action in the Probate, Divorce and Admiralty Division in which money or damages is or are claimed . . . no settlement or compromise or payment or acceptance of money paid into court . . . shall . . . be valid without the approval of the court or a judge." By r. 14 (9): "The provisions of this rule shall also apply to . . . money which under [the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908] is recovered by or adjudged to be paid to the widow of the person killed . . . " By r. 14 (11): "The costs of the plaintiff . . . in any such cause or matter . . . shall be taxed by the taxing master, or, if such cause or matter is proceeding in a district registry, by the district registrar . . . "

C On Jan. 20, 1950, the plaintiff, as administratrix and sole beneficiary of her deceased husband, issued a writ in the Admiralty Court against the defendants claiming damages in respect of his death under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934. On Mar. 25, 1950, the plaintiff re-married and on May 28, 1951, the writ was amended accordingly. The defendants admitted liability subject to a reference to the registrar to assess the amount of the damages. The registrar's report was accepted by both parties, but the D defendants objected to taxation of the plaintiff's costs under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11).

HELD: the plaintiff, having re-married, was not "the widow of the person killed" within the meaning of R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (9), and, therefore, there could be no order to tax the plaintiff's costs under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11).

E Dictum of MORTON, L.J., in Re Embleton ([1946] 2 All E.R. 544), applied.

Per LORD MERRIMAN, P.: "Though the question is not strictly before me . . . I would say that this decision equally applies to the question of the damages awarded to the plaintiff [under the Fatal Accidents Acts] being paid into court. In my opinion, the court has no discretion to control the money awarded to the plaintiff in circumstances such as these."

G SUMMONS adjourned into court.

The plaintiff, as administratrix, issued a writ in respect of the death of her husband under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, against the defendants who admitted liability subject to a reference to the registrar to assess the amount of the claim. In his report the registrar assessed the damages at £1,148, being £500
H under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, £628 under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and £20 as special damages. This report was accepted by both parties, and the plaintiff's solicitors submitted a draft consent order incorporating a clause providing for the taxation of the costs of the action. The defendants objected to this clause on the ground that, as the plaintiff had re-married before the registrar's report, R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11), did not apply. The parties came before the registrar who referred the matter to the President.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 3. LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a summons which was referred to me by the registrar because it was thought to raise a question of principle which may affect other similar cases. It is one of the claims arising out of the collision between the Queen Mary and the Curaçoa, and it was brought by the plaintiff as administratrix of her deceased husband. The claim was under two heads, for damages under the Fatal Accidents Act, 1846, and the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and it is important to notice that the sole beneficiary is the plaintiff herself. She is not suing on behalf of any other dependants under Lord Campbell's Act, still less any dependant who is an infant. The writ in the action is dated Jan. 20, 1950, but, on Mar. 25, 1950, the plaintiff re-married. At that time there had been no reference to the registrar regarding the amount of her claim, which was not disputed, nor, of course, had there been any order for costs.

By R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (9), which is one of the provisions dealing with infants and persons under a disability, it is provided as follows:

"The provisions of this rule shall also apply to all actions in which damages are claimed or recovered by or on behalf of or adjudged or ordered or awarded or agreed to be paid to an infant or person of unsound mind under the Fatal Accidents Acts, 1846 to 1908, and also to money which under those Acts is recovered by or adjudged to be paid to the widow of the person killed as they apply to money recovered by or adjudged or ordered to be paid to an infant. Where such proceedings are taken by or for the benefit of more than one person and the amount recovered is to be divided amongst such persons, the judge or jury as the case may be shall divide and apportion the share to be paid to each of the said persons and the amount so apportioned shall be specified in the order or judgment made or directed in the High Court."

The important phrase is "to money which under those Acts is recovered by or adjudged to be paid to the widow of the person killed." As I have already said, the latter part of that rule does not arise, because there is no person interested in this amount other than the plaintiff herself. I was assured that it was impossible to distinguish in any way the costs incurred in this matter as between the claim under Lord Campbell's Act and that under the Act of 1934 and I can well understand that that must be so, but, so far as the Law Reform damages are concerned, sub-r. (9) does not apply at all. On Dec. 11, 1951, the registrar made his report on the claim, and he awarded £500 under the Law Reform Act, £628 under the Fatal Accidents Act, and £20 special damages. On that award this summons came before him asking that the £520 be paid to the solicitors acting for the plaintiff, that the £628 be paid into court, and that the plaintiff's costs be taxed in accordance with R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11). I need not, I think, read sub-r. (11). Suffice it to say there is abundant authority that, if the rule applies at all, taxation of costs is mandatory. If the plaintiff is not subject to the rule, she can, as can any other plaintiff sui juris, make any arrangement she likes about costs incurred in her claim under the Fatal Accidents Acts. On that summons being served on the defendants' solicitors, they took exception to the paragraph about taxation, and struck it out. The plaintiff's solicitors reinstated it, and so the matter arose.

The question is whether sub-r. (9) and sub-r. (11) of R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14, apply at all at this stage when, though the plaintiff was a widow when the action started, she had ceased to be a widow at the relevant time. There is no direct authority, but there is a very strong indication of the way in which this question ought to be decided in a decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Embleton (1). In that case an infant had recovered a sum of money which was transferred to the county court under the County Courts Act, 1934, s. 164, to be dealt with for his benefit. Having come of age, the infant applied for payment out to him of the whole fund, and the Court of Appeal held that, since the infant was no longer under a legal disability, the court had no power over the fund. MORTON, L.J., giving the judgment of the court, said ([1946] 2 All E.R. 544):

“ In s. 164 (3) the provisions of the section are applied to money ‘ adjudged or ordered to be paid to the widow of the person killed ’ . . . In my view, the application . . . to the case of a widow would be that the words ‘ [the money . . . shall . . . be invested] for the benefit of the person to whom the order relates ’ mean for the benefit of a person already described, namely, a person who is the widow of the person killed, and when the person in question ceases to answer that description the discretion ceases also. Thus, if the widow re-married, she would be entitled to have the money paid out to her. That case is not before us, but it seems to me that that result must logically follow.”

It is, of course, true that the observations of MORTON, L.J., are obiter as regards the present case, but they form so integral a part of the reasoning on which that case was decided, that I would hesitate long before dissenting, even if I disagreed with them. As I entirely agree with them, I accept them gladly.

I think that the defendants are right and that it is not necessary for the plaintiff to tax her costs which only accrue under an order made some eighteen months or more after she ceased to be a widow, and, therefore, the paragraph relating to taxation of costs must be struck out. Though the question is not strictly before me, as I am asked by counsel, I would say that this decision equally applies to the question of the damages awarded to the plaintiff being paid into court. In my opinion, the court has no discretion to control the money awarded to the plaintiff in circumstances such as these. The order, therefore, will be that all the money awarded to the plaintiff by the registrar will be payable to her solicitors, on their receiving authority from her, and that the paragraph relating to the mandatory taxation will be struck out.

Order accordingly.

JEFFREY v. JEFFREY.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.), March 4, 5, 1952.]

Variation of Settlement—Application by wife for maintenance—Desirability of both applications being heard together—New circumstances arising after hearing in court below—Consideration by Court of Appeal.

In 1936 the parties entered into a deed of separation by which the husband covenanted to pay to the wife during their joint lives and dum casta the sum of £275 a year free of tax. At that time he was earning £1,500 a year, and the wife had no means. In 1946 the husband's income was reduced to £450 a year, his capital being some £2,500. On Dec. 9, 1949, the wife, having instituted divorce proceedings on the ground of the husband's adultery, applied for an order for maintenance, but her application still remained to be heard. On Jan. 9, 1950, the wife obtained a decree nisi. On May 25, 1950, the husband applied to vary the deed by extinguishing his liability to pay under it. On July 7, 1950, the decree was made absolute. In April, 1951, the registrar recommended a variation of the terms of the deed by a reduction of the annual payments to £75 less tax, without prejudice to the wife's right to obtain maintenance, and this report was confirmed by COLLINGWOOD, J. Subsequently the husband was appointed as managing director of a company at a salary of £1,250 a year.

HELD: where the Court of Appeal was exercising a discretionary remedy and the question was what justice required to be done between two parties for an indefinite period of time, as distinct from a case in which the question was what was the right of a particular party at the time when he issued his proceedings, the court must have regard to new circumstances arising since the hearing in the court below; in the present case the new circumstances struck at the basis of the decision in the courts below; the function and the duty of the court was to see that proper provision was made for the wife by her former husband from one source or another, and the court should deal with the application for variation and the application for maintenance at the same time; and, therefore, the case would be remitted for further consideration.

Decision of COLLINGWOOD, J. ([1951] 2 All E.R. 805), reversed.

APPEAL by the wife from a decision of COLLINGWOOD, J., dated Oct. 10, 1951 and reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 805, confirming the report of Mr. Registrar FORBES that the payments due under a deed of separation should be reduced from £275 a year free of tax to £75 a year less tax without prejudice to the wife's right to obtain maintenance.

J. B. Gardner for the wife.

Petrie for the husband.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHERD, M.R.: This appeal raises the question whether the court should vary a deed of separation which was entered into by the parties to the appeal in 1936, a long time before the divorce proceedings in which, on the petition of the wife, a decree absolute was eventually pronounced against the husband on the ground of his adultery. There is no question that such a deed is properly treated as a post-nuptial settlement within the terms of the Matrimonial Causes Acts, and there is no question but that the court has jurisdiction to vary such a deed even at the suit of the guilty husband in the divorce proceedings. If authority be needed for the latter proposition it is sufficiently to be found in the judgment of this court in Johnson v. Johnson (1). That also was a case in which a deed of separation had been entered into between the two spouses whose marriage was eventually dissolved on the wife's petition alleging adultery against the husband. The particular problem there arose because there had been a considerable lapse of time before the husband applied to vary the deed, and in the meantime not only had he himself re-married, but his former wife had also re-married. In his judgment which was assented to by the other two members of the court DENNING, L.J., said ([1949] 2 All E.R. 248):

"It is plain that this separation deed was a post-nuptial settlement which the court has power to vary under the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, s. 192. Settlements of this kind are always subject to variation by order of the court in the event of the marriage being dissolved: see Tomkins v. Tomkins (2)."

Counsel for the wife in the present case has not challenged the existence of the jurisdiction, though he has pointed out that the variation of any settlement which results in benefit to a guilty husband is not a variation which the court lightly makes—to which, perhaps, one might add that no variation of a deed solemnly entered into is lightly made.

The deed in suit was entered into in 1936. Both husband and wife had then fallen apart, and the occasion of the making of that deed was, in fact, the presentation of a petition by the wife for judicial separation on the ground of cruelty. Those proceedings were settled, and one of the terms of the settlement was the execution of this deed. Like all such deeds it proceeded on the footing that the husband and wife would remain married, though living apart, so that there were contained in it the usual covenants, for example, against molestation. The relevant financial provision is as follows:

"The husband shall during the joint lives of himself and the wife so long as the wife shall perform and observe the covenants on her part herein contained and so long as she shall remain chaste pay to the wife an annual allowance which after the deduction of income tax thereon and a due proportion of supertax when the husband is liable to pay the same at the standard rates for the time being in force will yield to the wife the clear sum of £275 per annum."

When the divorce proceedings supervened more than ten years later the situation of the husband was financially less happy than it had been in 1936, and after the decree nisi he issued the present application for variation of this deed. In all the circumstances it is not surprising that the wife strongly resented that application. She applied to PEARCE, J., for the substitution, for a decree dissolving the marriage, of a decree for judicial separation. PEARCE, J., did not accede to that request: see [1950] 2 All E.R. 449. The decree became absolute and there was no appeal from the order of PEARCE, J. Later, the husband re-married. The wife has not re-married. The ages of the two parties are, in the case of the husband sixty-two or sixty-three years, and in the case of the wife fifty-eight or fifty-nine. Before the issue of the summons to vary the deed there had also been set on foot by the wife an application for maintenance on the footing that the marriage was to be dissolved. The present appeal, being an appeal from the order made on the husband's application to vary, has come before us independently of the wife's application for maintenance, which is still pending and has never been heard, and for reasons which I shall show I think that is a very material circumstance—and, I think, an unfortunate one.

The deed, as I have said, provided for payment, during the joint lives only, of a sum which I may, for convenience, call £275 free of tax. Having regard to the date and to the intervention of certain well-known legislation in relation to these matters, the result has been to impose on the husband an obligation during the joint lives at the present rate of tax to pay a sum of about £340 per annum. At the date of the deed the husband (who was then fifteen years younger) was enjoying an earned income of over £1,500 a year. When the matter came before the registrar the evidence showed that, taking an average of three years, his income had been reduced to no more than £450 a year.

Proceeding on that premise, the registrar thought that in justice the deed should be varied by reducing the figure from £275 a year free of tax to £75 a year subject to tax. So large a variation would be startling if it were not pointed out in the registrar's report and the judge's judgment that the order reducing the figure was made without prejudice to the wife's right, as the petitioner in the divorce proceedings, to obtain maintenance, including secured maintenance. The registrar took the view that the just thing to do was to leave the amount of the husband's earnings to be, so to speak, the subject-matter from which maintenance could be ordered. An order for maintenance may be varied from time to time, so the court could adjust the sum payable for maintenance according as his earned income increased or diminished. The registrar thought that under the deed of separation there should only be paid such a sum as might be taken to represent the earnings of the invested capital of the husband. At that time the figure of such invested capital was £2,500, and on a three per cent. basis he thought it would be right, therefore, to substitute for the £275 free of tax £75 less tax as being the sum that that invested capital could fairly be expected to earn. I think that that method of calculating the just sum is open to this criticism. I have drawn attention to the fact that the deed of separation provided for payment to be made, not during the life of the wife, but only during the joint lives of the parties, and, that being so, the existence of this particular sum of capital may be said not to have been the vital consideration. If the covenanted sum were treated as payable during the wife's life, then, bearing in mind the possibility, and, indeed, having regard to the ages it might be said the probability, that the husband would be the first to die, it would be appropriate to look to the capital as the source from which the covenanted sum could be provided after the husband's death. In any case, since the date when the matter was before the judge further evidence has come to light. It appears, indeed, that it may have come to the knowledge of the legal representatives of both parties before the judgment was delivered by COLLINGWOOD, J. He delivered a reserved judgment on Oct. 10, 1950, having completed the hearing in July. The new facts to which I am about to allude were unknown to the judge and to the registrar, when they decided the matter according to what, on the facts before them, they thought justice required.

The new facts are that the husband has obtained a position as the managing director of a company at a salary of £1,250 a year. It is true that some deduction may have to be made from that gross sum in arriving at the actual annual income which the husband will have to spend, but, to my mind, it is beyond question that the new situation resulting from that appointment is inconsistent with that which I think to have been the basis on which the registrar and the judge decided to vary the deed of separation by reducing the sum payable under it to £75 a year gross. The question has been debated whether on this appeal this court ought to take into account these new facts, but where the court is exercising a discretionary remedy and the question is what justice requires to be done between these two parties for an indefinite period of time, as distinct from a case in which the question is what was the right of a particular party at the time that he issued his proceedings, I feel no doubt that the court must have regard on appeal to the new circumstances, and, because they have struck at the basis of the decisions in the courts below, as well as because I have felt doubtful of the propriety of relating the £75 to the produce of the capital in the circumstances, I have myself come to the conclusion that the decision in favour of the husband represented by the variation I have already mentioned ought not to stand.

A During the course of the argument picturesque phraseology has at times been used. It has been urged by counsel for the wife, that, in exercising the power to vary a settlement in circumstances such as these, the court should, prima facie, leave matters as they are because otherwise the court is, so to speak, rewarding the guilty husband for his infidelity, and that, if the result of divorce proceedings in the present case has been so much to depreciate the wife's financial position, that is something which on the face of it seems wrong. I am not very
B greatly moved by that particular consideration. One need not say that the court would not, on this or any other application, take steps which could only fairly be characterised as rewarding an adulterer for his adultery. On the other hand, the function of the court (and I am, I think, reflecting the language of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Tomkins v. Tomkins (2)), is not to punish an adulterer for his adultery. The function of the court in such a case as this is to see that
C a wife who has been the petitioner in a divorce suit is fairly provided for out of such resources as the husband has and as are fairly applicable to make provision for her.

That brings me at once to the close relationship which, I think, should be preserved in matters of this kind between what should be ordered for maintenance and what order should be made by way of variation of a post-nuptial settlement.

D If reference is made to the few cases in the books in which variations of this kind have been made, it will be seen that they are linked with orders for maintenance. Let me take, first, Reid v. Reid (3), in which under a deed of separation a wife had been in receipt of a sum of 25s. a week. Counsel for the wife drew attention to the language of LORD MERRIVALE, P., in that case, indicating the paucity of precedents for variation, at the instance of a guilty party, of a settlement consisting of a deed of separation. The force of that generality is, I think, somewhat qualified when you observe that at the end of the judgment the President directed maintenance at the rate of 25s. a week, but at the same time imposed on the wife the obligation that, so long as she received that maintenance, she should not enforce the deed of separation. If, therefore, I am right in putting the matter as I have done—that the function and duty of the court is to see
E that in such a case as this the wife has proper provision made for her from one source or another by her former husband—it is highly important (I had almost said essential, though there may be cases in which it is not practicable for the two things to come on together) that the court should deal with both matters at the same time. The registrar and the judge obviously proceeded on the assumption that some appropriate order would be made on the wife's application for
G maintenance, and, if the application for maintenance had come on first, I doubt not that the court, in ordering maintenance, would have had to make some assumption in regard to what would continue to be payable under the deed of separation. It seems to me far more satisfactory, where it is possible (as it was here), instead of dealing with them separately, to deal at the same time with both applications and to decide what should be paid under an order for H maintenance and to what extent, if at all, the deed of separation ought to be varied.

Counsel for the wife has pointed out that the great advantage to the wife of preserving rights under the deed of separation is that, once varied on this occasion, they then remain continuous for the period during which the deed is expressed to operate. They are not liable to further variation. There is, therefore, that security which comes from the certainty that the deed goes on until by its terms it comes to an end. If the deed can be varied at all, I think it is a circumstance that ought to be considered by the court whether it is right that its terms should be limited to the joint lives. Having expressed the view that I have in regard to the new circumstances and having regard to the great desirability of these matters being heard together, it will follow that I think the order so far made should be set aside and that this matter should be referred back to the Divorce Division so as to be heard together with the wife's application for maintenance. The court can then decide the matter in the light of the facts as they now are or may ultimately emerge as the result of further discovery or cross-examination. The court will, no doubt, consider the point I have mentioned as to the duration of this deed of separation. I would add this. Whatever view one may take of the conduct of either of these parties from 1936 onwards, it is important to note that the deed of separation was entered into on a certain assumption, namely, that these two parties would remain married, but would live apart, and that the provision made by the deed was to be the limit of the husband's liability to his wife. Whatever her motives may have been, the wife in point of fact, by an act entirely voluntary on her part, destroyed the basis on which this document was entered into and substituted for the state of facts on the basis of which the deed was entered into a new state of facts which involved the right for her to go to the court and seek maintenance dehors this deed. It is not to be forgotten that the obligations of the husband to pay under the deed were limited to the performance by the wife of various covenants—a covenant against molestation, a covenant to remain chaste, and other matters which can have but little significance today—and I have already alluded to the term of the deed as being one for joint lives in any case. I, therefore, think that in the circumstances the proper order for this court to make is to set aside the order varying the separation deed in the way I have indicated and to refer the matter of the husband's application for variation back to the court below to be heard and disposed of together with the wife's application for maintenance, which I assume, of course, she is intending to prosecute with proper diligence.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. As appears from Johnson v. Johnson (1), the court has jurisdiction to vary a deed such as this even in favour of a guilty husband. The question, therefore, is whether, in all the circumstances of this case, any, and if so, what, reduction should be made in the sum covenanted to be paid. The evidence now before the court as to the husband's present circumstances destroys the essential basis of fact on which the registrar reported and on which the judge confirmed the registrar's report. As I am clearly of opinion that the evidence as to the husband's present circumstances ought to be taken into account in this appeal, it follows, in my view, that the present order cannot stand and the matter must be re-considered in the light of the husband's circumstances as they now are. I think it is impossible to deal satisfactorily with the question of variation in relation to a deed of covenant such as this except in conjunction with the whole question of the wife's maintenance. The object of the court must be to see that the wife is adequately provided for having regard to the means of both parties and all the circumstances of the case. I do not see how that end can be satisfactorily achieved if the husband's obligation under a deed of separation like the present deed is considered as a separate and distinct matter from the whole question of maintenance. The proper course, therefore, would be that which my Lord has proposed, namely, to discharge the learned judge's order and send this matter back with a direction that it should be dealt with at the same time as the wife's application for maintenance.

HODSON, L.J.: The application to the court in this case was made by a husband who had been divorced on the ground of his adultery, the application being made under s. 25 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1950, which provides:

"The court may after pronouncing a decree for divorce . . . inquire into the existence of . . . settlements made on the parties whose marriage is the subject of the decree, and may make such orders with reference to the application . . . of the property settled either for the benefit of the children of the marriage or of the parties to the marriage, as the court thinks fit."

A It cannot be doubted that there is jurisdiction, on the plain language of the section, to entertain an application by a respondent who has been found guilty of adultery, but the matter has been put before the court on behalf of the wife, if not as a matter of law, at any rate as a matter of principle, that the court should not, as it were, reward a guilty party who has been divorced by enabling him to escape from the contractual obligations which he freely entered into with his wife while the marriage was subsisting—obligations which he could not otherwise have escaped. On the other hand, the wife, whether urged by her husband or not, nevertheless instigated the proceedings and altered the situation between herself and her husband. Once she destroyed the marriage by obtaining a divorce she enabled the jurisdiction to be invoked and enabled the court to regulate the financial position as between herself and her husband as the court thought fit. I am bound to say that I think that it is not easy for a man in this position and on these bare facts successfully to achieve the object I have mentioned. As LORD MERRIVALE, P., pointed out in Reid v. Reid (3) ([1926] P. 3):

C "the records of the court will be searched in vain for any instance where the court at the instance of a guilty party has varied or annulled the settlement in his favour."

D On the other hand, as appears from Johnson v. Johnson (1), a decision of this court, such an application was entertained by the court and the husband succeeded, although in that case there was the important additional fact that the wife had re-married. The order in question here, I think, was arrived at in an unsatisfactory manner. Apart from the change in circumstances which necessitates the matter going back for re-hearing, it was impracticable to endeavour to deal with the question of variation independently of that of maintenance. Where

E the object of the variation of a settlement is to alter the amount of the financial provision for children or a wife who is applying for maintenance, it seems to me to be essential that the two matters should be dealt with together. Otherwise, difficulties such as have arisen in this case must necessarily arise. The registrar, in fixing the amount which he thought ought to be substituted for the amount provided for in the covenant contained in the deed of separation, had in mind an

F affidavit put in by the husband in the maintenance proceedings in which he stated his average profit from his business over the last three years as £450. That profit had never been investigated. It was merely extracted from a summary of profits and losses as agreed with the inspector of taxes. The wife had never had an opportunity—perhaps through her own fault, as she had not proceeded with the application for maintenance up to that time—of arguing whether the

G deduction allowed against profits by the Commissioners of Inland Revenue was properly to be allowed against the husband in considering what were his available means for her support. The £75 was fixed by the registrar as if he were considering what would be a proper provision to be made for the wife for her life, because he based it on a calculation of the productivity of the husband's investments, whereas what he was considering was what was a reasonable sum to be

H paid to the wife during their joint lives. In any event, therefore, I think that this order must be re-considered, and I agree that the matter should go back for investigation at the same time as the wife's application for maintenance.

STRAND ELECTRIC AND ENGINEERING CO., LTD. v. BRISFORD ENTERTAINMENTS, LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), February 28, March 14, 1952.]

Detinue—Damages—Measure—Detention of goods normally let out on hire—Owner entitled to reasonable hiring charge.

Where a defendant has detained and used a chattel of the plaintiff which the plaintiff, as part of his business, hires out to users, the measure of damages in an action for the detinue of the chattel is a reasonable sum for the hire of the chattel during the period of the detention.

The defendants, who were negotiating for the sale of a theatre to B.T., Ltd., having allowed that company to go into possession before completion, the plaintiffs, in the ordinary course of their business, hired to B.T., Ltd. portable switch-boards to control the stage lighting of the theatre. B.T., Ltd., being unable to complete the purchase of the theatre, informed the plaintiffs that they were willing to return the equipment to them, but were prevented from doing so by the defendants who had taken possession of the theatre. The plaintiffs demanded from the defendants the return of the equipment, but the defendants retained possession of it. On the question of damages,

HELD: the plaintiffs were entitled to a sum representing a reasonable charge for the hire of the goods from the date on which the defendants took possession of them to the date of the return of the goods.

APPEAL by the plaintiffs from an order of PILCHER, J., dated Nov. 16, 1951, in an action in detainue.

The plaintiffs, who were suppliers of electrical apparatus, claimed the return of certain switch-boards, their property, which, they alleged, the defendants had wrongfully detained, and, alternatively, the sum of £714, the value of the goods, and £401 6s. 8d. damages for their detention for forty-three weeks. The defendants denied liability. PILCHER, J., held that the defendants had wrongfully detained the equipment and made an order for its return. In assessing damages for its detention, he deducted a period of a month as a reasonable time for the defendants to investigate their position, considered what the plaintiffs might have realised by hiring out the equipment if it had been returned at the proper time, and awarded £200. The plaintiffs appealed against this assessment of damages.

Caplan for the plaintiffs.

I. S. Warren for the defendants.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 14. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an appeal from a judgment of PILCHER, J., in a claim in detainue. The learned judge found for the plaintiffs, and this is an appeal by the plaintiffs who submit that in awarding damages for the detention the learned judge applied the wrong principle.

In 1949 the defendants were negotiating for the sale by them of a theatre to Bedford Theatre (London), Ltd. That company was allowed to go into possession before completion. Under a contract made by it with the plaintiffs, the plaintiffs lent to the Bedford Theatre company certain portable switch-boards. This was done pending the manufacture and installation by the plaintiffs of permanent switch-boards. No hire was charged in the first instance, but, as the Bedford Theatre company failed to take delivery of the permanent switch-boards when made, but desired to retain the portable switch-boards, it was agreed that as from Jan. 1, 1951, the company should pay the plaintiffs' usual charge which was £9 6s. 8d. per week. The hiring out of the portable switch-boards was a normal, though minor, part of the plaintiffs' business. On Jan. 12, 1951, the company wrote the following letter to the plaintiffs:

"This is to inform you that Bedford Theatre (London), Ltd. ceased responsibility as regards the hire articles from Saturday night, Jan. 6, when the theatre was closed and wished to return the equipment on hire to you. Although my company is allowed access to the theatre the vendor's agent who took possession of the theatre on Monday, Jan. 8, has given instructions that nothing whatsoever must be removed. We, therefore, disclaim any responsibility for hire equipment in the theatre as from when the vendor's agent took possession."

The vendor referred to is the defendant company.

Between January and March, 1951, the plaintiffs wrote a number of letters to the defendants demanding the return of their property, but received neither their property nor any satisfactory answer. The writ was issued on Mar. 7, 1951, claiming the return of the property or its value and damages for its detention. The defendants disputed liability up to the trial. The learned judge held that the plaintiffs were entitled to succeed. He made an order for the return of the goods, or, alternatively, for a sum of £714, their value. There is no appeal on this part of his judgment. With regard to damages he assessed them at £200. From that decision the plaintiffs appeal on the ground that the learned judge went wrong in law. Damages were claimed for detention for forty-three weeks. The learned judge deducted a period of a month as a reasonable time for the defendants to investigate the situation and consider their position. Counsel for the plaintiffs submits that on the other findings of the learned judge this was wrong.

The main contest turned on the learned judge's basis for assessing damages. What he did was this. He considered what sum the plaintiffs might have been expected to realise by hiring out these switch-boards if they had been returned when they should have been. He took into account the fact that of some eighty switch-boards of this kind owned by the plaintiffs about seventy-five per cent. were out on loan or hire at any one time, that not infrequently (as here) they were hired gratis for a period, that in other cases there was a forty per cent. reduction from the £9 6s. 8d., and that the switch-boards might have been accidentally destroyed. The full figure for thirty-nine weeks at £9 6s. 8d. a week was between £350 and £400. The learned judge awarded £200.

If this had been a case where the plaintiffs had been deprived of the use of their switch-boards because they had been damaged by the negligence of the defendants, the principles applied by the learned judge would, I think, have been right. It is, however, submitted that in a claim in detinue, and one in which the defendants have used a profit-earning chattel, they must pay by way of damages a fair sum for that user. They cannot as wrongdoers have the use of the chattels for less than a fair price for their hire. Otherwise they would be benefiting by their own wrong. It is curious that there is no authority on the point. Before considering it I will deal with the learned judge's finding on user. The learned judge found that the defendants did not want to let the plaintiffs remove their apparatus from the theatre because without it the theatre could not be let or sold. The theatre was not, over the relevant period, being used as a theatre, but a prospective purchaser or lessee would presumably want to see, and, if the theatre was taken, to operate, the stage lighting. The learned judge found that the defendants were determined not to let the plaintiffs have their switch-boards for the reason that without the switch-boards the theatre was virtually useless. From the facts to which I have referred permanent switch-boards to replace the plaintiffs' might take some time to obtain. Later in his judgment the learned judge said that there was no evidence of "commercial user", though he did not regard that as important. He was, no doubt, referring to the fact that the theatre was not used as a theatre. The findings must be read together, and, to my mind, the conclusion is that the defendants "used" the plaintiffs' articles. There may be a distinction in the measure of damage in detinue between, say, a warehouseman who merely stores and a person who during the period of detention enjoys the beneficial use of the chattels. It is the latter case with which we are concerned.

Both counsel referred to The Mediana (1) and sought to support their arguments by dicta from the speech of the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C. In that case the respondents' lightship was damaged in a collision by the negligence of the appellants. The respondents were a harbour board and in their hands the lightship was not a profit-earning asset. They had a spare lightship and did not have to hire a substitute during the period the lightship was out of action as the result of the collision. It was argued, therefore, that under this head they could recover only nominal damages. They had suffered no loss. The House of Lords held that the case was governed by their earlier decision in The Greta Holme (2) and that the plaintiffs were entitled to substantial damages. In the course of the argument for the appellants that nominal damages only could be recovered, counsel is reported as saying:

"This is not a case of trover or detinue in which damages may be given on grounds not applicable here."

The sentence in LORD HALSBURY'S speech on which counsel for the plaintiffs here relies is the sentence ([1900] A.C. 117):

"What right has a wrongdoer to consider what use you are going to make of your vessel?"

LORD HALSBURY went on to say that a defendant who had deprived the plaintiff of the use of a chair cannot diminish damages by showing that the plaintiff did not usually sit on it. The damages are at large, they are a matter for the jury, but are not nominal. In a later passage, on which counsel for the defendants relies, LORD HALSBURY referred to the passage which I quoted from the argument and says (ibid., 118):

A "Of course I observe that it has been suggested that this was not an action for trover or detinue; but although those are different forms of action, the principle upon which damages are to be assessed does not depend upon the form of action at all."

He goes on to except punitive damages in trespass.

B In The Valeria (No. 2) (3), which was also a collision case, LORD BUCKMASTER distinguished The Greta Holme (2) and The Mediana (1) in that there the subject-matter of the suit was a vessel which in the ordinary course would have earned nothing at all. With regard to a freight-earning vessel LORD BUCKMASTER said ([1922] 2 A.C. 247):

C "What has to be considered is what would this vessel have earned for the period of the seven days that she was incapacitated owing to the accident; and that amount is the true measure of the damage which the vessel who was to blame is called on to pay . . ."

D That decision, I think, shows that what LORD HALSBURY said must be confined to the class of case which he was considering, and, with great respect, his statement that the principle on which damages are to be assessed does not depend on the form of action at all is too widely stated, unless one construes the word "principle" in a very general sense as meaning reparation to the injured party for the wrongful act and its natural and direct consequences: see The Susquehanna (4) ([1926] A.C. 661).

E The Mediana (1) was a claim in negligence in respect of a chattel which in the hands of the plaintiff did not earn profits. In the present case the chattel was profit-earning in the hands of the defendants. The learned judge applied the principle as laid down in The Valeria (No. 2) (3). The question is whether that is the right measure in this case. This is a claim in detinue. On the findings the defendants had for their own benefit the use of the plaintiffs' chattels. This is an incident which is not present in the damage by negligence cases. Why is not the plaintiffs' loss the value in the market of the user? The wrong is not the mere deprivation as in negligence, and, possibly, some detinue cases, but the user. I am, of course, not overlooking the fact that, if the chattel has been F damaged and depreciated, this may be an item in a claim for special damage. There are, no doubt, some cases in which a wrongdoer may be called on to account for profits, but, in considering the measure of damages as raised here, I think the actual benefit which the defendants have obtained is irrelevant. The damages could not, in my view, be increased by showing that a defendant by his use of the chattel had made much more than the market rate of hire. Equally, G they cannot be diminished by showing that he had made less.

H It is curious that there is no authority on this point. The nearest analogy is a claim for mesne profits. The measure there is a reasonable sum in the nature of rent for the user during the period of the defendant's trespass. In other words, the defendant must pay what the plaintiff would have obtained if the defendant had lawfully been in possession. In principle the same measure should, I think, apply where a defendant has detained and used a chattel of the plaintiff which the plaintiff as part of his business hires out to users. I have added these latter words because I do not wish in this so far uncharted field to go beyond the facts of the case. We were referred to statements as to the law in the United States of America: see SEDGWICK ON DAMAGES, 9th ed., vol. 2, p. 1031, and p. 1045; CORPUS JURIS SECUNDUM, vol. 26, p. 1286. It would appear from the statements in these books that the principle may be more widely applied in the United States of America and would cover, for example, detention and use of a private motor car. I am not saying this is wrong. There may be no distinction in principle. The question had, however, better be left till it arises.

I will now deal with the learned judge's deduction of a month for investigation. It is true that in deciding whether a conversion has taken place a refusal by a defendant who has a bona fide doubt as to the plaintiff's title will not necessarily establish conversion. It was for the jury to consider whether the defendant was disputing the plaintiff's title or was merely asking for a reasonable time to clear up a bona fide doubt: see Pillott v. Wilkinson (5). I cannot think this principle is available to a defendant who, as in the present case, persists in retaining the goods long after a reasonable time has expired. The learned judge's findings lead to the conclusion that the defendants were determined to retain the goods irrespective of the plaintiffs' title, and I do not, with respect, think that they can claim to deduct a notional period for investigation. I, therefore, think that the plaintiffs are entitled to a sum representing the reasonable hire of the goods over forty-three weeks. The learned judge accepted the plaintiffs' figure for hire, and, in my opinion, the appeal should be allowed and judgment entered for £401 6s. 8d.

DENNING, L.J.: In assessing damages, whether for a breach of contract or for a tort, the general rule is that the plaintiff recovers the loss he has suffered, no more and no less. This rule is, however, often departed from. Thus, in cases where the damage alleged is too remote in law the plaintiff recovers less than his real loss: Liesbosch, Dredger v. Edison S.S. (6). In other cases the plaintiff may get more than his real loss. Thus, where the damage suffered by the plaintiff is recouped or lessened owing to some reason with which the defendant is not concerned, the plaintiff gets full damages without any deduction on that account: Slater v. Hoyle & Smith (7); Smiley v. Townshend (8); Haviland v. Long (9). Again, in cases where the defendant has obtained a benefit from his wrongdoing he is often made liable to account for it even though the plaintiff has lost nothing and suffered no damage: Reading v. A.-G. (10).

The question in this case is: What is the proper measure of damages for the wrongful detention of goods? Does it fall within the general rule that the plaintiff only recovers for the loss he has suffered, or within some other, and, if so, what, rule? It is strange that there is no authority on this point in English law, but there is plenty on the analogous case of detention of land. The rule there is that a wrongdoer who keeps the owner out of his land must pay a fair rental value for it, even though the owner would not have been able to use it himself or to let it to anyone else. So, also, a wrongdoer who uses land for his own purposes without the owner's consent, as, for instance, for a fair ground or as a wayleave, must pay a reasonable hire for it even though he has done no damage to the land at all: Whitwham v. Westminster Brymbo Coal & Coke Co. (11). I see no reason why the same principle should not apply to detention of goods. If a wrongdoer has made use of goods for his own purposes, then he must pay a reasonable hire for them even though the owner has, in fact, suffered no loss. It may be that the owner would not have used the goods himself, or that he had a substitute readily available which he used without extra cost to himself. Nevertheless, the owner is entitled to a reasonable hire. If the wrongdoer had asked the owner for permission to use the goods the owner would be entitled to ask for a reasonable remuneration as the price of his permission. The wrongdoer cannot be better off because he did not ask permission. He cannot be better off by doing wrong than he would be by doing right. He must, therefore, pay a reasonable hire. This will cover, of course, the wear and tear which is ordinarily included in a hiring charge, but for any further damage the wrongdoer must pay extra.

I do not mean to suggest that an owner who has suffered greater loss will not be able to recover it. Suppose that a man used a car in his business, and owing to its detention he had to hire a substitute at an increased cost. he would clearly be able to recover the cost of the substitute. In such cases the plaintiff recovers his actual loss. I am not concerned with those cases. I am here concerned with the cases where the owner has, in fact, suffered no loss, or less loss, than is represented by a hiring charge. In such cases, if the wrongdoer has in fact used the goods, he must pay a reasonable hire for them. Nor do I mean to suggest that a wrongdoer who has merely detained the goods and not used them would have to pay a hiring charge. The damages for detention recoverable against a carrier or a warehouseman have never been measured by a hiring charge. They are measured by the loss actually sustained by the plaintiff, subject, of course, to questions of remoteness. They are like cases of injury to a ship or a car by negligence. If it is put out of action during repair the wrongdoer is only liable for the loss suffered by the plaintiff: see the principles set out in The Susquehanna (4), and many other cases. The claim for a hiring charge is, therefore, not based on the loss to the plaintiff, but on the fact that the defendant has used the goods for his own purposes. It is an action against him because he has had the benefit of the goods. It resembles an action for restitution rather than an action of tort. But it is unnecessary to place it into any formal category. The plaintiffs are entitled to a hiring charge for the period of detention and that is all that matters. I can imagine cases where an owner might be entitled to the profits made by a wrongdoer by the use of a chattel, but I do not think this is such a case. If the goods are retained by the wrongdoer up till judgment, the hiring charge runs up to that time, and in addition the owner will get the return of the goods or their value at the time of judgment: Rosenthal v. Alderton & Sons, Ltd. (12). If the goods have been disposed of by the wrongdoer, the hiring charge will cease at the time of such disposal, but the owner will get in addition damages for the loss he has sustained by the conversion, which is usually the value at the time of conversion: see S.S. Celia v. S.S. Volturmo (13) ([1921] 2 A.C. 548, 556, 563), and cf. Sachs v. Miklos (14). In the present case the defendants retained the goods until judgment, but have returned them in pursuance of the judgment. In these circumstances the hiring charge runs up to the date when the goods were returned. It starts from the very moment when the defendants took possession of the goods. They had, it is true, a reasonable time to make inquiries as to title, but once that time expired and they wrongly decided to retain them, then the wrong related back to the first taking. It became wrongful ab initio.

I ought, perhaps, to add a word about the cases to which we were referred. Counsel for the plaintiffs read to us a passage from HOLDSWORTH'S HISTORY OF ENGLISH LAW, vol. 7, p. 445, which quoted from the Year Books. I have looked up the origin of this quotation and find that it was a statement by counsel, Serjeant Catesby, in the course of an argument two years before he was made a judge, and it was immediately rejected by BRIAN, C.J. It is, therefore, no help to us. With regard to The Mediana (1) I need only say that the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., was not dealing with a case where the defendant had actually used the goods. In my opinion, the plaintiffs in the present case are entitled to the full hiring charge for the full period of forty-three weeks, without any of the deductions allowed by the judge. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

ROMER, L.J. : In my judgment, the three salient facts on which the assessment of damages in this case depends are, first, that the equipment of the plaintiffs which the defendants detained was profit-earning property; secondly, that the plaintiffs normally hired out the equipment in the course of their business; and, thirdly, that the defendants during the period of wrongful detention applied the property to the furtherance of their own ends. As to the third point the defendants sought before us to contend that they could not be said to have used the equipment because they did not actively operate the switch-boards. This, in my opinion, is immaterial. The learned judge found that Mrs. Pearlberg (who substantially owns the defendant company) refused to return the equipment to the plaintiffs because, without it, the Bedford Theatre could not be let or sold. This finding establishes, in my judgment, that the defendants put the switch-boards to the use of making their theatre more attractive and more readily disposable than it would have been without them. This amounts to a use of the equipment by the defendants for their own purposes.

In the light, then, of these three established facts, the question is whether counsel for the plaintiffs is right in his proposition that, if the use of an article has a recognised hiring value, then such value constitutes the measure of damages recoverable by the owner from a defendant who, by wrongful detention, has the use of that article. Although, curiously enough, this question seems never to have come up for decision in our courts, I am of opinion that on principle counsel's proposition is sound. The fundamental aim in awarding damages is in general to compensate the party aggrieved. The inquiry is : What loss have the plaintiffs suffered by reason of the defendants' wrongful act ? In determining the answer to this inquiry the question of quantifying the profit or benefit which the defendants have derived from their wrongful act does not arise, for there is no necessary relation between the plaintiffs' loss and the defendants' gain. It follows that in assessing the plaintiffs' loss in the present case one is not troubled by any need to evaluate the actual benefit which resulted to the defendants by having the plaintiffs' equipment at their disposal. That element, then, being out of the way, the only substantial reason put forward by the defendants why the plaintiffs should not receive the full hiring value of the equipment during the period of detention is that the plaintiffs might not have been able to find a hirer. In my judgment, however, a defendant who has wrongfully detained and profited from the property of someone else cannot avail himself of a hypothesis such as this. It does not lie in the mouth of such a defendant to suggest that the owner might not have found a hirer, for in using the property he showed that he wanted it and he cannot complain if it is assumed against him that he himself would have preferred to become the hirer rather than not have had the use of it at all. Apart from the minor matters which I mention later, it, accordingly, seems to me that the defendants are bound to pay the recognised hiring value for the property in question and that no sufficient answer has been made out to the proposition of counsel for the plaintiffs which, in my judgment, has common sense to support it and no authority against it. I say this because some reliance was placed by counsel for the defendants on the principles which have become established in assessing damages for negligence: see, for example, The Susquehanna (4). These principles seem to me to have no relation to cases where a wrongdoer detains property of another and uses it for his own purposes. One can postulate, as I have already indicated, that such a wrongdoer would have preferred to pay for the use of the property rather than have gone without it, but no such assumption can be made where negligence and not improper user is involved.

I agree with SOMERVELL, L.J., that in this comparatively virgin field it is better to confine our decision to the actual facts before us, and I express no opinion as to what the plaintiffs' rights would have been in the matter of damages had the property detained been of a non-profit earning character, or if, although profit earning, the plaintiffs had never applied it to remunerative purposes. The full hiring charge for the switch-boards over the period of unlawful detention has been found to be just over £400, and it follows from what I have said that in the absence of other considerations that is the sum which, in my judgment, should be awarded as damages to the plaintiffs. It is said, however, on behalf of the defendants, first, that they should not be charged for the use of the equipment during such reasonable time as was necessary for them to satisfy themselves with regard to the plaintiffs' title, and, secondly, that some allowance should be made for the possibility that the equipment might have suffered damage, or even destruction, during the period of detention if it had been restored to the plaintiffs at the beginning of that period. I do not think there is anything in either of these points. As to the first, not only is there no evidence that the defendants ever entertained any doubt as to the plaintiffs' title or applied themselves to inquiring into that matter, but the evidence shows, and the learned judge so found, that from first to last the defendants' sole reason for refusing to deliver up the equipment was that they wanted to keep it themselves. Then, as to the possibility of damage to the equipment if the plaintiffs had been given possession of it, this is not a contingency of which, in my judgment, any account should be taken in the present action although it would have had some relevance if the defendants had been sued for negligence. I, accordingly, agree that the appeal should be allowed and that the damages awarded to the plaintiffs should be increased from £200 to £401 6s. 8d.

Appeal allowed.

Criminal Law—Demanding money with menaces—Attempt—Larceny Act, 1916 (c. 50), s. 30.

APPEAL against conviction.

The appellant was convicted before CROOM-JOHNSON, J., at the Suffolk Assizes, on an indictment charging him with demanding money with menaces, contrary to s. 30 of the Larceny Act, 1916. Knowing that a Mr. Fairweather had some money in his pocket when walking in a village street after dark, the appellant went up to him, offered to show him the way, and then said: "I want some money, and, if not, you have had it". Mr. Fairweather squared up to the appellant and then walked away, and the appellant did not follow him. The judge directed the jury that on these facts they could find the appellant guilty of an attempt to commit the offence charged. The jury convicted the appellant of attempted robbery.

Havers for the appellant.

Jellinek for the Crown.

LORD GODDARD, C.J., delivering the judgment of the court, said that, in view of the direction of the learned judge, the verdict of the jury amounted to a conviction of an attempt to demand money with menaces. In the opinion of the court it was not possible to find such a verdict. A man might form the intention of demanding money with menaces and then not put his intention into practice. In such a case he would not be guilty of demanding, but, also, he could not be convicted of an attempt to demand.

Conviction quashed.

[DURHAM ASSIZES (Lynskey, J.), January 30, 31, 1952.]

Criminal Law—Fraudulent conversion—Indictment—Charge of conversion of general balance.

The defendant, a solicitor, was charged in each of four counts of an indictment with the fraudulent conversion of a certain sum of money on a day between certain stated dates. The evidence for the prosecution showed that the defendant first paid amounts received by her on behalf of her clients into her clients' account. Later she drew from the clients' account various sums which she paid into her office account, and some of this money was used by her for her own purposes. It was impossible to trace all the moneys so received by the defendant from the office account into the clients' account and thence to any particular client. The sum charged in each count of the indictment was the sum due from the defendant to a particular client (after giving credit in one count for the sum standing to the credit of the clients' account). On a submission by the defence at the close of the case for the prosecution that there was insufficient evidence to establish the charge in each count and that the indictment was bad since the counts charged the fraudulent conversion of a general balance of account,

HELD: (i) as the evidence for the prosecution enabled a jury to come to the conclusion that on one day between the dates charged in each count of the indictment there had been a fraudulent conversion of some part of the amount charged, there was sufficient evidence to support the counts.

(ii) although in the ordinary case, where it was possible to trace and prove the conversion of individual items of property, it was undesirable to include them all in a count alleging a general deficiency, in a case such as the present, where the individual items could not be traced in detail, the prosecution were entitled to frame their counts in the indictment in the way in which they had been framed.

TRIAL on indictment.

The defendant, Phyllis Newman Lawson, was charged on an indictment in the first count with fraudulent conversion of property, contrary to the Larceny Act, 1916, s. 20 (1) (iv) (b), in that on a day between Apr. 5, 1950, and July 1, 1951, she fraudulently converted to her own use and benefit the sum of £2,519 6s. 2d. received by her for and on account of Fred Armour. The third and fourth counts were in respect of similar offences, but between different dates and in respect of different amounts received for other clients. The second count charged fraudulent conversion contrary to s. 21 of the Act of 1916, alleging that the defendant, being a trustee of a stated sum of money, converted the same to her own use with intent to defraud. At the close of the case for the prosecution, counsel for the defendant submitted that there was insufficient evidence to establish the charge in each count and also moved to quash the indictment on the ground that it was bad in law, as, on the evidence adduced, the counts charged the fraudulent conversion of a general balance of account.

Veale, Q.C., and Cumming-Bruce for the Crown.

D. B. B. Fenwick and O. Wrightson for the defence.

- A LYNSKEY, J.: Counsel for the defendant submits (i) that on each count of the indictment, as framed, the evidence adduced by the prosecution is not sufficient to establish the charge contained in that count, and (ii) that all the counts ought to be quashed on the ground that, in view of the evidence adduced, they charge the fraudulent conversion of a general balance of account, and in law such an indictment is bad. The case for the prosecution in answer to the
- B first objection is that on the face of them the counts are regular. The prosecution say that on the evidence which they have adduced, if the jury accept it, there is ample evidence on which the jury could find the defendant guilty on one or more or all of those counts. The way the prosecution put their argument is that they are alleging here a fraudulent conversion of a sum, not on divers days between Apr. 1, 1950, and July 1, 1951 (to take the first count), but a
- C conversion on a day between those days. They say that the particular date does not matter, and that it is sufficient if the evidence is such as to satisfy a jury that there was a fraudulent conversion on one day between those particular dates. The prosecution say that the evidence which they have adduced clearly shows that there was a conversion between those dates. They further say that they are not called on to prove the conversion of the whole of the amount set out
- D in each count in the indictment, but that it is sufficient, to enable a jury to find a verdict of fraudulent conversion, for them to be satisfied on the evidence that there was a fraudulent conversion of some part of that money on a day between the periods mentioned.

- Authorities have been quoted to me to justify that contention, and it seems to me that the argument of the prosecution is correct. In the case of each of the
- E counts they have called evidence to show that the defendant did receive moneys on account of the clients, or (in the case of the second count), of the beneficiaries. They produced both oral evidence and documents which confirmed it. It appears from the defendant's books, which were produced by her cashier, and from the witnesses who have given evidence that the amounts named in the counts in the indictment were, in fact, received by the defendant on behalf of her clients. Further,
- F those books set out details of the expenses or charges or payments properly made against the moneys received, and in each case they show a balance due from the defendant to a particular person or persons on whose behalf the moneys were received. In the case of the first count, the amount actually charged is £2,519 6s. 2d., and that amount is actually shown in the books as being due from the defendant to a Mr. Fred Armour on Aug. 29, 1950. The evidence goes further
- G and shows that, for nine or ten months after that date, Mr. Armour was continually asking for his money, that he was put off with excuses, and, ultimately, in the middle of 1951, the defendant told him that she was in monetary difficulties, but that eventually he would be paid, not only his money, but also the interest he was losing by her failure to pay. On those facts, coupled also with the fact that, after being compelled to go to another firm of solicitors, Mr. Armour
- H has received payment of £1,010, and the balance has never been paid, it seems to me that there is ample evidence to enable the jury, if they accept it, to come to the conclusion that on some day during the period alleged there had been a conversion, and, if they were satisfied of an intention to defraud, a fraudulent conversion, of at least part of that money.

The scheme adopted by the defendant, as outlined in the evidence for the prosecution, was that all moneys received on behalf of clients were paid into her clients' account as the Law Society's regulations require. She also had an office account for the general purposes of her business. The clients' account contained a mixed fund of the moneys of many clients. The defendant paid the amounts which she received on behalf of clients into her clients' account quite regularly. According to the journal kept by her cashier, on or about July 1, 1949, the defendant commenced to draw from the clients' account various sums which ought not to have been drawn, except for the purpose of paying them to the clients and for or on their behalf. These amounts she paid into her office account, and this went on until Jan. 12, 1951. The total amounts which were withdrawn by her from the clients' account and paid into the office account were, approximately, £4,050 over the whole period. The money so paid into the office account was used, in some cases, regularly, but, apparently, in other cases it was used by the defendant for purposes of her own—purposes for which she had no right to use it.

In those circumstances the prosecution submit that, although it is clear that there was a fraudulent conversion of the whole or part of the sum missing, it is impossible to trace the particular sums converted on any particular day from the office account through the clients' account to the particular account or trust of the client whose money was converted. The prosecution say, therefore, that, having regard to the method adopted by the defendant, they are entitled to take a sum—which happens to be the total sum which was due—and to say on the evidence that the jury must be satisfied that at least part of that sum was fraudulently converted during the period named in the particular count. I have dealt with the first count. The same can be said as to the other counts and to the evidence which supports them. So far as the second count is concerned, according to the entries in the books, on Oct. 19, 1950, there was £493 13s. 9d. due from the defendant to the beneficiaries of the estate of Cyrus William Robinson, deceased. On Feb. 14, 1951, there was £171 3s. 11d. due in respect of the estate of Emily Ann Kell, and, with regard to the final account, the position was that a sum of £400 odd was due in respect of the amounts that ought to have been paid over in respect of the estate of William Chapman, deceased. The prosecution say that a certain sum was standing to the credit of the defendant's clients' account, and that credit has been given to the defendant for that amount and she is only charged in the fourth count with the difference between what remained in the clients' account and what remained unpaid.

In my view, the prosecution have adduced sufficient evidence to support the counts laid in the indictment. My ruling, so far, is subject to the second submission made by counsel for the defendant, viz., that, on the evidence, the amount named in each count was a general balance of account and a count charging fraudulent conversion of such a balance is bad in law. In support of his submission counsel relied on R. v. Morris (1), which came before LORD HEWART, C.J., AVORY, J., and LAWRENCE, J. The headnote to the report reads:

“A count in an indictment should not charge the fraudulent conversion of a general balance alleged to be due.”

The case was a curious one. In the first three counts the appellant was charged with embezzling moneys received by him for and on account of his employers, a company. The court found that there was nothing to show that the appellant was the clerk or servant of the company, and, therefore, he could not be convicted of embezzlement. The report of the case is very unsatisfactory and contains little information in regard to the facts and none in regard to the form of the counts in the indictment with which the court was dealing. Delivering the judgment of the court in regard to the fourth count, which is the only part of the judgment material for the purpose of my ruling, LORD HEWART, C.J., said (24 Cr. App. Rep. 107):

“With regard to the fourth count, it is quite obvious that the appellant was charged with the fraudulent conversion of a general balance alleged to be due and that is a course which cannot properly be taken."

No reasons are given for the decision, and, so far as argument is concerned, the only argument adduced for the appellant with regard to the count of fraudulent conversion was:

A "With regard to the count for fraudulent conversion, that was framed as alleging the conversion of a general balance alleged to be due."

B Unfortunately R. v. Balls (2) was not cited in Morris's case (1), and, so far as one can see, it was not drawn to the attention of the court. In Balls' case (2) the prisoner, who was a member of a co-partnership, had to account on each Tuesday for money received in respect of the sale of coal. Each count of the indictment alleged a failure to account each Tuesday for items which the prisoner had received during the previous week in smaller amounts, and the point was taken on behalf of the prisoner that that was wrong, that the counts ought to have been for the individual smaller items received by him during the week and converted to his own use, and, therefore, the count charging the conversion of a balance for that period was bad. The case came before an extremely strong court consisting of COCKBURN, C.J., WILLES, MELOR and MONTAGUE SMITH, JJ., and CHANNELL, B. Delivering the judgment of the court, COCKBURN, C.J., said (L.R. 1 C.C.R. 332):

D "It is quite true that if a man receives a number of separate sums and has to account for each of them separately, only three instances of failure to account can be proved under one indictment."

D In other words, the court was applying the principle that, if there is a separate liability to account in respect of each item, it would be wrong to include a number of such items in the same count in the indictment. COCKBURN, C.J., went on to say (ibid.):

E "Thus, if there were to be one accounting on Monday, and one on Tuesday, and one on Wednesday, and so on, only three defaults could be charged and proved; though even in such a case, evidence of other instances might be given in order to show that the instances charged were not merely accidental, but that what was done was done intentionally and fraudulently. But here no difficulty of this nature arises. I agree that the prisoner might have been indicted for embezzling any of the separate small sums received by him. But it appears upon the case that his duty was to receive the small sums from time to time; to send in the weekly accounts every Tuesday; and every Tuesday to pay the gross amount received by him during the preceding week into a bank. It is true that each of the small sums received had to be accounted for; but he might well be charged with embezzling the aggregate amount. And evidence of the individual items was admissible to show how this aggregate was made up. It would be very mischievous if, in such cases as these, servants could not be indicted for embezzling the aggregate amounts for which they fail to account. No doubt, in such cases, there is an embezzlement of each of the smaller sums going to make up the total not accounted for; but there is not the less an embezzlement of the whole."

G That is a strong judgment and, apparently, covers the case of what, over a short period, would be a general balance of account.

H Before R. v. Morris (1), there was another decision, R. v. Sheaf (3), dealing with this matter. AVORY, J., who was a member of the court in R. v. Morris (1), was also a member of the court in R. v. Sheaf (3) and delivered the judgment of the court [the other members of the court being SANKEY and SALTER, JJ.] The question whether the counts were bad in law did not arise for decision because the case was dealt with on other grounds and, therefore, what AVORY, J., said on the point was obiter to the decision. He said (134 L.T. 129):

"Reference to the authorities relating to embezzlement, in which it has been made clear that it is not sufficient to charge the embezzlement of a general deficiency unless it appears that by the conduct or course of business it was the duty of the defendant on the date specified to hand over the lump sum which he had received, makes it clear . . . that these two counts in the circumstances of this case were bad in law and ought to have been withdrawn from the jury."

R. v. Balls (2) was not cited to the court, but the remarks of AVORY, J., would make it appear that he had that case in mind. The effect of what he said was that it is sufficient to charge a general deficiency if it appears by the conduct of the business in question that the practice is to account for the sums periodically. A

In view of the words in the judgment of the court, delivered by AVORY, J., in R. v. Sheaf (3) and having regard also to the decision in Balls' case (2), it seems to me that R. v. Morris (1) is in conflict with the earlier decisions. It states the law too widely. There may be cases where it is proper to allege what, in effect, is a general deficiency if one can prove that there was a fraudulent conversion of either the whole or a part of it at one time. In those circumstances, in a case like the present, it seems to me that the prosecution would be undertaking an impossible task to try to trace all the moneys received by the defendant from the office account into the clients' account and thence to the moneys of any particular client or beneficiary. In a case of this kind, if the jury accept the evidence, it seems to me that there is ample material on which they can find that there was a fraudulent conversion of part, at least, of the property named in each count on one date. In my opinion, this is a proper case for the indictment to go forward in this form. I agree that in the ordinary case, where it is possible to trace the individual items and to prove a conversion of individual property and money, it is undesirable that one should include them all in a count alleging a general deficiency. Such a count may be bad for uncertainty, but in a case like this, where the individual items cannot be traced in detail, but where the evidence, if the jury accept it after hearing evidence for the defence, makes it clear that there has been a fraudulent conversion, it seems to me that the prosecution are entitled to frame their counts in the indictment in the way in which they have been framed here. In those circumstances, it seems to me that I must overrule the submission made by counsel for the defendant. D E

The trial having proceeded the jury found the defendant guilty and she was sentenced to three years' imprisonment.

COPELAND v. GREENHALF.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Upjohn, J.), March 4, 5, 6, 7, 1952.]

Easement—Use of land—Right to store vehicles for repair and repaired vehicles awaiting collection—Benefit to claimant's business.

For upwards of fifty years the defendant and his father before him had carried on business as wheelwrights. Their dwelling-house and workshop adjoined a road and in part confronted a strip of land on the opposite side of the road, some 150 feet long and of a width varying from fifteen to thirty-five feet, which gave access from the road to an orchard. During the whole of the said period the defendant and his father had placed vehicles, wheels, and other articles on the said land to await repair or removal after repair, and had from time to time carried out repairs to vehicles on the land. They had always left a way to permit access to and from the orchard from and to the road. On a claim by the plaintiff, the owner in fee simple of the orchard and the strip of land, for an injunction to restrain the defendant from continuing to place articles on the land, the defendant contended that he was entitled to an easement so to use the land by virtue of the Prescription Act, 1832, s. 2.

HELD: while it was no objection to the alleged easement that it related only to matters of trade or business, the right claimed by the defendant was virtually to joint user with the plaintiff of the land and was of too wide and ill-defined a nature to constitute an easement.

ACTION for an injunction to restrain the defendant, his servants or agents, from depositing or causing or permitting to be deposited on certain land at Winchcomb, Gloucestershire, carts, cartwheels, or other articles, or otherwise trespassing on the said land. The plaintiff also claimed a mandatory order to the defendant to remove any such articles deposited there by the defendant, his servants or agents.

The land in question was a strip of some 150 feet in length and a width varying from fifteen to thirty-five feet, giving access from a road to an orchard. Since 1901 the defendant and his father had carried on the business of wheelwrights on premises on the opposite side of the road to the strip. Owing to lack of space on these premises, throughout the whole of that period they had been accustomed to put on the said land vehicles, wheels, and other articles brought to their shop for, repair either while awaiting repair on the defendant's premises or after repair while awaiting removal by their owners, and sometimes to repair the articles while they stood on the land. As a rule the articles would remain on the land for a few weeks, or, perhaps, a few months, but exceptionally vehicles had been left there for a year or more, and one vehicle had lain on the land for seven years and was still there. The defendant claimed, under the Prescription Act, 1832, s. 2, to be entitled to a valid easement over the land to continue putting articles there, and, if necessary, repairing them there, so, however, that they should not obstruct or interfere with access for all purposes from and to the orchard. A

In 1899 the orchard and the disputed land were purchased by one Burchell. On his death in 1927 he devised the orchard and the land to his widow. In December, 1938, the widow's personal representatives conveyed the property to one Holder and his wife, who held it on trust for sale. In May, 1946, Mr. and Mrs. Holder sold the property to the plaintiff. In 1901 the property was let to one Gardiner, and in 1908 to one Day. In 1938 Day gave up his tenancy and the property was in the occupation and possession of the owner until 1942, when it was let to the plaintiff, who acquired the fee simple in 1946. The defendant was entitled in fee simple to his house and workshop, and his immediate predecessor in title was his father, who was seised in fee simple of the premises from 1901 until 1933. B

UPJOHN, J., stated the facts and continued: Counsel for the defendant said that a custom or practice of depositing objects on the land of another can form the subject-matter of a valid easement. He referred me to GALE ON EASEMENTS, 12th ed., p. 31, and showed me a long list of acts done on servient tenements which have been held to be valid easements. Some of those arose under express grants. He referred me to Pye v. Mumford (1) where it appeared to have been decided by COLERIDGE, J., at assizes that a custom or a practice of depositing muck from a dominant tenement on a servient tenement can be the subject-matter of a valid easement, the actual decision turning on another point. He also referred me to A.G. of Southern Nigeria v. John Holt & Co. (Liverpool), Ltd. (2). That is a complicated case. The respondents were the owners of certain lands in Lagos. Works of reclamation were carried out so that further land adjoining the original land was added thereto, but, it being the result, as I read the case, of artificial reclamation, the reclaimed land vested in the Crown and did not accrue to the respondents. The respondents did certain things on the reclaimed land, such as building walls and jetties and depositing certain casks and other articles on it, and it was found as a fact that they had exclusive possession of the reclaimed land. The judge of first instance, OSBORNE, C.J., found that they occupied the reclaimed land under an irrevocable licence from the Crown which was to be presumed from their acts and the acquiescence of the Crown in those acts over many years. On appeal, the case went to the Full Court, and they decided that that was not the right view to take, but that the respondents had an easement over the reclaimed land. Before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council the judgment of the Court of Appeal was reversed on the simple ground that you cannot have an easement over land of which you are in exclusive possession, but the question what was capable of being an easement was argued and was discussed shortly in the judgment. That passage in the judgment is of great value to me, although it is obiter. LORD SHAW OF DUNFERMLINE, who delivered the judgment, said ([1915] A.C. 617): D

"The judgment of the Full Court has affirmed various easements over reclaimed land (1) in the case of William's land for the purpose of storing thereon coopers' stores, casks, trade goods and produce, and (2) and (3) in the case of Johannsen's and Dunkley's lands easements for jetties. Against these last the Crown has not insisted at their Lordships' board; but with E regard to the first point it is maintained that such an easement is unknown to the law. It is also further maintained that in any view the use to which the land was put by the respondents and their predecessors in title could not be the foundation of any easement, as it was not a right assumed to be taken or asserted over the land of another; the possession founded upon was possession of the land as owner thereof. Their Lordships see no reason why upon the first point a right of easement should be exclusive of the storage claim."

I read that sentence as meaning that there is no reason why there should not be a valid easement for the purpose of storing on the land of another coopers' stores, casks, trade goods and produce. LORD SHAW continued:

"The law must adapt itself to the conditions of modern society and trade, and there is nothing in the purposes for which the easement is claimed inconsistent in principle with a right of easement as such. This principle is of general application, and was so treated in the House of Lords in Dyce v. Lady Hay (3) by LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C., who observed: 'The category of servitudes and easements must alter and expand with the changes that take place in the circumstances of mankind.'"

Counsel for the defendant presses me with that decision, which, he contends, shows that there can be an easement to deposit trade goods on the land of another, and that he says, in effect, is all that is done here.

Counsel for the plaintiff, on the other hand, says that there are two reasons why this cannot be a valid easement. First, he says it is uncertain. He says that the court is not in a position to control the exercise of this easement. He relies on Hill v. Tupper (4), and refers me to the well-known passage in which POLLOCK, C.B., says (2 H. & C. 127):

"A new species of incorporeal hereditament cannot be created at the will and pleasure of the owner of property; but he must be content to accept the estate and the right to dispose of it subject to the law as settled by decisions or controlled by Act of Parliament. A grantor may bind himself by covenant to allow any right he pleases over his property, but he cannot annex to it a new incident, so as to enable the grantee to sue in his own name for an infringement of such a limited right as that now claimed."

Counsel for the plaintiff presses me very strongly with the well-known case of Dyce v. Hay (3) in the House of Lords, the sidenote reading as follows (1 Macq. 305):

"There can be no prescriptive right in the nature of a servitude or easement so large as to preclude the ordinary uses of property by the owner of lands affected. Semble—That where a claim in the nature of a servitude or easement is incapable of judicial control and restriction, it cannot be sustained by prescription. It does not follow that rights sustainable by grant are necessarily sustainable by prescription. The law of Scotland agrees with the law of England that the right to village greens and playgrounds stands upon a principle of original dedication to the use of the public. Where new inventions come into use they may have the benefit of servitudes and easements; the law accommodating its practical operation to the varying circumstances of mankind."

Counsel relied in particular on the passage in which LORD ST. LEONARDS, L.C., says (ibid., 312):

"I apprehend, my Lords, that the case of Home v. Young (5) does not touch the question before you; but I entirely agree with the learned judges below that there is no rule in the law of Scotland which prevents modern inventions and new operations from being governed by old and settled legal principles. Thus, when the art of bleaching came into use, there was nothing in its novelty which should exclude it from the benefit of a servitude or easement, if such servitude or easement on other legal grounds was maintainable. The category of servitudes and easements must alter and expand with the changes that take place in the circumstances of mankind. The law of this country, as well as the law of Scotland, frequently moulds its practical operation without doing any violence to its original principles. But the argument to which I am referring can have no application to this case; because I fancy no-one supposes that recreation, taking the air and strolling, are to be regarded as any particular novelties; or that if you are tired in a meadow, and lie down to repose yourself, the refreshment thence arising can reasonably be described as an invention."

Counsel for the plaintiff says that there is nothing new or novel in the business of a wheelwright, but it is entirely a novel suggestion that a wheelwright or anyone else carrying on trade can have such a right as this. He points out the great ambit of the right claimed. Vehicles can be left on the strip for an indefinite time, years if necessary. They can be left in a vague and undefined part of the strip, leaving an ill-defined gangway, as it has been called, for the owner of the strip to use in getting to another part of his land. He also says that the defendant is doing much more than an ordinary wheelwright's business, that he is doing repairs to the woodwork of every form of modern type of vehicle, such as motor lorries, and that again makes this too uncertain to be enforceable.

The second point of counsel for the plaintiff was that the easement must be for the benefit of the land and not of a business carried on in connection with the land. He referred me to Simpson v. Godmanchester Corpn. (6) and A.-G. v. Horner (No. 2) (7) as showing that the benefit of an easement must be attached to the land and not to some business. It is true that certain words of BUCKLEY, L.J., do support that view, but it must be remembered, as HAMILTON, L.J., pointed out, that in that case the right over the servient tenement was not appurtenant either to land or any business carried on on the land, and I think that the judgment of BUCKLEY, L.J., must be read in the light of that circumstance.

I think that, so far as this point is concerned, the easement must be for the benefit of the land and not the business, but the matter is really concluded for me by Moody v. Steggles (8) where FRY, J., says (12 Ch.D. 266):

"The next point taken on behalf of the defendants is this: It is said that the easement in question relates, not to the tenement, but to the business of the occupant of the tenement, and that therefore I cannot tie the easement to the house. It appears to me that that argument is of too refined a nature to prevail, and for this reason, that the house can only be used by an occupant, and that the occupant only uses the house for the business which he pursues, and therefore in some manner (direct or indirect) an easement is more or less connected with the mode in which the occupant of the house uses it."

I also have in mind that in A.-G. of Southern Nigeria v. Holt (2) the Judicial Committee felt no difficulty in principle in holding that there might be an easement in connection with a right to deposit trade goods. So far, therefore, as that point is concerned, I decide that it does not avail the plaintiff in the present case.

To return to the plaintiff's first point that the right claimed is uncertain, in my judgment the right claimed here goes wholly outside any normal idea of an easement, that is, a right of the occupier of a dominant tenement over a servient tenement. This claim really amounts to a claim to a joint user of the land by the defendant. Practically he is claiming the whole beneficial user of the strip of land on the south-east side of the track so that he can leave there as many or as few lorries as he likes for any time that he likes and enter on it by himself, his servants and agents, to do repair work. In my judgment, that is not a claim which can be established as an easement. It is virtually a claim to possession, if necessary to the exclusion of the owner, or, at any rate, to a joint user, and no authority has been cited to me which would justify me in coming to the conclusion that a right of this wide and undefined nature can be the proper subject-matter of an easement. It seems to me that for this claim to succeed it must really amount to a right of possession by long adverse possession. I say nothing, of course, as to the creation of such rights by grant or by covenant. I am dealing solely with the question of a claim arising by prescription.

JOHN KAY, LTD. v. KAY AND ANOTHER.

Landlord and Tenant—Shop—New tenancy—Reasonableness of grant—Matters for consideration of court—Rent—Quantum—Hardship—Financial disadvantage to landlord—Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951 (c. 38), s. 12 (1), (3) (e).

In determining, under the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, s. 12 (1), whether in all the circumstances of the case it is reasonable to order that a new tenancy be granted to the tenant of shop premises, and, if so, for what period, at what rent, and on what terms and conditions, the court must take into account all relevant circumstances as they exist at the date of the hearing "in a broad, common-sense way as a man of the world," and come to its conclusion giving such weight as it thinks right to the various factors in the situation.

Observation of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Cumming v. Danson ([1942] 2 All E.R. 655), applied.

The rent to be paid under the new tenancy is rent arrived at by applying the subjective test of what the judge thinks is right and fair, as distinct, for example, from the objective test of what the evidence shows is the rent of the premises obtainable in the open market. When all the evidence has been given and attention has been directed to the right considerations, the exact quantification must be arrived at in the same way, for example, as that in which a jury fixes a figure when it comes to assess damages.

Under s. 12 (3) (e) the onus is on the landlord to prove that greater hardship would be caused by ordering the grant of a new tenancy than by refusing to do so. The mere fact that a landlord might, or would, be able, if the court did not order the grant of a tenancy to the existing tenant, to grant a tenancy to a third person at a rent in excess of what the court considered to be reasonable cannot, by itself, amount to hardship.

Per JENKINS, L.J.: I think that s. 12 (3) (e) is primarily directed to the kind of case, not specifically covered by the earlier provisions of that sub-section, where the landlord has in mind some project with respect to the premises or requires the premises for some purpose or scheme of disposal for which vacant possession is essential.

APPEAL of the landlords from an order of His Honour JUDGE CARY EVANS, made at Norwich County Court, on Dec. 11, 1951, granting the tenants of two shops known as No. 15, St. Stephens Street and No. 15, Magdalen Street, Norwich, new tenancies for one year under s. 10 (1) of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951. The old rents were respectively £160 and £100 a year and the landlords called evidence to show that the rents now obtainable were £750 and £520. The county court judge fixed the reasonable rents for the two shops at £550 and £400 respectively. A

C. Lawson for the landlords.

Hamawi for the tenants.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This is an appeal by the landlords of two shop premises, No. 15, St. Stephens Street and No. 15, Magdalen Street, Norwich, against a decision of the county court judge at Norwich to exercise in favour of the tenants the power conferred on the court in Part II of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, to grant for a limited period—a period of twelve months—a new tenancy to the tenants of each of those premises. Both premises are admittedly shops within the meaning of the provisions of that Part of the Act. B

The landlords are trustees. They do not themselves carry on a trade, nor do they desire themselves to occupy either of the shop premises, but, in execution of their duties as trustees, they desire, for the benefit of their cestuis que trustent, to obtain from these premises the best return they can. On the other hand, the tenants have been in occupation of both the premises in question under leases of twenty-one years' duration, both of which had, about the time of the application, expired by effluxion of time. They carry on in those two shops and in some sixty-nine other premises throughout the country the business of grocers and provision merchants, and may be described as "multiple shopkeepers". C D

The long title of the Leasehold Property (Temporary Provisions) Act, 1951, says:

"An Act to make temporary provision for the protection of occupiers of residential property against the coming to an end of long leases, and for the renewal of tenancies of shops; and for purposes connected with the matters aforesaid." E

In Part I of the Act are found provisions dealing with the first matter mentioned, namely, protection of occupiers of residential property against the coming to an end of long leases. There are powers to prolong the occupation of such property, and in those cases it is also provided that during the temporary provision in question the rents which formerly were being paid under the leases should be "frozen", i.e., any extension should be at the same rent as that which previously prevailed. Shops are dealt with in Part II, and there is at once to be noticed the distinction that if the tenancies are renewed the rent is not maintained at the figure previously payable, but has to be fixed according to the provisions of s. 12. Power to apply for the renewal of a tenancy is contained in s. 10 (1) which provides: F G

"The provisions of this Part of this Act shall have effect for enabling the occupier of a shop . . . to apply to the court for, and subject to the provisions of this Act to obtain, the grant of a new tenancy where apart from the next following section the expiring tenancy would come to an end . . ."

By s. 12 (1): H

"Subject to the provisions of this section, on an application under this Part of this Act duly made the court may, if in all the circumstances of the case it appears reasonable so to do, order that there shall be granted to the tenant a tenancy for such period, at such rent and on such terms and conditions as the court in all the circumstances thinks reasonable, and thereafter the parties shall be deemed to have entered into a lease of the shop . . . ”, on those terms. There is a proviso

“ that in fixing the rent, terms and conditions the court shall disregard any considerations arising from the personal circumstances of any of the parties.”

A Sub-section (2) provides that the period for which a tenancy may be ordered to be granted shall not exceed one year, and sub-s. (3) places a restriction on the power previously given, for it provides that

“ the court shall not order the grant of a new tenancy if it is satisfied—

B (a) that the tenant has broken any of the terms or conditions of the expiring tenancy, and that in view of the nature and circumstances of the breach a new tenancy ought not to be granted; or . . . (e) that having regard to all the circumstances of the case greater hardship would be caused by ordering the grant of a new tenancy than by refusing to do so.”

Counsel for the landlords drew attention to the repetitive use of the standard of reasonableness. In sub-s. (1) it occurs twice. It occurs as being the condition on which the court orders the grant of a tenancy at all. Secondly, it is to be applied to the rent, terms and conditions to be paid and observed if the court determines it to be reasonable to grant a tenancy. The conception of the reasonable man and the standard of reasonableness have for centuries been enshrined in our common law, but the conception of leaving it to a judge to decide whether it is reasonable to make particular orders, and, if so, on what terms, has been introduced into our statute law in recent years. Everybody knows that the standard of reasonableness, as a condition the satisfaction of which is required to justify the making of an order, has for years been a particular feature of the Rent Restriction legislation. It is convenient to recall the language of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Cumming v. Danson (1) in reference to the Rent Restrictions Acts. There the question was what were the circumstances which a judge should consider in deciding whether it was reasonable to make an order for possession. LORD GREENE, M.R., said ([1942] 2 All E.R. 655):

F “ . . . the duty of the judge is to take into account all relevant circumstances as they exist at the date of the hearing. That he must do in what I venture to call a broad, common-sense way as a man of the world, and come to his conclusion giving such weight as he thinks right to the various factors in the situation. Some factors may have little or no weight, others may be decisive . . . ”

I conceive that when Parliament again introduced this conception of the standard of reasonableness, it intended to impose on the judge a corresponding duty, so that in deciding whether it was reasonable to grant a tenancy the judge “ is to take into account all relevant circumstances as they exist at the date of the hearing ”, and would have to exercise his powers in a “ broad, common-sense way as a man of the world, and come to his conclusion giving such weight as he thinks right to the various factors in the situation.” That exegesis does not, perhaps, greatly help to advance the solution of the present case, nor do I think the matter is much advanced by saying that what is reasonable is at least that which is not unreasonable. The question which has to be decided here is whether the judge applied the right test and directed his mind aright in concluding, first, that it was reasonable to grant a tenancy, and, secondly, that it was reasonable to do so on the terms, inter alia, that the rent which should be paid for 15, St. Stephens Street should be £550 per annum, and the rent which should be paid for 15, Magdalen Street should be £400 per annum. It is on the second of those matters that the argument has mainly turned, for counsel for the landlords did not contend that it was not reasonable to grant a tenancy on any terms or in any circumstances.

I think, as did the judge, that some significance is rightly attached to the language of the short and the long titles to the Act as indicating the kind of thing to which Parliament was directing this remedial measure. I say "remedial measure" meaning that the Act has been passed in order to remedy something which otherwise might be thought defective in the conditions to which it applies. And I notice that, prima facie, some derogation from the rights of the landlord to deal with his property as he will must necessarily be involved. If power is given to grant, on the tenant's application, a new tenancy, it pre-supposes that the parties have not themselves agreed that such should happen. The court is, therefore, invited to make such an order, so far as the landlord is concerned, in invitum. Secondly, I think that some importance does attach to the phrase "temporary provision". In the context in which it appears in the long title, the phrase indicates, in my view, that Parliament intended, on whatever should be found to be reasonable terms, that tenants should be protected for a short period in their existing rights of occupation, but that those rights should be extended only to a limited extent. One other general remark, which serves to emphasise what I have already said, is this. Under the familiar provisions of the Rent Restrictions Acts, in certain circumstances the court is directed not to make the order claimed if, having regard to all the circumstances, the court is satisfied that it would cause greater hardship to make the order than not to do so, and the onus in such a case has been held to be on the tenant. In this case, the position is reversed by the import of the language of s. 12 (3) (e), whereby it is for the landlord to show, if the other conditions are satisfied, that the making of an order extending the tenant's right of occupation would cause to the landlord greater hardship than that which the tenant would suffer if the order were not made.

I have referred to the conception of reasonableness, and he would, indeed, be a bold judge who tried to formulate with precision the significance that the wording implies. One is inevitably, sooner or later, thrown back on generalities of the kind I have already quoted from LORD GREENE, M.R. I think this much must be clear, that there is involved in it the conception of a standard of that which is regarded as reasonable by the judge who tries the case, and which is, or may be, distinct from standards which may be found to be appropriate by applying other tests. Let me take the second question, that of rent, and try to illustrate the point in regard to that. The landlords here could obtain in respect of 15, St. Stephens Street a tenant willing to pay for a term of twenty-one years a rent of £750 and a premium of £1,500, and that might be said, at any rate with some show of justice, to be the present market value of the premises. The phrase "economic rent" has been used during the argument, but I prefer to avoid it since the phrase has, in some contexts and to economists, as I believe, a particular and technical significance. The market value of certain premises is one thing, and, as I read this Act, it seems to me that the reasonable rent may be something different. The reasonable rent seems to be a rent arrived at by applying the subjective test of what the judge thinks is right and fair, as distinct, for example, from the objective test of what the evidence shows is the market value.

In this case the facts as regards rent were these, that before the lease expired (and I will confine myself for the moment to St. Stephens Street) the tenants had been paying a rent of £160. That figure had been fixed twenty years before, and the tenants, as the evidence showed, had suggested that they should be granted a renewal or a fresh tenancy for a short period at that rent, or something very like it. On the other hand, the landlords were saying that, since the market value now was £750 plus, the standard of reasonableness would only be satisfied by reference to that fact. The judge arrived at the figure of £550. Obviously, the judge must decide the question in the light of the evidence before him. I am so far confining myself to saying that, as I construe the Act, if the evidence justifies it, a judge may conclude that a reasonable rent is a figure which is neither the rent, on the one hand, which the tenant has previously paid, nor the market value rent which the landlord has shown that he is able to obtain, but is some other figure in between those two rents, being the rent which he thinks is reasonable in all the circumstances of the case. That question is largely what one might call a jury point. When all the evidence has been given and attention has been directed to the right considerations, the exact quantification must be arrived at in the same way, for example, as that in which a jury

A fixes a figure when it comes to assess damages.

The evidence with regard to the premises in St. Stephens Street shows that the market value for renting was £750 or more. The judge also states that it was wrong to suggest, as the tenants suggested, that the reasonable rent was the existing rent of £160, for the obvious reason that a rent fixed in 1931 was
B changed. The judge drew attention also to the distinction between Part I and Part II of the Act as showing that it was not the intention of Parliament that the rent should be frozen. In reaching his £550, the judge said this:

“I cannot think it is reasonable that landlords who like the rest of us have to meet inflated prices for everything which they buy should be restricted to a 1931 rent for their property though this, of course, is the fate
C of landlords of many rent controlled dwelling-houses, but I have yet to hear or read any fair argument that this is reasonable.”

I venture to dissociate myself with that last sentence as tending to criticise the policy of Parliament, but it does not, I think, go to the root of the judge's reasoning, for he goes on:

“On the other hand, I think that it is not reasonable in making temporary
D arrangements pending new legislation that the whole burden of inflation of shop rents should be automatically passed on to the tenant. Where to find a reasonable figure between these two extremes may be a problem of the greatest difficulty. But, in this case, I have the evidence of the tenants' valuer, who said that in his judgment and with his experience £600 would be a 'fair rent' for a twenty-one years' lease. Presumably a 'fair rent'
E means a reasonable rent. True, he thought that for a new tenant taking for one year only, a fair figure would be very much less. I have already given my reasons for rejecting this view, though perhaps the 'fair rent' for a year might be a little below the rent for a term of years. I reach the conclusion that £550 would be a fair rent in all the circumstances for a new F tenancy in favour of the sitting tenant for one year, with the very indefinite prospect of some further security arising from future legislation.”

In my judgment, in those passages the judge has not misdirected himself in any material respect. He has placed, perhaps, a little more weight than I might have done on the prospect of new legislation giving some unspecified benefit to the sitting tenant, though I think he is entitled to rely on the terms of the Act,
G and on the titles in particular, as showing that some temporary relief from eviction was in contemplation. The evidence before the court, and, in particular, the evidence of the re-valuation for rating purposes in 1950, seems to me sufficient to justify the view that the figure of £750 is derived, not merely from the increase in general costs or the decrease in the value of money (whichever way you look at it), but is further inflated by the particular—and, one hopes, temporary—
H circumstance of shortage of this sort of property. In other words, though £750 per annum is the market rent, that figure is one which is inflated by the particular circumstance of shortage. The judge has rightly said that, in so far as the figure has been inflated by that circumstance, it becomes an unreasonable figure, or, at least, that it is unreasonable to impose on the tenant the obligation of having to pay that inflated sum. I think the judge is, therefore, deliberately arriving at a figure which pays due regard to the change in the value of money and to economic conditions generally, and so achieves a figure of £550 as the figure which he regards as reasonable. If the considerations taken into account are correct the sum of £550 is not one which this court will vary by reducing it by some small amount, or adding some small amount to it. Unless the Court of Appeal thought that the figure fixed was based on an entirely erroneous estimate, the court would not interfere with it.

I have answered the first two questions which the section poses. There still remains the matter of greater hardship under s. 12 (3) (e) of the Act, and it is argued by counsel for the landlords that, even though the first two matters are disposed of, in the circumstances the granting of this tenancy on these terms would impose greater hardship on the landlords than the refusal so to do would impose on the tenants. The onus is on the landlords, and the conclusion that the judge draws is that they have failed to satisfy him about it. In my judgment, once it has been decided that X is a reasonable rent and that it is reasonable to grant a tenancy at X pounds per annum—and I assume, though nothing turns on it, that the other conditions are also reasonable—it is no longer open for the landlords to say that the result is to impose greater hardship on them than the refusal of the order would on the tenants by reference merely to the quantum, “£X”. In other words, I do not think that the landlords can now say that because a rent of £550 means £200 less rent to the landlords than if the premises were let at the market rate, that fact by itself establishes greater hardship. I refrain from trying to say what matters should be considered under the title of greater hardship. I am not saying that financial considerations must be wholly excluded, but I do say that, having determined on the reasonableness of the £550, it cannot then be said on the landlords’ side that that sum of itself, being less than £750, creates “greater hardship” for the landlords.

There remains only the question under s. 12 (3) (a) whether the tenants have broken the terms and conditions of the previous deed and so a new tenancy should not be granted. Dealing with the premises in St. Stephens Street, the judge found that there had been breaches of the repairing covenant in the lease. A reference, however, to para. 3 (a) shows that that of itself does not suffice, because a court must also be satisfied, in view of the nature and circumstances of the breach, that a new tenancy ought not to be granted. Again I refrain from attempting any exhaustive exposition of the significance of that phrase, but plainly the second half of the paragraph involves the judge in the duty of considering whether, if the tenancy is extended as suggested, the breach is such as will really prejudice the proper interests of the landlord. It is not suggested that the premises have got into a disreputable condition—indeed, the attractive offers which other persons apparently made for a lease of them negatived such a view. I think the judge rightly concluded that, having regard to the extent of the business of the tenants and taking into account that they undertook forthwith to do some urgent repairs, the existence of these breaches ought not to prevent him from making an order, and that, as a ground for that conclusion, the landlord would not suffer prejudice or damage as a consequence. The result is that the restrictions imposed by s. 12 (3) (a) were not shown to be satisfied, and I think the reasoning of the judge was correct. As regards the earlier matter with which I have already dealt, in the final analysis the whole question, I think, turns on the quantum of rent. In my view, in the light of the evidence the judge rightly concluded (or, at any rate, he cannot be held to have wrongly concluded) that the figure of £550 was the reasonable sum payable for rent. That disposes of St. Stephens Street, Norwich. [HIS LORDSHIP dealt with the facts relating to the premises in Magdalen Street and concluded:—] The two cases have not been treated by counsel for the landlords as being in any material respect different, and what I have said, therefore, as to St. Stephens Street is, mutatis mutandis, applicable to Magdalen Street. I think, therefore, that the appeals should be dismissed.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. Under s. 12 (1) and s. 12 (2) of the Act two questions arise for the consideration of the court. The first is whether, in all the circumstances of the case, it would be reasonable to order the grant to the tenant of a tenancy for such period not exceeding one year at such rent and on such terms and conditions as the court, in all the circumstances of the case, thinks reasonable. If that question is answered in the affirmative, but not otherwise, then the further question arises: For what period, at what rent, and on what terms and conditions, would it in all the circumstances be reasonable to order the tenancy to be granted? The judge did not, I think, in terms answer the first question, that omission presumably being accounted for by the circumstance that neither party appears seriously to have contended that this was a case in which it would not, in all the circumstances, be reasonable to order the grant of a tenancy of some sort.

The landlords, however, raised a point under s. 12 (3) which sets out five cases in which an order for the grant of a new tenancy is not to be made. Paragraph (a) deals with the case where the tenant has broken any of the terms and conditions of the expiring tenancy and the court is satisfied

“ . . . that in view of the nature and circumstances of the breach a new tenancy ought not to be granted.”

Breaches of repairing covenants were relied on as bringing this provision into operation in the present case, but the judge held that in the circumstances these breaches should not be regarded as a bar to an order for the grant of a new tenancy. I agree that the judge came to a right conclusion as to that matter, and that his decision on it should not be disturbed. The other cases which operate as a bar to the grant of a new tenancy, those in s. 12 (3) (b) (c) (d) and (e), are, first (b), the case in which

“ . . . the landlord has offered to afford to the tenant, on terms and conditions which in the opinion of the court are reasonable, alternative accommodation which, in the opinion of the court, is suitable for the purposes of the tenant's business.”

The use in that paragraph of the words “ terms and conditions which in the opinion of the court are reasonable ” is, I think, not without significance. It is to be observed that in a case under para. (b) it would, prima facie, not be reasonable to order the grant of a tenancy of the old premises on any terms whatever in view of the offer of suitable alternative accommodation, and, presumably, that is why this circumstance was made a positive bar to the order for the grant of a new tenancy of the premises. So, under para. (c) the case in which any project of that sort on the part of the landlord would be defeated by the grant to the tenant of any new tenancy whatever of the old premises. Paragraph (d) is the case “ where there subsists in the premises an interest belonging to a public authority ”, and the court is satisfied that “ in the public interest a new tenancy ought not to be granted.” It is not, and could not, be suggested that paras. (b), (c) and (d) have any application to the present case. Finally, para. (e) provides for the case where the court is satisfied “ that having regard to all the circumstances of the case greater hardship would be caused by ordering the grant of a new tenancy than by refusing to do so.”

“ . . . the landlord reasonably requires possession in order that the premises the subject of the expiring tenancy, or a substantial part of those premises, may be demolished or reconstructed ”

That provision seems to mean that a new tenancy is not to be granted if it is shown that the order granting a new tenancy on any terms would cause greater hardship to the landlord than refusal to do so would cause to the tenant. By

"on any terms" I mean a case in which the mere grant of a new tenancy, whatever its terms, would cause greater hardship. I think that para. (e) is primarily directed to the kind of case, not specifically covered by the earlier provisions of s. 12 (3), where the landlord has in mind some project with respect to the premises or requires the premises for some purpose or scheme of disposal for which vacant possession is essential. For example, in the present case it will be remembered that the landlords relied on a firm offer they had got from a prospective tenant to take the St. Stephens Street premises on a twenty-one years' lease at a rent of £750 a year and to pay a premium of £1,500. If the landlords had been able to show that this offer was an extraordinarily munificent offer at an outside price which was never likely to be repeated, I think they might have gone some way towards making out a case of hardship under s. 12 (3) (e), by saying: "No lease for one year on any terms could possibly compensate us for our loss of this exceptional bargain." That, however, was not the landlords' case here. They never put forward this offer of a twenty-one years' lease as an exceptional bargain. They put it forward, with two or three other offers broadly speaking comparable to it, to show what the current market letting value of the property was. It was not sought to make out that the loss of this particular offer which the grant of a new tenancy would entail in itself involved such hardship on the landlords as to make it wrong, having regard to s. 12 (3) (e), to order the grant of any new tenancy at all. Accordingly, in my view, the judge was not precluded by any of the provisions of s. 12 (3) from ordering the grant of a new tenancy on any terms, and in all the circumstances of the case could properly come to the conclusion (as by implication at all events he clearly did) that it would be reasonable to order the grant of a new tenancy on some terms.

With regard to what terms, as to rent and otherwise, would, in all the circumstances of the case, be reasonable for the purposes of the new tenancy, in s. 12 (1) the court is expressly made the judge of what is reasonable. The contest was centred entirely on the question of rent, and the issue between the parties is this. Counsel for the landlords forcibly argues that a reasonable rent is such rent as the premises will command in the open market, and no more and no less. He says the evidence before the judge established that a rent of £750 a year was the rent which this property would fetch in the open market, and, therefore, there can be no justification for arriving at any lower figure as representing the reasonable rent, with the result that the judge erred in fixing the figure of £550. I cannot agree that "such rent as the court in all the circumstances thinks reasonable" means the rent which the property would fetch if put up in the open market as property to let. If that had been intended by the legislature, I cannot doubt but that the section would have been framed in very different language. The judge referred to the significant contrast presented by the proviso to s. 5 (2) of the Landlord and Tenant Act, 1927. That is a section under which a tenant in certain circumstances may obtain a new lease in lieu of compensation for goodwill. The section deals with the terms on which a new lease is to be granted in a proper case, and as to the rent there is this proviso:

"Provided that the rent fixed by the tribunal as the rent payable under the new tenancy shall be such rent as the tribunal may determine to be the rent which a willing lessee other than the tenant would agree to give and a willing lessor would agree to accept for the premises, having regard to the terms of the tenancy, but irrespective of any goodwill which may have become attached to the premises by reason of the tenant or his predecessors in title having carried on thereat a particular trade or business."

That sets out a careful formula for arriving at a figure representing the rental value of the premises in the open market. Inevitably, if a similar calculation had been contemplated under the present Act, a similar provision would have been put in. Instead of that the only guide given is "such rent as the court in all the circumstances thinks reasonable". In my view, that form of words plainly was used with the intention of giving the court the greatest latitude in the matter and not tying it down to the figure found to represent the actual contemporary letting value in the open market. That conclusion, as a matter of construction, seems to me to be borne out by the proviso to s. 12 (1), itself which says:

- A "Provided that in fixing the rent, terms and conditions the court shall disregard any considerations arising from the personal circumstances of any of the parties."

If in the body of the section "such rent as the court thinks reasonable" had been used as meaning simply the open market rent, I cannot see what room this proviso would have in the section, for how could the personal circumstances of any of the parties have any bearing on the question of open market rental? B Further support, I think, is to be found in the reference I have already noted in s. 12 (3) (b), to the "terms and conditions which in the opinion of the court are reasonable" in relation to alternative accommodation. I think it impossible to hold that the court would be obliged to find terms and conditions on which alternative accommodation was offered to be reasonable simply because it could be demonstrated that the alternative accommodation in the open market would command the rent which the landlord was asking the tenant to pay. Accordingly, C I think that all the indications in the section, considering the question as one of construction, are against the view that the words "at such rent as the court in all the circumstances thinks reasonable" mean simply the open market rent ascertained by evidence as regards offers for the particular property in question or for comparable property, and by other evidence of that type.

D There is a more general reason supporting this view. It is manifest that the object of this enactment was to protect sitting tenants, as they are called, at the end of their leases from being faced with the choice between the disturbance caused by removing their business to some other premises, if they could find any, and being compelled to pay an inflated rent for their existing premises. That clearly was the state of affairs which the legislature set out to deal with, E and, in my view, to meet that state of affairs it was necessary that the court should be given the greatest latitude in determining what would be a reasonable rent. If the only power the court had was to ascertain and fix the open market rent as the reasonable rent to be paid under a new tenancy, plainly this legislation, so far as it is concerned with shop tenants, would be in a great measure defeated, because the whole difficulty which has to be met is that, in conditions F of scarcity, the open market value may be forced up to a point which exceeds all reason, and it is essential, to make legislation of this kind effective, that the tribunal which is to fix the rent should be able to discount contemporary open market values to the extent necessary in its opinion to arrive at a fair result. The judge came to his conclusion on the principle, with which I entirely agree, that the court is not asked to ascertain the open market rent in the face of G scarcity and inflation, but is required to form an opinion as to the reasonable rent, and, in my view, it would be wholly wrong for this court to disturb his decision.

I should, perhaps, say a further word on the question of greater hardship under s. 12 (3) (e). An argument was raised by counsel for the landlords at a later stage than, prima facie, I should have thought would be, generally speaking, appropriate. I think, prima facie, the point at which greater hardship comes into the calculation is the stage at which the court is considering whether it would be reasonable in all the circumstances to grant a new tenancy at all. Counsel for the landlords sought, however, to make use of the greater hardship provision in this way. He said that, if a lease of the St. Stephens Street premises is granted at £550 a year, on the current results of their trading the tenants will make a loss in carrying on their business on those premises, and, therefore, they would lose nothing if a new tenancy was refused, while, on the other hand, the landlords will suffer a substantial hardship inasmuch as, if the new tenancy is granted at £550 per annum, they will lose £200 a year in rent, not to mention any premium they might obtain, such as the premium for £1,500 offered for a lease for twenty-one years. Therefore, he says, purely as a financial calculation, greater hardship would be caused to the landlords by ordering this tenancy to be granted than would be caused to the tenants by refusing to do so. The judge rejected that contention, and, in my view, rightly, but, in doing so, he gave more weight than I myself would have been disposed to do to the possible benefit that the tenants might gain from future legislation in the event of their being successful in obtaining a new tenancy under the Act of 1951. Those considerations seem to me to be too problematical and speculative to be deserving of any great weight. The matter which influences me in rejecting the landlords' argument on greater hardship is this. The rent fixed by the judge is, ex hypothesi, the reasonable rent. The hardship complained of is that, if the tenancy was not granted the landlords would be able to let to somebody else at a rent greater than the reasonable rent, and it is said that this amounts to a hardship within the meaning of the Act. For my part I cannot agree that the mere fact that a landlord might, or would, be able, if a tenancy at a reasonable rent was not granted, to grant a tenancy to somebody else at a rent in excess of what was reasonable, amounts to hardship for this purpose. I say "the mere fact" advisedly, for I wish to lay down no general rule to embarrass any tribunal on any future occasion when similar questions may arise with reference to landlords, who are, either on their own account or when acting as trustees for beneficiaries, able to show there is some real financial stringency or emergency arising in their case which would make the operation of this section work some hardship on them. There is no distinction in principle between these two cases. I have been discussing the St. Stephens Street case. I think the same result follows in the Magdalen Street case. Accordingly I agree that both these appeals fail and should be dismissed.

HODSON, L.J.: I also agree. While holding, as my Lords do, the opinion that it is undesirable to generalise as to what may or may not be hardship in any given case, I would like to guard myself against being thought to take the view that the mere existence of a financial loss is to be accepted as being hardship although financial loss may, of course, produce hardship. Counsel for the landlords pressed s. 12 (3) (e) strongly, maintaining that there was a hardship to the landlords in losing a firm offer of a £1,500 premium and a twenty-one years' lease at £750. In my view, hardship involves something more than the mere loss of money. To my mind, it indicates something much nearer the imperilment of livelihood, and the legislature must have had in mind an example of a landlord who wanted the premises for himself to carry on a business thereon. In the circumstances of this case there seems to me to be grave danger of misapprehension if one merely looks at the balance sheet to see how the money results work out in considering what amounts to hardship. The other branch of the landlords' argument on this topic was a curious one indeed, because they said that the tenants have made a profit at the old rent and at the new rent they will make a loss, and, therefore, it would be no hardship on them to lose the tenancy. That was a matter for the tenants to decide, and not, I think, a matter on which this court or the county court is in a better position than the tenants to express an opinion. I agree that the appeal fails.

Appeal dismissed.

EVERETT v. RIBBANDS AND ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), March 12, 13, 1952.]

Malicious Prosecution—Plaintiff bound over by court of summary jurisdiction—Competency of action—Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879 (c. 49), s. 25.

A On the hearing of an information laid by a police officer at the instance of a third person the plaintiff was ordered by the magistrate to enter into a recognizance and to find two sureties to keep the peace and be of good behaviour for twelve months or in default to serve one month's imprisonment. In an action by the plaintiff against the police officer and the third person for damages for malicious prosecution,

B HELD: in view of the provisions of s. 25 of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, the proceedings before the magistrate could have been determined in favour of the plaintiff; they were not so determined; and, therefore, no action for malicious prosecution lay.

E APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of DEVLIN, J., dated Oct. 11, 1951, and reported [1951] 2 All E.R. 818, in an action for damages for malicious prosecution.

The plaintiff was ordered by a metropolitan magistrate to enter into recognizances and to find two sureties of £20 each to keep the peace and be of good behaviour, or, in default, to serve a month's imprisonment, on an information laid by the second defendant, a police officer, at the instance of the first defendant, a Miss Ribbands. When the action came before DEVLIN, J., a preliminary point F was taken by the defendants that there was no case to go to the jury because the statement of claim disclosed no cause of action, the prosecution having been successful. DEVLIN, J., upheld this objection and gave judgment for the defendants.

The plaintiff appeared in person.

G Pearl for the first defendant.

G. Howard for the second defendant.

SOMERVELL, L.J., stated the facts and continued: The preliminary objection taken by the defendants was based on the rule that a plaintiff cannot bring proceedings for malicious prosecution unless the prosecution previously brought against him has failed. If he has been convicted, the action does not H lie. It was submitted that the rule applied to the present claim. The plaintiff submitted, on the authority of Steward v. Gromett (1), that the rule does not apply where a magistrate orders a person to enter into recognizances to keep the peace and be of good behaviour. In such a case, the plaintiff says, it is not necessary that the proceedings should have failed. It was submitted, however, for the defendants that the basis of that decision, creating this exception to the general rule, ceased to exist by reason of provisions of the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 25.

To see whether that is right one must look, in the first instance, at the ratio in Steward v. Gromett (1). ERLE, C.J., said (29 L.J.C.P. 175):

"The question is, whether the plaintiff had an opportunity of obtaining a determination in his favour on the demand for sureties of the peace."

He decided that the answer was "No", because, the application being made ex parte, the justices were bound to grant the order provided that the statements on oath before them satisfied the general conditions for the exercise of the jurisdiction. WILLIAMS, J., put it in this way (ibid.):

"In the case of exhibiting articles of the peace, or in the precisely analogous case of demanding sureties of the peace, the proceedings must end against the plaintiff, because he is not allowed to answer; and it is manifestly impossible to say, under those circumstances, that the existence of the proceedings, and the fact that they have not ended favourably to the plaintiff, is evidence of reasonable and probable cause for the defendant's instituting them."

CROWDER, J., said (ibid., 176) (and this is very much in accordance with ERLE, C.J.):

"The question is, whether the plaintiff had the opportunity of controverting the oath of the defendant before the magistrates? If he had, the rule applies that it is necessary for the plaintiff to show a termination of the proceedings in his own favour."

BYLES, J., in the earlier part of his judgment would appear to be following on precisely the same lines. He says (ibid.):

"The only objection made on behalf of the defendant, as I understand it, is, that the inquiry here had terminated unfavourably to the plaintiff. Whether that objection is of any force depends upon whether the plaintiff had the opportunity of being heard in his own defence."

Later, however, he indicates that he would want to reserve the point whether in all cases, even if there is a power to appear, the rule that the proceedings must have resulted in the plaintiff's favour necessarily applied. He refers to the power of challenging the issue of a capias under the Judgments Act, 1838, s. 3. So far as I follow that section, the capias issued ex parte though there was a right under s. 6 to challenge it later. That, therefore, was the position and that was the ratio of it in 1859.

The Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 25, provides:

"The power of a court of summary jurisdiction, upon complaint of any person, to adjudge a person to enter into a recognizance and find sureties to keep the peace or to be of good behaviour towards such first-mentioned person, shall be exercised by an order upon complaint, and the Summary Jurisdiction Acts shall apply accordingly, and the complainant and defendant and witnesses may be called and examined and cross-examined, and the complainant and defendants shall be subject to costs, as in the case of any other complaint."

The effect of that section was that this jurisdiction was no longer to be exercised ex parte. The defendant is before the court and can cross-examine, give evidence, and call witnesses in precisely the same way as in any other proceeding. The learned judge held that that removed the basis of the decision in Steward v. Gromett (1) and brought proceedings of this kind under the general rule.

In his submission to us the plaintiff emphasised, first, that in proceedings of this kind there is no conviction. An order to enter into sureties can issue although no criminal offence is disclosed in the complaint. I think that is right. He referred to a passage in STONE'S JUSTICES' MANUAL, 1951, vol. 1, p. 301, which says that an order under this procedure is not by way of punishment. It has been said many times that its purpose is to prevent breaches of the peace or other types of act against which an order can be directed. The plaintiff also relied on the fact that there was no appeal except possibly—and this does not seem to have been decided—by way of Special Case. There is no appeal in the ordinary way to quarter sessions. He also emphasised the general position under this procedure. As he stated, it is of somewhat vague extent, and there are very pertinent and wise observations in STONE'S JUSTICES' MANUAL, particularly with regard to the type of case which falls under "good behaviour" (ibid., p. 303). He submitted, therefore, that we ought to have regard to the nature of this jurisdiction in considering whether there ought not to be a remedy of the kind which he seeks in these proceedings. A great deal of what the plaintiff said might be relevant if anybody was considering the general nature of this jurisdiction and whether it could or could not be more precisely defined. It might also be very relevant if the appropriate authorities were considering whether it would be right to introduce a right of appeal to quarter sessions. But those are not matters with which we are concerned, nor do they, in my opinion, affect the problem before us.

I can put my reasons for coming to that conclusion quite shortly by referring to one passage from a judgment of CROMPTON, J., in Castrique v. Behrens (2) which will be found cited in Bynoe v. Bank of England (3). That was a confirmation by this court of what I have called the general rule. The passage reads ([1902] 1 K.B. 470):

"There is no doubt, on principle, and on the authorities, that an action lies for maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause setting the law of this country in motion to the damage of the plaintiff, though not for a mere conspiracy to do so without actual legal damage . . . But in such an action it is essential to show that the proceeding alleged to be instituted maliciously and without probable cause has terminated in favour of the plaintiff, if from its nature it be capable of such a termination. The reason seems to be that, if in the proceeding complained of the decision was against the plaintiff, and was still unreversed, it would not be consistent with the principle on which law is administered for another court, not being a court of appeal, to hold that the decision was come to without reasonable and probable cause'."

The principle is there stated as covering a wider field than prosecutions. Where an action of this kind is brought in respect of civil process the plaintiff has, I think, to show special damage. But the principle is the same and it seems to me clear, having regard to the change made by s. 25 of the Act of 1879, that proceedings of this kind before justices are capable of being terminated in favour of the plaintiff. He can appear and give evidence and dispute what is said by the complainant. He may be believed and, if so, no order will be made. The question is not: Was it a prosecution? It is: Were the proceedings capable of being terminated in the plaintiff's favour? I have, therefore, come to the conclusion that the learned judge was right and that the appeal fails and should be dismissed.

DENNING, L.J.: This case concerns the very ancient power of a magistrate to require a man to provide sureties. It appears from the old books that it was of two kinds—surety of the peace, which was authorised by the commission of the peace, and surety for good behaviour, which was authorised by the Justices of the Peace Act, 1361. A magistrate could not order a man to find sureties unless just cause was shown on oath. He could not order sureties of the peace unless the accused man had actually threatened the complainant with personal violence or had lain in wait for him to do him violence. He could not order sureties for good behaviour unless the accused man was of evil fame and had actually threatened to break the law of the land or by his conduct had evinced an intention to break it. In either case, if the man failed to find anyone to stand surety for him, the magistrate could commit him to prison. All this was done without the man being heard in his own defence at all. What happened was that the complainant gave evidence on oath of the relevant facts, and, thereupon, the magistrate, if satisfied by the oath, could make an order that the man should give sureties. The order might even be made in his absence. The best discussion of this subject before 1879 will be found in HAWKINS, PLEAS OF THE CROWN, vol. 1, c. 28, and BURN'S JUSTICE OF THE PEACE (1869), 30th ed., vol. 5, pp. 743-768.

It is quite plain that this procedure was not a prosecution. It was a legal process intended to prevent the man from doing wrong. It was a drastic form of quia timet proceedings. As such it had many parallels in ancient times. For instance, in a civil action if there was any suspicion that the defendant intended to abscond, a writ of capias would issue to arrest him so as to ensure his attendance in court: see BLACKSTONE'S COMMENTARIES, vol. 3, p. 282, and the Judgments Act, 1838. In these cases where the process of the law was invoked without the other party being heard, it was settled law that the injured party could bring an action for damages if he could show that the process was obtained maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause: Steward v. Gromett (1). This action was known as an action for malicious process. It differed from malicious prosecution in that there was no need for the plaintiff to prove that he had been acquitted. There could be no question of acquittal because the process issued without his innocence or guilt being decided. It issued, indeed, without his being heard at all. A modern parallel is the issue of a search warrant. If it is obtained maliciously and without reasonable and probable cause, an action lies. Since 1879 an order for sureties has entirely changed its nature. It has ceased to be a mere legal process and has become a full legal hearing. A complaint has to be served on the defendant and he must be given a full opportunity of being heard in his own defence. The procedure is the same as on any other complaint. If the court finds against the defendant, it may order him to find sureties, or, in default, be imprisoned for six months: see the Summary Jurisdiction Act, 1879, s. 25.

The plaintiff argued that, despite this change of procedure, the law remained as it was laid down in Steward v. Gromett (1). He said that an order against a man to find sureties was an anomaly, because a man who was friendless and had the misfortune not to be able to find sureties might find himself in prison without being charged with any criminal offence or having been found guilty of it. There was, he said, no appeal from the order and no power to quash it on certiorari. The only possible way of questioning it was by Case Stated on a point of law; and that was no remedy in the case of perjury by the complainant. He urged, therefore, that there should be a remedy by an action for malicious process, even though an order had been made against him.

If I thought that an order to find sureties was today a mere legal process, as it was before 1879, I would be in favour of the plaintiff's argument. But I do not think it is today a mere legal process. It now bears many of the characteristics of a criminal proceeding. The procedure is much the same as in the case of a summary offence. The substance of the matter is not only fear of what the accused man may do, but also a complaint of something he has already done—some words or conduct which give rise to apprehension of disorder or other breach of the law. An order can only be made against him if two things exist—(i) a threat by words or conduct to break the law of the land or to do something which is likely to result in a breach, and (ii) a reasonable fear that this threat will be carried into effect. The order, once made, will result in imprisonment if the accused man has no friends to stand by him. This imprisonment must be founded on something actually done by him. It would be contrary to all principle for a man to be punished, not for what he has already done, but for what he may hereafter do. Hence there must be something actually done by him, such as threats of violence, interference with the course of justice, or other conduct which gives rise to the fear that there will be a breach of the law. It is this conduct which is the subject of the complaint and which must be proved before an order for sureties can be made. In these circumstances it seems to me that the proceedings are analogous to a criminal proceeding and that no action lies for maliciously instituting them unless they have ended favourably for the plaintiff. In the present case they ended unfavourably for the plaintiff. An order was made against him. This action, therefore, does not lie. I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

ROMER, L.J.: I agree that this appeal fails. I think it is a pity that this point was not set down as a preliminary point of law before the hearing. The action was a substantial one. I understand it was estimated to last three days, and I can well believe that it would. The point of law, if decided, as it has been, against the plaintiff, would have been decisive of the case. Although there may have been good reason for not applying, I should have thought this was the very class of case in which an application ought to have been made under Ord. 25, r. 2, to have the point determined before the hearing so as to save all discovery of documents, the collecting together of witnesses, and so on, and have the question decided at a very early stage. Where there is a point of law which, if decided in one way, is going to be decisive of litigation, advantage ought to be taken of the facilities afforded by the rules of court to have it disposed of at the close of pleadings or very shortly afterwards.

Appeal dismissed.

Re GAPE'S WILL TRUSTS. VEREY AND ANOTHER v. GAPE AND OTHERS.

C.A. [1952] 2 All E.R. 579.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Roxburgh, J.), March 13, 1952.]

Will — Condition — Certainty — Condition subsequent — "Take up permanent residence in England".

By her will, dated Oct. 27, 1942, a testatrix, who died on Dec. 30, 1950, directed that her residuary estate should be held on trust for various people in succession. She further provided: "every person who under the trusts aforesaid (including the divesting limitations in this clause contained) shall become entitled in possession of my residuary estate as tenant for life or in tail male or in tail shall within six months from the date of becoming so entitled take up permanent residence in England and in default of continuance of compliance with this condition or in case of subsequent discontinuance of compliance with this condition the trusts hereinbefore declared in favour of such person and his issue shall determine . . ."

HELD: the words "take up permanent residence in England" meant "take up residence in England with the intention that such residence should be permanent", and, so construed, the words embodied a concept of a sufficient degree of certainty for the defeasance clause to be valid.

ADJOURNED SUMMONS to determine, inter alia, whether on the true construction of the will of Sibyl Marion Geraldine Gape, deceased, a condition subsequent contained therein requiring the persons beneficially entitled "to take up permanent residence in England" was valid or was void for uncertainty or for any other reason.

Peter Foster for the plaintiffs, the trustees of the will.

C. Montgomery White, Q.C., and Hunter-Brown for the first four defendants, James Nugent Gape and his children, who resided permanently in America.

K. J. T. Elphinstone for the fifth, sixth, seventh and eighth defendants, Kenneth Henry Surtees Gape and his children, who resided permanently in America.

Cross, Q.C., and T. A. C. Burgess for the remaining defendants, who either resided or were prepared to reside in England.

ROXBURGH, J.: The testatrix, Sibyl Marion Geraldine Gape, of Caxton Manor, Caxton, Cambridgeshire, a widow, made her will on Oct. 27, 1942, and died on Dec. 30, 1950. She directed that her residuary estate should be held on the following trusts, that is to say:

"upon trust for James Nugent Gape . . . for his life with remainder in trust for the first and every other son of the said James Nugent Gape successively according to their respective seniorities in tail with remainder Upon trust for Kenneth Henry Surtees Gape . . . for his life with remainder in trust for the first and every other son of the said Kenneth Henry Surtees Gape successively according to their respective seniorities in tail", with divers remainders over. By cl. 10 she provided:

"every person who under the trusts aforesaid (including the divesting limitations in this clause contained) shall become entitled in possession of my residuary estate as tenant for life or in tail male or in tail shall within six months from the date of becoming so entitled take up permanent residence in England and in default of continuance of compliance with this condition or in case of subsequent discontinuance of compliance with this condition the trusts hereinbefore declared in favour of such person and his issue shall determine and become void as if such person were then dead and if tenant in tail male or tenant in tail there was a general failure of his or her issue and in such case the residuary estate shall be held " on certain trusts therein set out.

James Nugent Gape and his children and Kenneth Henry Surtees Gape and his children are permanently residing in America. On the other hand, other remaindermen are either residing or prepared to reside in England. Mr. James Gape and Mr. Kenneth Gape and their families are anxious to obtain the benefits provided for them by the testatrix without being made subject to the burden to which she plainly intended to subject them. It is plain that, if the testatrix

A were asked whether these latter persons should in the circumstances inherit any part of her residuary estate, her answer would be "No", but it is said, and said truly, that the forfeiture clause is a condition subsequent and that there are decisions of highest authority which, in certain cases, empower beneficiaries subjected to a forfeiture clause to take the benefit of a testator's dispositions without accepting the burdens which he plainly sought to impose. Counsel for

B Mr. James Gape and Mr. Kenneth Gape argued that this is such a case and that it is wholly irrelevant that their clients are in America and are flouting the intentions of the testatrix. To that extent they are right. In deciding the question of law with which I am confronted, it is wholly irrelevant that they are flouting the testatrix' intentions.

Counsel for Mr. James Gape and Mr. Kenneth Gape rely on the well-known cases of Clayton v. Ramsden (1) and Sifton v. Sifton (2), a decision of the Privy Council. Sifton v. Sifton (2), undoubtedly, bears a close resemblance to the present case. The principle to be deduced from Clayton v. Ramsden (1) and Sifton v. Sifton (2) I have already endeavoured to formulate in Re Hatch (3), and I desire to add nothing to what I there said. I said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 291):

"The next question which arises is whether the defeasance clause is void for uncertainty. Here I must apply the principles enunciated in Clavering v. Ellison (4) and Clayton v. Ramsden (1). To do this I must first construe the clause in its context and then I must see whether any phrase, when so construed, embodies a concept which lacks a sufficient degree of certainty."

Then I discussed the phrase in that case, which was quite different from that in the present case. I continued (ibid.):

"It is true that cases can be propounded which to one mind may seem to fall within the ambit of the phrase and to another mind may seem to fall outside it. Several such cases have been propounded during the argument, but, on analysis, they all seem to me merely to raise doubts which can be resolved by properly applying the ordinary principles of construction to the phrase employed in the circumstances supposed. I do not think they point to any inherent uncertainty in the phrase itself."

I cite that passage as indicating my approach to the present problem.

The first thing I have to do is to construe the words in the present case. The words are "take up permanent residence in England". I do not feel much doubt about their meaning. I understand them to mean "to take up residence in England with the intention that such residence should be permanent".

G The question, then, which I have to determine is whether that phrase, when so construed, embodies a concept which lacks a sufficient degree of certainty. First, I must consider Sifton v. Sifton (2). The disposition in the defeasance clause in that case was

"payments to my said daughter shall be made only so long as she shall continue to reside in Canada."

H LORD ROMER said ([1938] 3 All E.R. 445):

"If the clause in question be in truth a condition subsequent—a point with which their Lordships will deal later on—it can be of no validity unless, to use the words of LORD CRANWORTH [in Clavering v. Ellison (4) (7 H.L. Cas. 725)], the court and, their Lordships venture to add, the parties concerned—can see from the beginning precisely and distinctly upon the happening of what events it is that the payments to the appellant are to cease. In their Lordships' opinion, it is impossible to define these events precisely or distinctly."

Later, he said (ibid.):

"None of those judges [in the courts below] defined, or attempted to define, precisely or distinctly the events that would constitute a ceasing on the part of the appellant to reside in Canada. Had they attempted to do so, they must, in their Lordships' judgment, have failed, because they would have been attempting the impossible. Their Lordships' attention was called during the arguments to numerous authorities in which the court has been called upon to consider the meaning of the words 'reside' and 'residence', and the like. These authorities, however, give their Lordships no assistance in construing the present will. The meaning of such words obviously depends upon the context in which the words are used. A condition, for instance, attached to the devise of a house that the devisee should reside in the house for at least six weeks in a year can present no difficulty. In some contexts, the word 'reside' may clearly denote what is sometimes called 'being in residence' at a particular house. In other contexts, it may mean merely maintaining a house in a fit state for residence. It is plain, however, that in the present case the word 'reside' means something different from either being in residence or merely maintaining a residence. No one can suppose that the testator intended either that his daughter should never leave Canada, or that, so long as she maintained a residence in Canada, she might spend the whole of her time abroad. He must have intended that, though Canada was to be her home in general, yet she was to be at liberty to leave Canada for some purposes and for some periods of time. Unfortunately, he omitted to define either the purposes or the periods."

There are, undoubtedly, passages in that speech which favour Mr. James Gape and Mr. Kenneth Gape, and it is, therefore, necessary for me to consider very carefully how Sifton v. Sifton (2) has been dealt with in a later case. It was certainly approved in Clayton v. Ramsden (1) which related to quite a different set of words, but it has been more closely considered in a more similar case to which I must shortly return. For the moment I propose to consider how far the present phrase "take up permanent residence in England" is to be assimilated to and how far it is to be differentiated from the phrase in Sifton v. Sifton (2). For the moment I will leave out the words "continue to", because in his discussion of the words "reside" and "residence", to which I have just referred, LORD ROMER does not refer to the possible bearing on those words of the words "continue to". It seems to me that, if somebody said to me: "I am going to reside in South Africa", I should instinctively ask: "For how long?", because the phrase presents an incomplete mental picture, an incomplete concept. It is quite ambiguous. It might mean for a few weeks; it might mean for ever; it might mean for a particular mission. It is, I should have thought, a concept which lacks a sufficient degree of certainty. Supposing a person from South Africa said to me: "I am going to continue to reside in South Africa", I think that that phrase, without further explanation, would also embody a concept which lacked a sufficient degree of certainty. If one knew something about the circumstances of the speaker and the circumstances in which he had gone to reside in South Africa, that knowledge might supply the answer to the uncertainty involved in the concept, but to a person who was in complete ignorance of those circumstances I do not think the mere statement: "I shall continue to reside in South Africa", would present a mental picture having a sufficient degree of certainty. If, however, somebody said to me: "I am going to take up permanent residence in South Africa", I think that that, as a concept, would be plain and precise. Yet, on the other hand, those very questions could be asked which LORD ROMER asked in Sifton v. Sifton (2). Even though a person told me that he intended to take up permanent residence in South Africa, I should not suppose that he never intended to leave South Africa for any period or for any purpose, and yet he had omitted to define either the purposes or the period in respect of which he might be absent from South Africa. Am I bound to say that the phrase "permanent residence" embodies a concept having an insufficient degree of certainty because those questions are unanswered?

A I must find the answer to my own question by looking further into the authorities.

First, I refer to three lines in the speech of LORD CHELMSFORD in Bell v. Kennedy (5). That was a case of domicile, but it is not for that reason that I am referring to it. Before considering the facts of the case at all, LORD CHELMSFORD said (L.R. 1 Sc. & Div. 319):

B "It may be conceded that if the intention of permanently residing in a place exists, a residence in pursuance of that intention, however short, will establish a domicile."

I am not considering those lines as an exposition of the law of domicile, but

C "the intention of permanently residing in a place" appears to me to be a phrase embodying a concept. It was used for the purpose of expounding the ingredients of domicile, and it would be strange if LORD CHELMSFORD, in making such an exposition, made use of a phrase which did not embody a concept having a sufficient degree of certainty, and yet LORD ROMER's questions in Sifton v. Sifton (2) could be put to him too. He might have been asked: "How long may a man leave the place in question and for what purpose, and yet be able to D say that he is permanently residing there?" and in answer I suspect that LORD CHELMSFORD would have said that no certain answer to those questions could be given, but I do not think that he would have admitted that his phrase embodied a concept having an insufficient degree of certainty.

Precisely the same process can be applied to a passage in the speech of LORD MACMILLAN in Bowie (or Ramsay) v. Liverpool Royal Infirmary (6) which is

E another case of domicile. LORD MACMILLAN said ([1930] A.C. 597):

"The acquisition of a domicile of choice is a legal inference which is drawn from the concurrence of evidence of the physical fact of residence with evidence of the mental fact of intention that such residence shall be permanent."

F There, again, the same questions, I think, could be put to LORD MACMILLAN, and he would, I think, give the same answer, but I do not think that he would admit that his phrase embodied an uncertain concept.

Next I would refer to the decision of JENKINS, J., in Re Coxen (7), and to the cases cited by him. The phrases in that case were that the trustees were to permit the testator's wife "to reside" in a certain dwelling-house, "during her

G life or for so long as she shall desire to reside therein" and declared "that from and after her death or if in the opinion of my trustees she shall have ceased permanently to reside therein", the house was to fall into his residuary trusts. JENKINS, J., held that the provision for the determination of the wife's interest was sufficiently defined to enable the trustees to come to a proper decision, and yet I should have thought that the same questions which LORD ROMER propounded in Sifton v. Sifton (2) might have been applied in connection with the

H phrases there used and would have been equally difficult to answer.

There are many passages in the judgment in Re Coxen (7) which throw light on the present case. JENKINS, J. ([1948] 2 All E.R. 501), discussed the decision of TOMLIN, J., in Re Wilkinson (8). In that case—which was before Sifton v. Sifton (2) and did not in fact relate to a condition subsequent, and I must, therefore, be careful not to place too much weight on it on this occasion—the testatrix had given the income of a fund to a niece

"for and during the term of her natural life or until she shall voluntarily cease to make the said dwelling-house her permanent home."

In his judgment TOMLIN, J., said ([1926] Ch. 849):

"I confess I do not feel any difficulty in giving a rational meaning to the words 'to make the dwelling-house her permanent home'; I think it is reasonably plain what that means; it seems to me it means, to keep it up as what may be colloquially called her headquarters. I do not think there is any particular difficulty in attaching a reasonable meaning to the phrase. I do not propose, and I do not think it necessary for me today to define precisely what I understand the phrase to mean. I am satisfied that it bears a sufficiently definite meaning to enable me to say that there is no case of uncertainty which renders the gift in any way bad, or defective."

JENKINS, J., then discussed Re Talbot-Ponsonby's Estate (9), where CROSSMAN, J., held

"with respect to a devise of an estate to the testator's son 'upon condition that he made the same his home' that the condition was not void for uncertainty."

JENKINS, J., then reverted to Sifton v. Sifton (2) and he said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 501) that he deduced from that

"(a) that the meaning (whether definite or uncertain) of the words 'reside' and 'residence' in a will depends on the context in which the words are used, (b) that in some contexts a perfectly definite meaning can be attached to such words, and (c) that the words 'reside' and 'residence' have different (and less readily ascertainable) implications when used in relation to residence in a particular country from those which they have when used in relation to residence in a particular house."

I may say as regards that last deduction, that whilst I recognise the passages in LORD ROMER's speech which led JENKINS, J., to that conclusion, I am not quite clear why, as a matter of principle as distinct from context and construction, the word "reside" should have different and less readily ascertainable implications when used in relation to "residence in a particular country." I should have been inclined to think that the implications and differences would arise almost entirely from the context in which the words were used and the circumstances in which the words were used. JENKINS, J., proceeds (ibid.):

"There is, therefore, nothing in Sifton v. Sifton (2) which precludes me from holding the condition here in question to be a valid condition provided I am able to attach a sufficiently definite meaning to it in the context afforded by the codicil, and (as shown by Re Wilkinson (8) and Re Talbot-Ponsonby's Estate (9)) in deciding whether I am able to do so or not I must keep in mind the distinction between uncertainty as to the events prescribed by the testator as those in which the condition is to operate (which is, generally speaking, fatal to the validity of such a condition) and difficulty in ascertaining whether those events (sufficiently prescribed by the testator as a matter of definition) have happened or not, which is not necessarily fatal to such validity."

I do not understand JENKINS, J., as predicating an approach different from that which I have adopted, though we have expressed ourselves in different language. I think that there is really no difference in meaning between "sufficiently prescribing the events as a matter of definition" and using a phrase "embodying a concept having a sufficient degree of certainty." As I say, JENKINS, J., was able to hold that the phrase with which he was concerned was valid. He said (ibid., 502):

"It seems to me that so far as definition goes the double event involved in the condition as I have construed it is prescribed with sufficient certainty and precision."

In my judgment, those questions which were asked by LORD ROMER could have been put to the draughtsman of the will in Re Coxen (7) and would not have been susceptible of an answer. Therefore, it seems to me, for the reasons which I have given, that a phrase may embody a concept of sufficient certainty, or, putting it in another way, "events may be sufficiently prescribed by a testator as a matter of definition", even though those questions cannot be answered. If that be so, in my judgment, the phrase "take up permanent residence in England" embodies a conception which is clear and precise even though I cannot answer every question which might be asked with regard to it.

Order accordingly.

BENN v. KAMM & CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.J.J.), March 13, 14, 1952.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Duty to fence—Horizontal milling machine—"Stop" at side of platform—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 14 (1)—Horizontal Milling Machines Regulations, 1928 (S.R. & O., 1928, No. 548), reg. 3.

The plaintiff, a charge hand employed by the defendants, was injured while adjusting a stop on a horizontal milling machine in a factory occupied by the defendants. The Horizontal Milling Machines Regulations, 1928, reg. 3, provides for the fencing of horizontal milling machine cutters by a strong guard, but the regulations do not prescribe fencing for any other part of the machine. In an action by the plaintiff against the defendant for breach of their statutory duty to fence the machine,

HELD: the regulations did not define exhaustively the duty of the occupier of a factory qua horizontal milling machines; so far as fencing was concerned, they regulated only the fencing necessary for a cutter and did not apply to a dangerous part of the machine other than a cutter; and, therefore, the general duty laid down in s. 14 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, applied to the absence of fencing of the stop and the plaintiff was entitled to recover.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from the judgment of PARKER, J., dated Dec. 7, 1951, and reported ante, p. 56, dismissing his claim against the defendants, his employers, for damages for personal injuries sustained in an accident in their factory.

The plaintiff, who had suffered amputation of part of a finger, contended, first, that the defendants had been guilty of common law negligence because, while he was adjusting a machine, another employee failed to turn off the power and so caused the accident, and, secondly, that the defendants had committed a breach of statutory duty in not fencing or otherwise providing a safeguard for a dangerous machine.

F. Donald McIntyre for the plaintiff.

Marven Everett for the defendants.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: The plaintiff claims damages for personal injury against his employers, the defendants. At the time of the accident he was working at their factory as a charge hand, and, in carrying out his duties, he went to adjust a horizontal milling machine, had an accident, and had to have the top of the index finger of the left hand completely removed. He was called to that machine by an apprentice, then aged about nineteen, named Toombs. The machinery wanted adjusting. The evidence as accepted by PARKER, J., was that the plaintiff told Toombs to switch off the power which operated the machine, but it is clear that he began his adjustment before the power was switched off, and so the accident was caused. In his claim as originally put forward one of the allegations against his employers was that Toombs had been negligent, and, if that were so, under the law as it now is, the defendants would be liable. PARKER, J., found against that, and that is not proceeded with before us. The plaintiff also claimed against the defendants on the ground of breach of statutory duty, and, alternatively, a breach of their common law obligation to take reasonable care for his safety. In respect of those matters, the defendants alleged that, if they were liable, the plaintiff's own negligence contributed to the accident.

The main structure of the machine at which the accident happened consists of a moving platform where pieces of metal are placed on which a circular saw is to operate. The platform with the pieces of metal on it proceeds under hydraulic pressure electrically operated either from left to right or right to left, and while that is happening the saw operates on the pieces of metal. When the platform has reached the end of its journey it returns under power very suddenly to the position from which it started. The accident happened in this way. The plaintiff was seeking to adjust what is called a "stop" at the side of the platform. He believed that the power had been switched off, but it had not been. It may be that, when he actually put his hand and fingers round the stop, the platform had reached the instant of time when, having moved, say, from left to right, it was on the point of shooting back from right to left. It shot back and the plaintiff's finger was crushed between the stop and a piece of metal under the platform against which the stop came. The judge, having considered the evidence and the question of Toombs's negligence, dealt with the position under s. 14, the relevant section, of the Factories Act, 1937. He came to the conclusion that it would be possible to fit a guard over the dangerous part of the machine where the stop comes in front of the base of the platform. It is plain that, apart from the point with which I am about to deal and which was the main point argued in this court, PARKER, J., would have come to the conclusion that there was here a breach of s. 14 (1), the relevant words of which are as follows:

"Every dangerous part of any machinery . . . shall be securely fenced unless it is in such a position or of such construction as to be as safe to every person employed or working on the premises as it would be if securely fenced . . ."

The point taken was similar to one which came before this court for the first time in 1944 in Miller v. William Boothman & Sons, Ltd. (1) with reference to a circular saw. There had been a decision by SALTER, J., in Davies v. Thomas Owen & Co. (2) that the application of s. 10 (1) (c) of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (the predecessor of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1937) to a circular saw involved

A that the saw could not be worked at all, because, if it were securely fenced, access could not be got to it to enable it to cut whatever it was intended to cut. The Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, reg. 10, provided that a guard was to extend from the top of the riving knife to a point as low as practicable at the cutting edge of the saw. The question in Miller v. Boothman (William) & Sons, Ltd. (1) was whether that regulation modified the effect of s. 14 (1) of the Act of 1937, it being deemed, under s. 159 (1) of the Act to have been made under that Act. In Miller's case (1) this court held that regulations made under the earlier Act and continued in force by the provision to which I have referred in the later Act could modify the effect of any relevant section in the later Act. The judgment of the court was read by GODDARD, L.J. He referred to the decision of SALTER, J., in Davies' case (2) and to the importance of there being a regulation-making power and later held that there was power to modify what I may call the rigour of the general words of the Act. Otherwise the result of the general words of s. 14 (1) would render the use of circular saws for the industry of the country wholly impossible. GODDARD, L.J. said ([1944] 1 All E.R. 335):

C “In our opinion, these regulations must be regarded as modifying the provisions of s. 14 in respect of these machines and of substituting the prescribed guarding and fencing for the absolutely secure fencing which the section would otherwise require.”

D That principle was applied in this court in Nicholls v. Austin (Leyton), Ltd. (3), which again dealt with the Woodworking Machinery Regulations, 1922, as applicable to a circular saw. In that case a piece of wood shot out from the machine and did the injury. The decision of this court was based on the principle in Miller v. William Boothman & Sons, Ltd. (1). Nicholls' case (3) went to the House of Lords where it was decided on another ground which I need not trouble to state, the correctness of the decision in Miller v. William Boothman & Sons, Ltd. (1) not being dealt with, and so it continued to bind this court. The same point came before this court in Franklin v. Gramophone Co., Ltd. (4). There the regulations were the Grinding of Metals (Miscellaneous Industries) Regulations, 1925. There was an exemption in those regulations that nothing in them was to apply to “any processes in or incidental to the sharpening of tools . . . except as regards any part of the factory in which one or more persons are wholly or mainly employed in such work.”

F The first issue was whether the place where the plaintiff was came within the exception and also whether it was a place in which one or more persons were wholly or mainly employed in such work. I only mention that to show that the argument turned on matters which were expressly dealt with (as, in my opinion, in the circular saw case) by the regulations.

G I do not think that there is any real assistance in those cases on the point which has arisen here. They show, of course, that this court will proceed on the basis that regulations can modify the liabilities and duties imposed by the Act, but the point which arises here is whether the regulations with which we are concerned—the Milling Machines Regulations, 1928—relieve the defendants of the duty under which PARKER, J., I think, would have found them to be if no regulation had been made. The regulations were made in pursuance of s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, and were continued under the Act of 1937 and under the heading “Duties” they provide:

“It shall be the duty of the occupier to observe Part I of these regulations.

It shall be the duty of every person employed to observe Part II of these regulations.”

H Part I of the regulations deals with various matters other than fencing. In reg. 1 they deal with maintaining in good order, and so on, the floor immediately surrounding the machine. That matter is dealt with in s. 25 and s. 26 of the Factories Act, 1937. There is a regulation which deals with sufficient and suitable lighting, and then, by reg. 3 (i), on the construction of which this case turns:

"The cutter or cutters of every horizontal milling machine shall be fenced by a strong guard, properly adjusted to the work, which shall enclose the whole cutting surface except such part as is necessarily exposed for the milling operations . . . "

It goes on to say that a guard shall be provided with adequate side flanges and so on. There are exemptions which come before Part I, by way of anticipation of it, and they start in this way: "Nothing in reg. 3 shall apply to any milling cutter used on" and then an example is given, "or when used for", and other examples are given. Then there is a proviso:

"Provided that these exemptions shall not prejudice the application of s. 10 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, in regard to fencing of such machinery."

That shows that, so far as the exemptions are concerned, the general provisions of s. 10 of the Act of 1901 (now s. 14 of the Act of 1937) apply.

Counsel for the defendants—and this is the view accepted by PARKER, J.—submits that these regulations define exhaustively the duty of an occupier quoad fencing horizontal milling machines. Applying, therefore, Miller v. William Boothman & Sons, Ltd. (1) and the other cases, if an occupier quoad the cutter complies with the regulations, he will have done all that the law requires, and it cannot be said that the necessity of any further precautions are to be derived from the general words of s. 14 (1) of the Act. Counsel for the plaintiff submits that if, as here, there is on a milling machine a dangerous part other than the cutter, that is a subject-matter with which the regulations do not purport to deal and the general duty under s. 14 (1) is applicable. I have come to the conclusion that that is right. I think that, if it had been intended by the regulation to define exhaustively the fencing duties in respect of these machines, different words would have been used. Counsel for the defendants admitted that, notwithstanding the regulation, if a machine of this kind contained a flywheel within s. 12 or transmission machinery within s. 13, the duties under those sections remained. I cannot see why, if there is what I call a separate subject of danger which falls within the general words of s. 14 (1), the duty under that section should be regarded as removed by the words of this regulation. I think they are inapt to have that effect. For these reasons, in my opinion, this appeal should succeed. PARKER, J., adopted the wider construction. The case must depend on the construction of the regulations, and in that respect I have come to a different conclusion which I have stated. The question of common law liability does not arise, but it was dealt with in argument and I see no reason to dissent from the conclusion of PARKER, J., that there was no breach at common law for the reasons which he gave. On the question of contributory negligence I think on the evidence that the conduct of the plaintiff contributed to the accident and that, therefore, he must bear a part of the damage. I think the damages should be borne equally by the plaintiff and the defendants. On the basis of the figure found by PARKER, J., that would involve judgment for £817 10s. To that extent I think the appeal should be allowed.

DENNING, L.J.: I agree. I am confirmed in the view that we should allow this appeal because PARKER, J., would have himself decided in favour of the plaintiff, but for the fact that he felt himself bound by authority. He said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 57)

"... it seems ... an extraordinary proposition that, because the regulations have said that dangerous part A shall be guarded in a particular way, there is no obligation to guard dangerous parts B, C, D, and E."

Now that we have had the benefit of full argument on the cases, I think that proposition is no part of the law. It seems to me that when the regulations say that a particular dangerous part is to be guarded in a particular way, the occupier satisfies his statutory obligations in regard to that part by guarding it in that way, but he remains under his ordinary statutory obligations in regard to other dangerous parts. In the present case these regulations prescribe the way in which one particular danger is to be met, namely, the danger from the cutter of a milling machine, but they do not prescribe anything about any other dangerous part of the machine. The obligation to provide safeguards for those dangerous parts is to be found in the Act itself, in particular, s. 14 (1). That sub-section contains an absolute obligation which the occupier has not fulfilled. He is not absolved from responsibility by the fact that the factory inspector never required him to fence those parts, nor do I think we should pay any regard to that fact when assessing the share of responsibility which the parties should bear. A breach of statutory duty having been proved, which would give a careful plaintiff a cause of action for his full damages, the only question under the Law Reform (Contributory Negligence) Act, 1945, is by what amount the full figure should be reduced, having regard to this plaintiff's share in the responsibility for the damages. PARKER, J., on reviewing the facts, felt bound to say that the plaintiff did an act which was, to say the least, extremely rash. In the circumstances, I agree with my Lord that the proper proportions are half and half, and that we should allow the appeal accordingly.

ROMER, L.J.: I also agree. As we are differing from PARKER, J., on the question of the liability of the employers I would just add a few words on the question of the regulations and the liability under s. 14 (1). Counsel for the defendants pointed to s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901, the section under which these regulations were made in 1928, which provides:

"Where the Secretary of State is satisfied that any manufacture, machinery, plant, process, or description of manual labour is dangerous . . . he may certify that manufacture, machinery, plant, process, or description of manual labour to be dangerous; and thereupon the Secretary of State may, subject to the provisions of this Act, make such regulations as appear to him to be reasonably practicable, and to meet the necessity of the case."

That provision is repeated in s. 60 of the Factories Act, 1937, but that section omits the requirement as to certifying. Counsel for the defendant contends that the section was dealing with machinery as a unit, that the function of the Secretary of State is to pay regard to a unit of machinery, that, if he contemplates that it is dangerous machinery, he may give a certificate, and that then he has to diagnose the dangers and make regulations to meet them. Thus, says counsel for the defendants, you arrive by means of a series of regulations at a code which covers all the dangers of the unit. He suggests that that is just what has happened in this case. It is plain that a set of regulations may be so comprehensive as to prescribe safeguards for all known dangers, and, if so, they would amount to a complete code which, on the authorities to which my Lord has referred, would supersede s. 14 (1) or any other relevant enactment, but it is always a question whether that has or has not been done. I am of opinion on the whole that on the construction of s. 79 of the Factory and Workshop Act, 1901 (or s. 60 of the Factories Act, 1937), it is open to the Minister to deal with some specific dangers and not others. He does not have, as counsel for the defendants suggested, to exercise his functions by taking a piece of machinery as a unit, considering all its dangers, and prescribing remedies and safeguards to meet them. In the present case he has merely selected one dangerous feature of the particular machinery, namely, the cutters, and has made regulations to deal with that feature. In so far as the regulations prescribe safeguards for the cutters, on the authorities those regulations are sufficient, but, in so far as they do not deal with other dangers, those other dangers remain subject to s. 14 and the obligation of the employer in relation to them continues. Consequently, as this piece of apparatus was undoubtedly dangerous in a way that was not mentioned in the regulations, the employers were still liable under s. 14 (1) in relation to it, and the regulations afford no answer to the claim. I do not think that the cases which were cited carry the matter very far, because the point never actually arose in any of them, and, although some of the language which is to be found in them appears to be wide enough to afford support for the contrary view, they have to be read in relation to the facts before the court, and, read in relation to those facts, I do not think they provide any assistance. They certainly do not compel this court to arrive at a contrary view to that which has been indicated. For the rest I entirely agree with what has been said, including the apportionment of fifty per cent.

Goshey v Goshey 1964*

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Lord Merriman, P., and Karminski, J.), February 21, 1952.]

Divorce — Connivance — Adultery by husband — No condonation by wife — Continuance of connivance — "Natural consequence" of wife's connivance — Husband's desertion and wilful neglect to maintain.

In August, 1950, the husband and the wife went on a caravan holiday with Mr. and Mrs. B., the husband then committing adultery with Mrs. B. and the wife with Mr. B., each party knowing of the adultery of the other. Shortly after the return home of the husband and wife, the wife gave up her adulterous association with Mr. B. In June, 1951, Mrs. B. gave birth to a child of which the husband admitted paternity. On Nov. 15, 1951, he left the matrimonial home and went to live with Mrs. B., and since that date he had paid no maintenance to the wife. Justices found the husband guilty of adultery, desertion, and wilful neglect to maintain, and made an order for maintenance in the wife's favour. On appeal by the husband, HELD: (i) the husband's adultery in August, 1950, had been connived at by the wife; there was no finding by the justices that this adultery had been condoned; and, therefore, her connivance continued in existence and she was not entitled to an order on the ground of the husband's adultery.

Gorst v. Gorst ([1951] 2 All E.R. 956), distinguished.

(ii) the husband's conduct in leaving the wife and failing to pay her maintenance was not the "natural consequence" of her connivance at his adultery, and, as her own adultery had been connived at by the husband, she was entitled to an order for maintenance on the grounds of desertion and wilful neglect to maintain.

Case referred to:

APPEAL by the husband against an order of Southampton borough justices dated Dec. 12, 1951, whereby they directed him to pay maintenance to his wife on the ground of his adultery, desertion and wilful neglect to maintain her.

Willett for the husband.

Brodrick for the wife.

LORD MERRIMAN, P.: This is a husband's appeal from an order for maintenance at the rate of £2 15s. a week made by justices for the borough of Southampton on Dec. 12, 1951, in favour of the wife, on the three grounds of the husband's adultery, desertion and wilful neglect to provide her with reasonable maintenance. The substance of the case is whether any, and if so which, of the findings can stand.

It is common ground that in August, 1950, this husband and wife went with another couple, named Burfitt, for a caravan holiday together with the three daughters of the Burfitts and another child and that in that atmosphere, with those young people about, on at least two occasions, by mutual consent these spouses agreed to an exchange of partners. It is common ground that both pairs of spouses have committed adultery, and, so far, it is as plain a case of connivance on both sides as could well be imagined, and there is no more to be said about that. But it is said that there came a change. The justices have found that, shortly after this holiday period the wife and Burfitt came to the conclusion that they had been very wrong in what they had done, and they refrained from any further intercourse. On the other hand, Mrs. Burfitt had conceived, and, according to the wife, the husband, who was not called before the justices, admitted the paternity of her child, which was born in June, 1951. It is clear that from the middle of November, 1951, they have thrown in their lot together, and, according to the evidence of Mrs. Burfitt, are still living together and committing adultery with each other. The husband left the matrimonial home with which we are concerned on Nov. 15, 1951. He has never returned, and, so far as I can see from the evidence and the findings, he has no intention of returning. It is in respect of that parting and the fact that since that parting he has not been maintaining, or adequately maintaining, his wife that she has brought the charges of desertion and wilful neglect to maintain. The justices held as regards the adultery that, although it is unquestionable that there was mutual connivance in the first instance, in connection with the later adultery as from the time when the husband left the wife (and, of course, strictly speaking, it is the later adultery with which the court was concerned, because it had to be satisfied that adultery was committed within six months of the issue of the summons) the earlier connivance had spent itself within the meaning of the judgment of KARMINSKI, J., in Gorst v. Gorst (1). I do not think it necessary to pursue the argument about the finding of adultery on which in part the justices have based their order, because it is clear that the vital point on which counsel for the wife would have been prepared to rely has not been the subject of a specific finding. We do not know what view the justices would have taken about the all-important point whether the original connivance had been got rid of by subsequent condonation.

I propose, therefore, now to deal solely with the findings of desertion and wilful neglect to maintain. I have already said that it is impossible to dispute the finding of the justices that there has been a parting with the intention of breaking up cohabitation finally and against the will of the wife. It is not sought to argue that the wife's original adultery in August and September, 1950, is a bar under s. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, to her obtaining an order on the ground of desertion, because that adultery was connived at, even if it has not subsequently been condoned, by the husband. But it is said that it follows from the fact that she connived at her husband's adultery that she is precluded for ever, whatever the circumstances may be, from relying on any matrimonial offence which can possibly be said to flow from the adultery thus connived at. This is said to be an application of the principle that she must be taken to intend the natural consequences of her act in permitting this disgraceful business in August and September, 1950. It is said, of course truly, that it does appear to have been one of the natural consequences that a child was conceived, but whether that is a "natural consequence" within the meaning of the proposition which has been put forward is another thing. It is said that the wife, in conniving at that adultery, must have contemplated that something of the sort would happen, that in any case the husband would get fonder of the other woman than he was of her, and that in the course of time it would necessarily lead to his leaving her for the other woman, and, therefore, that it is impossible for her to complain of desertion because she is really the authoress of her own wrong in that connection. Further, it is said that it is equally impossible for her to complain of wilful neglect to maintain.

I find it impossible to follow that sequence of ideas. The wife did everything that was possible to prevent the disruption of her marriage and to make it clear that she for her part was anxious, or, at any rate, ready and willing, to continue the cohabitation on the basis that what had happened was forgiven and forgotten. On the findings in this case (by which the husband is bound, as he has not given any evidence to contradict them)—that the wife made attempts to get her husband to change his attitude towards her, visited the probation officer for advice, and objected during the time she and her husband were still living together to his even taking Mrs. Burfitt out to a cinema or anything of that sort—it seems to me to be impossible to dispute the conclusion that when he left her on Nov. 15, 1951, it was against her will, and the further conclusion that since that date he has wilfully neglected to provide reasonable maintenance for her. To those findings the justices rightly applied the terms of s. 6 of the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, because, as was admitted, it is impossible to argue that, even if her adultery had not been condoned, it had not clearly been connived at by the husband. In my view, on the facts the justices were fully entitled to find that the husband had deserted the wife and that he had been guilty of wilful neglect to maintain her, and I decline to hold that his conduct in doing these things was a necessary or natural consequence of what happened in August and September, 1950, or that the wife is the authoress of her own wrong. The appeal should be allowed to the extent of varying the order by striking out the ground of adultery, but otherwise the appeal fails.

KARMINSKI, J.: I agree, and only wish to add a very few words for myself on the issue of adultery. The justices applied, perhaps too narrowly, some observations which appeared in Gorst v. Gorst (1) to which my Lord has referred, and they failed, in my view, to pay full attention to all the circumstances of the present case in deciding whether or not the wife's connivance of the husband's adultery had spent itself at the time of the adultery complained of. The facts in Gorst v. Gorst (1) were peculiar and very different from those in the present case. The petitioning wife in Gorst v. Gorst (1) had consented to adultery on the husband's part, though excluding the woman named in the case in the erroneous belief that thereby she might be saving or repairing the marriage which had become precarious. In the present case the wife consented to her husband's adultery with a known woman, while she at the same time consoled herself by committing adultery with that woman's husband. Moreover, there is a difference in the termination of the connivance. In Gorst v. Gorst (1) it was found as a fact that the petitioning wife had condoned the adultery of the husband at which she had connived, though in the erroneous belief that that adultery had then ceased, whereas in fact the husband committed further adultery. As my Lord has pointed out, in the present case the justices have not found as a fact whether or not the wife condoned the husband's past adultery, or whether, indeed, the husband had condoned the wife's. In all the circumstances of the case I have come to the conclusion that the justices were wrong in finding, as they did, that in the circumstances the wife had not connived at the adultery complained of, and I agree entirely that their finding on the issue of adultery cannot be upheld. So far as the findings of desertion and wilful neglect are concerned, I agree with my Lord, and for the reasons given by him, that those findings are unimpeachable, and so I agree that this appeal fails save in so far as the order must be varied by discharging the finding of adultery.

Order accordingly.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Havers, J.), February 25, March 3, 1952.]

Will—Seaman at sea—Deceased in service of shipowner—Document made in contemplation of voyage—Alteration—Presumption of alteration while “at sea” —Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26), s. 11.

On July 25, 1944, the deceased, an apprentice in the employ of a steamship company, executed a will while on leave ashore in England. Within the next week he returned to his ship which sailed on Aug. 1, 1944. At the date of making the will the deceased was under the age of twenty-one, and, therefore, the will was invalid unless the deceased were a seaman at sea within the meaning of s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837 (as explained by s. 1 of the Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918). At a date unknown the will had been altered by the striking out of a bequest. This alteration had been initialled by the deceased, but there was no evidence to show whether it had been done before or after execution of the will. On an application for a grant of probate omitting the bequest,

HELD: (i) the deceased, being in the employment of the steamship company when he made the will and being then in contemplation of sailing on a fresh voyage within a very few days, was a seaman at sea within s. 11 at the material time, and the will was valid.

In the Goods of Hale ([1915] 2 I.R. 362), applied.

(ii) there was a presumption that the alteration was made while the deceased was “at sea”, and so no formalities were required for its alteration and the revocation of the bequest was valid.

In the Goods of Tweeddale (1874) (L.R. 3 P. & D. 204) and In the Estate of Gossage ([1921] P. 194), applied.

MOTION for grant of probate.

The deceased, Ian Frederick Charles Newland, was born on Sept. 30, 1925, and died on Aug. 8, 1951, at the Government General Hospital, Madras, India. On Apr. 19, 1944, he joined ss. Strathmore as an apprentice and he continued to serve in that vessel until Oct. 24, 1944. During the war the Strathmore was engaged as a troopship voyaging backwards and forwards between England and India. On July 4, 1944, she was in dock at Liverpool. On July 25, 1944, the deceased, while on leave with the approval of his employers, the owners of the ship, was ashore at the house of a friend at Walton-on-Thames, Surrey, and he then executed a will in the presence of two witnesses and in compliance with the formalities required by the Wills Act, 1837. At that date he was between eighteen and nineteen years of age and, therefore, unless he was a person who was entitled to make a privileged will under s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, his will would be invalidated by reason of the fact that he was under the age of twenty-one years. The deceased rejoined his ship on or before Aug. 1, 1944, on which date the ship sailed on a new voyage. C

Mar. 3. HAVERS, J.: This is a motion on behalf of Mr. Noel Johnstone Dodd and Mr. Stanley Makin for a grant of probate to them as executors of the will executed by the deceased on July 25, 1944, omitting from the will a gift to five cousins of the Dowell family. E

"Provided always . . . that any soldier being in actual military service, or any mariner or seaman being at sea, may dispose of his personal estate as he might have done before the making of this Act". G

Section 7 provides: ". . . No will made by any person under the age of twenty-one years shall be valid". It will be observed that the language of s. 11 differs according to whether it is referring to a soldier or to a mariner or seaman. As regards the soldier, the condition is that he must be in actual military service. As regards a mariner or seaman, the requirement is being at sea. H

It was always recognised by the courts that, if a person came within the scope of the proviso to s. 11 and so was entitled to make a privileged will, he was entitled to do it although he was not of the age of twenty-one years. That was recognised and approved by s. 1 of the Wills (Soldiers and Sailors) Act, 1918, which provides:

"In order to remove doubts as to the construction of the Wills Act, 1837, it is hereby declared and enacted that s. 11 of that Act authorises and always has authorised any soldier being in actual military service, or any mariner or seaman being at sea, to dispose of his personal estate as he might have done before the passing of that Act, though under the age of twenty-one years”.

By s. 2:

A “Section 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, shall extend to any member of His Majesty’s naval or marine forces not only when he is at sea but also when he is so circumstanced that if he were a soldier he would be in actual military service within the meaning of that section”.

It is to be observed, however, that s. 2 only applied to any member of His Majesty’s naval or marine forces. In my view, that section does not apply to persons who are seamen in the merchant navy.

B In considering the true construction of the words “at sea” it will be observed that the words contained in s. 11 are “seaman being at sea” not “on the sea”. It is clear from the authorities which have been cited to me that the court has put a liberal interpretation on those words. For instance, it seems to me to be clearly established by authority that a seaman who is ashore on leave at a port during the course of a voyage and while ashore on such leave makes a will is a seaman “at sea”. I have examined the various authorities which have been
C cited to me to see whether I could extract from them some principle of universal application, but I have been unable to find such a principle. The first authority cited to me was In the Goods of Corby (1). The facts of that case, according to the headnote, were:

D “A vessel was lying at Melbourne in Australia, when H.C., who had been some time resident there, shipped on board as an able seaman to return to England. The vessel did not sail for some days after. Irregular papers of H.C. dated the very day on which he shipped, not entitled to probate as a mariner’s will under s. 11 of the statute”.

DR. LUSHINGTON who tried that case, observed in the course of the argument: “You ask for probate of these papers as a seaman’s will, but have you any
E evidence that he was on board ship at the time he wrote them?” Dr. Middleton, one of the counsel engaged in the case, said: “The evidence is to the effect that he was shipped, as a mariner, on board this vessel on the day when the papers bear date”. Then Dr. LUSHINGTON intervened saying: “It seems to me running it rather close to say that he was a mariner when he made his will only on the very day when he was shipped, and when the vessel was in a British port. It is a
F very nice question, which the court must take time to consider.” On a subsequent day Dr. LUSHINGTON rejected the motion saying (1 Ecc. & Ad. 293):

“This case I have taken time to consider, as the question involved appeared to me of considerable importance, and it was my anxious wish to grant the motion for probate of these papers, if I thought I could do so consistently with my apprehension of the law. These papers are not executed according
G to the requirements of the statute, and the application is for probate of them as privileged under s. 11. That section, however, applies only to wills made at sea. Now, in the present case, there is no evidence whatever where these papers were written, nor whether the deceased was even on board the ship at the time. It appears that the deceased had not originally sailed to Australia in this vessel, but that he had been residing there for nearly a H twelvemonth before he shipped as a mariner to return in her to England, and that he so shipped on Mar. 15. Now the paper marked A, bearing date Mar. 6, I think, must be put out of consideration altogether, as being clearly not entitled to the privilege. But with respect to the other two papers, it is a different question. They both bear date Mar. 15, on which day, it appears in evidence, the deceased shipped on board this vessel, as a mariner, to return to England. But, assuming that these papers were actually written on board this ship, I am not prepared to say they would be entitled to probate as a mariner's will, for it must be borne in mind that the statute says 'mariner or seaman being at sea', and it appears that this vessel did not sail till Mar. 30, fifteen days afterwards. Can it then be said that these papers were written at sea, within the true meaning of the statute? I think not. I am aware of the case of In the Goods of Lay (2), but the circumstances of that case appear to me totally distinguished from the present. I must reject this motion."

I wish to stress that in that case this particular man, Henry Corby, had not originally sailed to Australia in that vessel at all; he had been living in Australia for nearly twelve months before he did ship as a mariner to return in this ship to England.

The next case which was cited to me was In the Goods of Lay (2). This case was relied on very strongly by the applicants. The deceased in this case was mate of H.M.S. Calliope, and, on Nov. 4, 1839, while the vessel was in the harbour of Buenos Ayres, he obtained leave to go on shore, where he met with a fall and was thereby so severely injured that he died on shore five days later. Immediately after the accident he wrote his will, in pencil, on a watch-bill which was cut out and certified by the officers on board the ship on Nov. 5, but it was unattested. The paper was rejected by the receiver of seamen's wills, in regard to prize money. The court, distinguishing the case from that of Lord Henry Seymour (3), who was living on shore at Jamaica and only occasionally going on board his ship, held that the case came within the exception of the Act, and that it was the will of a seaman at sea, although the deceased, having had leave to go on shore, was not actually on board ship at the time the will was made.

The case of The Earl of Euston v. Lord Henry Seymour (3) was referred to in In the Goods of Hayes (4) in which it was said that Lord Henry Seymour, who was the admiral of the station off Jamaica, made a nuncupative codicil which was rejected by the court on the ground of its having been made at the admiral's house on shore, it being held that he was, therefore, not "at sea" as required by the statute. The distinction there, apparently, was that the admiral had a permanent residence on shore and only occasionally went on board his ship.

Counsel who appeared to oppose this motion sought to distinguish In the Goods of Lay (2) on these grounds. He urged that the Calliope was in the middle of a voyage and that when the deceased made the document there in question he was only ashore during a short period of leave in the course of the voyage, whereas at the time he executed his will the deceased in the present case was in England, he had no fixed address, and in a sense it might be said that when he executed this document at his friend's house he was at home. Further, it was argued that this will was made, not during the course of a voyage, but between voyages.

The next case to which I was referred was the case of In the Goods of Patterson (5). The headnote to that case is:

"A letter containing testamentary dispositions written on a ship lying within a river, and before the ship has actually sailed, may be a valid will as made by a seaman at sea."

In the course of the argument BARNES, J., who tried that case, said (79 L.T. 123): "The will here was made in the river. Is there express authority covering these facts?" and he was told: "No express authority, but there are analogous cases." BARNES, J., then asked: "What is the evidence as to where he was at the time of writing this letter" and it was pointed out: "The heading of the letter shows that." BARNES, J., then said: "I think I can assume that he was on board and waiting to start". He was then referred to In the Goods of Lay (2) and In the Goods of Hayes (4) and he said that the first of those cases seemed to have been approved by WILDE, J., in In the Goods of M'Murdo (6). BARNES, J., then said (ibid., 124):

"I think you may take the grant. The deceased had gone on board, and the voyage had begun for the purposes of making this document the will of a seaman at sea."

The facts of that case are not analogous to the facts of the case with which I have to deal, but there the deceased had gone on board and it was held that the voyage had begun for the purpose of constituting the document the will of a seaman at sea although the ship was actually lying in the river preparatory to sailing.

A The next case cited was In the Goods of M'Murdo (6). This case was, I think, relied on by both sides. The headnote reads:

"A will made by a mariner serving on board H.M.S. Excellent whilst she was permanently stationed in Portsmouth harbour, was held to be the will of 'a mariner or seaman being at sea . . .'"

B and within the section. In the statement of facts it is said that the deceased was a mate in Her Majesty's service serving on board the Excellent which was a gunnery ship permanently stationed in Portsmouth Harbour. The application in that case was for the revocation of the grant of probate on the ground that the deceased was not a mariner or seaman at sea. SIR JAMES WILDE, in giving judgment, said (L.R. 1 P.& D. 541):

C "I think this application must be refused. The admitted facts are that the deceased was a mariner in Her Majesty's service, that at the time when the will was made he was a mate on board the Excellent, and that the will was executed on board the Excellent, that vessel being at the time laid up in Portsmouth harbour, and there being no immediate intention of sending her to sea. A will made under these circumstances, in my opinion, comes within the description of the will of a mariner or seaman being at sea. I see D a great distinction between this case and that of In the Goods of Corby (1), where the deceased wrote a letter of which probate was sought, stating that he had shipped on board a vessel lying in Melbourne harbour on the date of the letter. It did not appear whether the letter was written before or E after he went on board, and the expressions which he used may have meant nothing more than that he had signed ship's articles, and had bound himself to join the vessel on a certain date. If he used the expressions with that meaning, he could not be said even to have joined the vessel in the sense of having commenced his maritime service."

Then comes a passage on which both sides relied:

F "The cases appear to me to go this length, that where a man has joined a vessel on service, and has commenced a voyage in it, a will made in the course of that voyage will be within the exception in the Act, even although such will was in fact made on shore."

Now, if that was the sole and exclusive test to be applied to the facts of every case I should find very much greater difficulty in deciding this case than I do; G but, in my view, that case did not purport to lay down a criterion for every set of facts, but was merely laying down a principle which was applicable to the facts of that particular case. SIR JAMES WILDE continues (ibid.):

H "That was the case In the Goods of Lay (2). The Calliope was lying in the harbour of Buenos Ayres, but whether she had gone there to refit, or for provisions, or for some other temporary purpose, or whether she was stationed there, does not appear. But she was actually in the harbour at the time of the making of the will, and the will was in fact made on shore. In the case of In the Goods of Austen (7) the will was made whilst the admiral was engaged on an expedition up a river, when although he was not actually at sea, he was practically on maritime service, which he had commenced by going to sea. It seems to me impossible to draw a distinction for this purpose between the Calliope lying in Buenos Ayres harbour and the Excellent lying in Portsmouth harbour. Although a seaman on board the Excellent is not in a foreign country, still he is subject to the restraints of the service, and might have no opportunity of making a will with the usual formalities if he was taken ill on board when no lawyer was at hand."

It is important, however, to observe that there SIR JAMES WILDE was citing with approval the case of In the Goods of Lay (2).

In contrast, In the Estate of Anderson (8) was cited to me. The headnote to that case is:

"A member of a local corps of the St. John's Ambulance Association, being about to start from home under orders to join H.M.S. Pembroke, permanently stationed at Chatham, wrote out at home on the morning of his departure a document disposing of his property. He remained in barracks at Chatham and did not go on board ship till he joined a transport on Aug. 17, 1914, and he was wrecked in her on Oct. 30, 1914. HELD, not within the exceptions in s. 11 of the Wills Act."

BARGRAVE DEANE, J., in giving his judgment, stated the facts, and, in particular, the fact that after the deceased had gone to Chatham and was attached to H.M.S. Pembroke he did not go on board that or any other ship until he joined the Rohilla on Aug. 17, and said ([1916] P. 51):

"This would be a perfectly good will if made when this man was at sea. The language of s. 11 of the Wills Act is peculiar: the words are not identical with regard to soldiers and mariners. To come within the exceptions in that section, a soldier must be in actual military service, and if this deceased man had been a soldier, or if those words had applied to sailors or mariners, it might have been argued successfully that he came within the exceptions. But when the deceased wrote out this document he was not at sea: he was in fact at home in his father's house. It is with the greatest regret that I feel compelled to hold that this document cannot be admitted as a will. Various cases have been cited, and the nearest in point seems to me to be In the Goods of Lay (2), where the court, in admitting the document, held that it was the will of a seaman at sea, although the deceased, having had leave to go on shore, was not actually on board ship at the time he wrote the document. That was referred to with approval by SIR J. P. WILDE in the case of In the Goods of M'Murdo (6). If the deceased in the present case had been at sea at any period before he wrote out the document now before me, it might have been argued, with some chance of success, that he was within the words of s. 11."

In In the Estate of Stanley (9) a nurse employed under contract by the War Office in hospital ships wrote a letter giving the addressee full liberty to deal with her affairs and giving directions as to the disposal of her property. The letter was written during an interval of leave on shore in this country, but after the writer had received orders to re-embark, and it was held that the letter, which was unattested, was privileged as a soldier's will within the meaning of the Wills Act, 1837, s. 11, and that the person to whom it was addressed was executor according to tenor, and, as such, entitled to probate of the document. In his judgment BARGRAVE DEANE, J., said ([1916] P. 194):

"I think that a nurse is entitled to make a privileged will upon the same footing as a soldier or a sailor, following the principle of the Irish case cited." The Irish case cited was In the Goods of Hale (10), to which I will refer in a moment.

"Probate will go of the letter as constituting a soldier's will, the contract of the deceased having been with the War Office, and the grant will be made to the applicant as executrix according to tenor."

It is to be observed that there had been some dispute whether a woman could properly be included in the description either of a soldier or sailor or a mariner or seaman. That had been argued and decided in In the Goods of Hale (10), and I think that when BARGRAVE DEANE, J., was saying that he thought a nurse was entitled to make a privileged will on the same footing as a soldier or a sailor he was merely saying that a nurse employed as this lady was under contract with the War Office in hospital ships could properly fall within the description of a soldier following the principle of In the Goods of Hale (10).

In the Goods of Hale (10) was very strongly relied on on behalf of the applicant.

A The deceased, who had been for several years in the employment of a steamship company as a typist, was in the habit of travelling as a typist on the vessels of the company (large ocean liners) sailing between Liverpool and New York. She spent the periods between voyages working in the company's offices in Liverpool. Her testamentary dispositions were contained in three letters. None of these documents was signed or attested as required by the Wills Act, but all, though written from the deceased's lodgings in Liverpool, were written in contemplation of sailing. The deceased was afterwards lost in the sinking of one of the ships of the company. It was held that every person employed in any branch of the Royal Navy or Merchant Service, from the highest to the lowest, was included, when at sea, in the exceptions contained in s. 11 of the Wills Act, and that, consequently, the deceased came within the meaning of the term "mariner or seaman", a term which was not confined to the male sex.

C It was further held that the deceased was "at sea" within the meaning of s. 11 at the time of making her will. MADDEN, J., who delivered judgment, said ([1915] 2 I.R. 368):

D "The deceased Miss Hale had been for several years in the employment of the Cunard Steamship Co. as a typist, and was in the habit of travelling as a typist on the vessels of the company sailing between Liverpool and New York. A continuous certificate of discharge covering the period from May 25, 1909, to Mar. 6, 1915, is in evidence. She had in her possession at the time of her death, on May 7, 1915, the continuous certificate of discharge which covered the period from March 1915 onward, but this document is, of course, not forthcoming. The documents of Jan. 14, 1915 were found after the death of the deceased in a case at Mildmay House, Liverpool, where she had told her sister, the wife of the applicant, that she would find instructions, in the event of anything happening to her. The letter dated 'St. Patrick's Day' was delivered in course of post. The documents of Jan. 14 were written in contemplation of the sailing of the Lusitania from Liverpool. Miss Hale was in the service of the company at the time of the writing of those documents. She did not sign on for the voyage until Jan. 16. But it is evident from the letter of the 14th that she was under orders to sail on that date."

F Those seem to me to be the decisive facts on which MADDEN, J., founded his judgment. He goes on then to consider (i) whether or not in that particular case the lady was a "seaman", and, (ii) whether she was a seaman at sea, and he says G (ibid., 370):

H "Then comes the question: Was the testatrix 'at sea' on Jan. 14, 1915? And here I derive assistance from the judgment, from which I have already quoted, of SIR F. H. JEUNE in In the Goods of Hiscock (11). It was there decided that a private in a volunteer battalion who had sent in his name for active service in the South African War, who had been certified as fit by the medical inspector, and who had gone into barracks with a view to being drafted for active service, and had there made his will, was at that time 'a soldier in actual military service'. The judge applied this test to the case of the soldier: 'Had he taken some step at the time when he made his will to bring himself within the words of the section? This brings us very close, if, indeed, not actually, to the same point as what the Romans meant by in expeditione, for when a Roman soldier did anything towards fighting the enemy, he would have been considered, under the law of his time, as being in expeditions'. This case was followed and applied by BOYD, J., in the case of In the Goods of Godley (12). There is less difficulty in applying a similar test to the case of a seaman preparing for a voyage, for the words 'in actual military service' are more definite and specific than the phrase 'being at sea'. In my opinion Miss Hale was 'at sea' at the time of making her will, in a more real sense than Hiscock was 'in actual military service' under the circumstances of the case stated in the judgment from which I have quoted of SIR F. H. JEUNE."

I do not derive the assistance which MADDEN, J., derived from a comparison of this case with In the Goods of Hiscock (11). As I have already pointed out, the language of the section when it deals with soldiers is entirely different from the language dealing with mariners or seamen at sea. It has also been pointed out by the Court of Appeal in Re Wingham (13) that in the interpretation of the words relating to soldiers the position of the soldier in actual military service is not identical, as was at one time thought, with that of the Roman legionary who was in expeditions. It seems to me that the material facts on which the learned judge relied were the facts which I have indicated—that the documents were written in contemplation of the sailing in the Lusitania, that the lady at the time was in the service of the company, and that she was under orders to sail on that date. Counsel for the parties cited pointed out to me that this Irish case is not, of course, a binding authority upon me, although it is entitled to great respect. He also pointed out that it was an ex parte case and there was no argument on the other side, and he sought to distinguish it on the grounds that in In the Goods of Hale (10) each will and codicil was made two days before sailing and that the lady in question had been informed that she was about to sign on for the particular voyage. He argued that there was a closer link between the will and codicil and the respective events in In the Goods of Hale (10) than there was in the case before me. He also argued that in In the Goods of Hale (10) the documents were made with a particular voyage in mind whereas before me the voyage from India had actually finished and there was no evidence that the new voyage had begun.

There was another Irish case cited to me in which the decision went the other way—Barnard v. Birch (14). There the deceased was a captain in the mail service and commanded the ss. Leinster during its cross-Channel voyages between Holyhead and Kingstown. He was actually at sea for the time each day spent in transit, but was on shore for the remainder of each day. He had a house at Holyhead where he and his wife and family lived. His testamentary disposition was contained in a document purporting to be a will which he signed at his house at Holyhead between voyages. The deceased was drowned when the Leinster was sunk, and it was held that he was "a seaman", but was not "a seaman being at sea" within the meaning of s. 11 of the Wills Act when he signed the said document purporting to be his will. DODD, J., who decided that case, said ([1919] 2 I.R. 408):

"It is said there are judicial decisions that control my judgment. MADDEN, J., has given a considered judgment in In the Goods of Hale (10). The deceased in that case was a lady typist in the employment of the Cunard Steamship Company as a typist on the vessels of the company sailing between Liverpool and New York. She wrote some letters which were testamentary just as she was starting. The learned judge in a luminous judgment decided she was a seaman, and a seaman preparing for a voyage, and that she was a seaman being at sea. BARGRAVE DEANE, J., in In the Estate of Anderson (8) decided that a man who was called up on the Naval Reserve, but had not actually been made a sailor, was not a seaman being at sea. The two cases are said to be in conflict. I do not think they are, in principle. Indeed in a subsequent case, In the Estate of Stanley (9), BARGRAVE DEANE, J., adopts the principle of MADDEN, J.'s, decision. The lady there was a nurse under the Queen Alexandra Imperial Nursing Service. The letter was written during an interval of leave on shore in this country, but after the writer had received orders to re-embark. The judge, applying the principle of MADDEN, J.'s, judgment, held that she was a seaman being at sea."

In my view, DODD, J., was under a complete misapprehension there. BARGRAVE DEANE, J., did not hold that the lady was a seaman at sea. What he held was that, just as in the case of In the Goods of Hale (10) the lady typist could be a seaman, so a nurse employed as she then was could be a soldier. The decision was not on the footing that she was a seaman at sea, but that she was a soldier. The learned judge goes on (ibid., 410):

"When this case was opened, Mr. Hanna, for the defendant, admitted that if the judgment of MADDEN, J., in In the Goods of Hale (10) was good law, and that I was bound to follow it, he could not contend that the deceased was not a seaman at sea. In that case the deceased lady wrote out the documents some days before she sailed, in her own lodgings in Liverpool, where she stayed between voyages. She was a typist, in the habit of travelling as a typist for the company between Liverpool and New York. She went down in the Lusitania. MADDEN, J., held she was 'a seaman, being at sea when she wrote the documents'. Mr. Hanna said I was not bound to follow that decision, as there was a decision to the contrary in the English courts, decided by BARGRAVE DEANE, J.: In the Estate of Anderson (8). The decision of MADDEN, J., was, he said, an ex parte decision, and the case before BARGRAVE DEANE, J., was fully argued. I am of opinion that I am not called upon to decide what my duty would be under the supposed conflict of authority, for there is no conflict. There is a sentence in the English report—'The language of s. 11 of the Wills Act is peculiar. The words are not identical with regard to soldiers and mariners. To come within the exceptions in that section, a soldier must be in actual military service; and if this man had been a soldier, or if those words had applied to sailors or mariners, it might have been argued successfully that he came within the exceptions. But when the deceased wrote out this document, he was not at sea; he was, in fact, at home in his father's house'. 'The deceased was not a soldier, and he was not a seaman at sea'. The learned judge makes it clear 'This would be a perfectly good will if made when this man was at sea' . . . 'If the deceased had been at sea at any period before he wrote out the document before me, it might have been argued that he was within the words of s. 11'. MADDEN, J.'s, reasoning is alleged to be at variance with this. He traces the words 'in actual military service' back to the Roman phrase 'in expeditione' and cites In the Goods of Hiscock (11), which applied this test to a soldier: 'Had he taken some step at the time when he made his will to bring himself within the words of the section?' . . . The argument of Mr. Hanna is based upon the assumption that MADDEN, J., has decided that preparing to go to sea is equivalent to being at sea, and that BARGRAVE DEANE, J., decided that preparing to go to sea was not equivalent to being at sea. Neither judge so decided. On the facts before him MADDEN, J., decided that preparing to go to sea was equivalent to going to sea, and BARGRAVE DEANE, J., decided that, upon the facts before him, the man was not a seaman . . . In the English case the man had been merely called up. In the Irish case the lady was in the actual service of the company, and was resuming her occupation as a seaman. BARGRAVE DEANE, J., expressly, as I have shown, differentiated the two cases. This is not a matter left in any doubt. MADDEN, J.'s, judgment was not cited in the argument before BARGRAVE DEANE, J. It was not applicable. But in a subsequent case . . . In the Estate of Stanley (9), it was cited before BARGRAVE DEANE, J., himself, and the principle of it approved of and followed. The letter in that case was written during an interval of leave on shore in this country, but after the writer had received orders to re-embark. The lady there was a nurse under the Queen Alexandra Imperial Nursing Service, and was on leave pending further orders."

The conclusion of the judgment is in these terms (ibid., 413):

"The facts in this case clearly bring it within the principles laid down by MADDEN, J., namely—1. That the section of the Wills Act is not confined to actual seamen. 2. That the section extends to women. 3. That a person who is not actually at sea may be a seaman. I adopt these three principles, and apply them to the facts of the present case. It is not essential that he or she should be actually on the sea; but the contrary principle is not affirmed. It does not necessarily follow that a seaman who is looking forward to a voyage is a 'seaman being at sea'. Captain Birch was a seaman who had daily duties to perform. For six or seven hours a day he was on the sea; the rest of the day he was on shore. When his boat was laid up he remained on shore in his own house with his wife and family. He had been so living for some weeks, and his time for resuming his daily sailings was approaching when he made this will. Was he within the principle of a seaman preparing for a voyage? When the captain reached his home, was he a seaman being at sea or was he a seaman being on shore? . . . On these facts, was Captain Birch 'a seaman being at sea' within the principles of the authorities I have referred to? If he had made the will when he went ashore on Nov. 17, would he then have been a seaman being at sea? Apply other tests. 'Had he taken a step?' Was he preparing for a voyage? If not on the 17th, when, then, did the principle begin to operate? Is there anything to show that the captain was doing anything really preparatory to a voyage? Applying the legal principles which I accept to the facts of this case, I am of opinion that when Captain Birch was sitting in his own house on the day he made the will he was a seaman on shore, and not a seaman being at sea."

That case, I think, is very different from the other cases because there it could be really said of that particular captain that on every day he was for so many hours of the day at sea and for the rest of the day he was on shore at home. It was also the fact that the ship had been laid up for a very considerable period before another voyage was contemplated and it was during that period that the testamentary document was made.

My attention was also called to a decision of the Court of Appeal in Re Wingham (13). That case really lays down the true test for the interpretation of the words "in actual military service" as applied to soldiers, sailors, or airmen in the service of the Crown. It is not relevant to the matter which I have to decide. I may, however, refer to a short passage in the judgment of DENNING, L.J., in which he says ([1948] 2 All E.R. 914):

"Doubtful cases may arise in peace-time when a soldier is in, or is about to be sent to, a disturbed area or an isolated post where he may be involved in military operations. As to these cases, all I can say is that, in case of doubt, the serving soldier should be given the benefit of the privilege."

It seems to me that that passage is equally applicable to the case of a merchant seaman who was continually employed during the war in a ship engaged as a troopship between England and India.

Counsel for the applicants argued before me that, whether I approach this matter from the angle of In the Goods of Lay (2), or from the angle of In the Goods of Hale (10), I ought to decide this case in favour of the applicants. He pointed out that the deceased was throughout in continuous maritime service in this ship. He joined the ship when it was engaged in this service and he had commenced and carried out completed voyages in it, he was an apprentice bound to serve where ordered, and throughout the whole of the relevant period the ship was engaged as a troopship on a series of voyages between England and India. If, for instance, while the ship was in dock at some port in India at the end of the voyage from England, the deceased had been given temporary shore leave for a day or two and while he was on such leave in India he had made this document, I think there would be great force in the argument that, following the decision in In the Goods of Lay (2), that document would have been made by him while he was a seaman at sea. I cannot see any distinction in principle between the instance which I have just given and a case where, while the ship is in dock in England for the necessary period of time for refitting and so on, the deceased is temporarily on leave ashore in England, and I see no reason why I should not similarly hold that during that period he was a seaman "at sea". If one approaches the matter in the light of In the Goods of Hale (10), I find that the deceased was in the service of this shipping company at the time of the writing of this document, that the document was written in contemplation of sailing in the Strathmore on a fresh voyage within a very few days, and that, therefore, he was a "seaman at sea" when he made this will on July 25, 1944.

There was a second question to be determined because at some time or other a bequest in this will—"also" (and there follows the symbol £ and a figure which is not decipherable to me) "to each of my five cousins of the Dowell family Claude Roy William Dennis Brian"—was struck out and initialled by the deceased. Counsel for the five cousins of the Dowell family, on learning that this will from the time it was made until the date of the death was at the bank, did not feel able to persist in the argument which otherwise he would have addressed to me on behalf of his clients. If this bequest had been struck out before the will were executed, then, of course, cadit quaestio. The alternative is that the alteration was made after the will was executed. On that issue I was referred to In the Goods of Tweedale (15). It is sufficient for me to read the headnote:

"Where a will in the testator's handwriting contains material alterations, about the making of which no information can be obtained, and such will was signed by the testator whilst as a soldier he was employed in actual military service, the alterations will be presumed to have been made during the continuance of such military service, and will be included in the probate."

I think the same principle must apply to a "seaman at sea" and the presumption, therefore, is that the alteration would have been made while the seaman was "at sea". It was argued before me by counsel for the applicants that in a case of a will which does not require any formality as to its making and execution, it could be equally well revoked without any formality. His authority for that was the case of In the Estate of Gossage (16). It is enough for me to read the headnote:

"Under the Wills Act, 1837, no formalities are required for the execution of a soldier's will and therefore none are required for its revocation."

On that principle, therefore, I hold that, if this alteration was made after the will was executed, it was a valid revocation of the previous bequest. In those circumstances I grant the application which is made to me. There will, therefore, be a grant of probate to the applicants as executors of the will, omitting from the will the gift to the five cousins.

Order accordingly.

In the Estate of WILSON. WILSON v. COLECLOUGH.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Havers, J.), February 25, March 3, 1952.]

Will—Seaman at sea—Deceased in service of shipowner—Nuncupative will made in contemplation of voyage—Wills Act, 1837 (c. 26), s. 11.

The deceased was a chief officer employed in the marine department of a petroleum company. On Jan. 11, 1946, he went on leave in England, and on Apr. 25 he received instructions to join a ship on Apr. 30. On Apr. 27 he made a nuncupative will by saying in the presence of witnesses: "If anything happens to me, I want everything to go to my mother".

HELD: the deceased made the will in contemplation of the voyage on Apr. 30, and, therefore, he was a "seaman at sea" within the meaning of s. 11 of the Wills Act, 1837, and the will could be admitted to probate.

ACTION to determine whether the plaintiff was entitled to a grant of letters of administration of the estate of the deceased with the contents of a nuncupative will annexed. The defendant filed no defence and took no part in the proceedings.

Hesketh for the plaintiff.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 3. HAVERS, J.: The plaintiff, Mrs. Sophia Wilson, asks the court to order a grant to her of letters of administration of the estate of her son, Alfred John Wilson deceased, with the contents of a nuncupative will, made on Apr. 27, 1946, annexed.

At all material times the deceased was a chief officer employed by the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Co., Ltd., in their marine department, he being a chief officer in their merchant fleet. In 1931 he married the defendant, now Katherine Coleclough, in Shanghai. On July 9, 1940, he made a will in which he appointed his then wife his sole executor and beneficiary. In 1941 he divorced his wife. She has since re-married. She put in no defence and has taken no part at all in these proceedings. On Jan. 10, 1946, the deceased arrived in London after a voyage from Suez and on Jan. 11, 1946, he went on furlough and remained on furlough in England until Apr. 16, 1946. He was then awaiting re-appointment to another ship. On Apr. 25, 1946, the deceased received instructions from his employers to proceed to Sunderland to join a ship on Apr. 30. On Apr. 27, while at his sister's house, he made a nuncupative will by saying in the presence of his mother and other witnesses: "If anything happens to me, I want everything to go to my mother". On Apr. 30, 1946, the deceased went to Sunderland to join his ship, and immediately thereafter proceeded to sea to the Far East. On Oct. 8, 1947, he died, while serving in another ship.

The same question arises in this case as in In the Estate of Newland (1), though the facts are different. The plaintiff has to satisfy me that at the time the deceased made this nuncupative will he was a seaman at sea. It is unnecessary for me again to review the authorities which I have reviewed in Newland's case. The facts which seem to me to be decisive in this case are that at all material times the deceased was a chief officer in the Anglo-Saxon Petroleum Company's fleet of merchant ships, that prior to the furlough he had been at sea in one of the company's ships, that at the end of the furlough he was awaiting re-appointment to another of the company's ships, and that, at the time he made this nuncupative will, he had been ordered to join a ship for a specific voyage. I find that he made this nuncupative will in contemplation of sailing in that ship on that particular voyage, and I find that he was preparing for the voyage. In those circumstances, following the decision of In the Goods of Hale (2), I hold that he was a seaman at sea. There will, therefore, be a grant of letters of administration to the plaintiff of the estate of the deceased with the contents of the nuncupative will annexed.

Order accordingly.

HILLINGDON ESTATES CO. v. STONEFIELD ESTATES, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Vaisey, J.), March 13, 14, 1952.]

Contract—Frustration—Sale of land—Compulsory purchase order relating to property made before completion.

Sale of Land—Contract—Frustration—Compulsory purchase order made before completion.

By a contract in writing, dated Jan. 13, 1938, the vendors agreed to sell and the purchasers to buy certain land for an estate in fee simple. The contract provided that the purchasers were entitled to take up the property on Jan. 31, 1939, and that they should in the conveyance enter into restrictive covenants to the effect that the land should not at any time be used for any purpose other than as a building estate to be developed in a particular manner, the number of "residential units" being not less than the maximum density provided for the area by the town planning authority. The completion of the transaction was delayed, inter alia, by the outbreak of war, and on Oct. 11, 1948, when the contract was still uncompleted, the M. County Council made a compulsory purchase order affecting the whole of the property. On July 14, 1949, notices to treat under the order were served on the vendors and on the purchasers. The purchasers claimed that, on or before the date of the service of the notices to treat, they were discharged from their contract to purchase the property.

HELD: the compulsory purchase order placed an obligation on the purchasers, who, subject to the payment of the purchase money under the contract of 1938, were to be regarded as the owners of the land, and did not affect the vendors, and, consequently, the making of the order did not preclude the carrying out of the contract, which was not, therefore, frustrated, but remained valid and enforceable.

ACTION for a declaration that in the events which had happened the plaintiffs were discharged from their obligation to perform a contract for the purchase by them of certain land. The plaintiffs also claimed the return of a sum of money paid by them to the vendors as interest on the outstanding purchase money. The vendors counterclaimed for specific performance of the said contract, or, alternatively, damages.

Raymond Jennings, Q.C., and Hewins for the purchasers.

Scott Cairns, Q.C., and J. F. Bowyer for the vendors.

VAISEY, J.: This action arises out of a contract for the sale and purchase of certain land in the parish of South Ruislip in the county of Middlesex. The contract is in writing and is dated Jan. 13, 1938, and is made between the defendants, Stonefield Estates, Ltd., who are the vendors, of the one part, and the plaintiffs, Hillingdon Estates Co., who are the purchasers, of the other part. The plaintiffs are a company in which the liability is unlimited. The claim in the action by the purchasers is not for rescission of the contract, but for a declaration that they have been discharged from any further obligation to perform it, and I think that in that is involved the proposition that the contract has come to an end and that no party has any rights of any sort under its terms. The vendors (the defendants) dispute that contention and counterclaim for specific performance of the contract so far as the same remains to be performed.

Clause 1 of the agreement provides that the vendors are to sell and the purchasers are to purchase for £875 per acre the fee simple of and in, first, the land comprising some forty-one acres, which is called section A, and, secondly, another piece of land containing eighteen acres or thereabouts known as section C. Clause 2 of the contract provides for the payment by the purchasers to the vendors of £5,190 as a deposit, and they are to be entitled to take up the property—i.e., sections A and C—in three portions, the first half of section A on Jan. 31, 1938, the remainder of section A on July 31, 1938, and the whole of section C on Jan 31, 1939, on payment by the purchasers in each case of the appropriate part of the purchase money apportionable to the area of the land taken up, with interest at the rate of $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. per annum from Jan. 31, 1938. Clause 6 of the contract provides that the purchasers shall in the conveyance or transfer enter into certain restrictive covenants to the effect that the lands comprised in such conveyance or transfer should not at any time be used for any purpose other than as a building estate to be developed in a particular manner, the number of "residential units" as there described being not less than the maximum density provided for the area by the town planning authority. There are certain ancillary clauses, to which I need not refer in detail except to observe that cl. 13 provides that, notwithstanding the completion of the assurance of any part of the land—i.e., of sections A or C—the agreement should remain in force with regard to the conditions therein contained or deemed incorporated therein (that is to say, certain general conditions which had been previously referred to) and anything else remaining to be done thereunder and not provided for in the assurance.

The deposit was duly paid by the purchasers to the vendors, and the whole of section A was taken up in due course by the purchasers and assured to them by the vendors, and on those transactions the whole of the deposit of £5,190 was taken into account. No part of section C has been taken up by the purchasers or assured to the purchasers by the vendors, and the contract has not been performed in respect to section C except that the purchasers have paid to the vendors £3,677 ls. 10d. representing interest, less income tax, payable under cl. 2 of the agreement on the purchase price of section C (viz., £15,903 2s. 6d.), that interest having been calculated for the period from June 22, 1939 to Jan. 31, 1949.

In para. 5 of the statement of claim the purchasers say that on the true construction of the agreement and in the surrounding circumstances at the time when the agreement was made the purchasers and vendors entered into the agreement on the footing that the purchasers would still be able to develop the said land (including section C) in accordance with the provisions of cl. 6 of the contract at the time when this land should be assured to the purchasers. In the events that happened, the matter was delayed for a very long time, no doubt in part consequent on the outbreak of war.

- The controversy has arisen because, on or about Oct. 11, 1948, the Middlesex County Council made a compulsory purchase order affecting, among other land, the whole of section C, and on or about Mar. 10, 1949, the order was confirmed by the appropriate authority, the Ministry of Education, subject, I understand, to immaterial modification. On or about Mar. 30, 1949, three weeks later, notice of the order was given by the Middlesex County Council to the purchasers and the vendors, and on or about July 14, 1949, notices to treat under the order and the relevant Acts were duly served on both parties by the county council. On those facts, in para. 11 of the statement of claim the purchasers allege that they were discharged, on or before the date of the service of the notices to treat, from liability to perform any of the agreements on their part contained in the written contract and became entitled to recover from the vendors the said sum of £3,667 ls. 10d. representing the interest, less tax, which had been paid and calculated on the purchase price of section C. The claim in the action is for a declaration that the purchasers had been so discharged. They further ask for repayment of the said sum in respect of interest and for costs and other relief. In their counterclaim the vendors allege that the purchasers accepted the vendors' title to the property, that the vendors are and have at all material times been ready and willing to implement their part of the contract in relation to section C, that, on Oct. 17, 1949, the vendors' solicitors called on the purchasers through their solicitors to complete the purchase within a reasonable time, but the purchasers' solicitors failed to reply to the letter, that the purchasers have not completed the purchase, and that, as a result the vendors are entitled to specific performance of the contract so far as the same remains to be performed, i.e., so far as it relates to the land described as section C. In the alternative, they claim damages for breach of contract, and other matters of incidental relief.

I regard this case as based, both according to the pleadings and having regard to the arguments, in fact on a plea of frustration. The doctrine of frustration is not an easy one, and there are rival theories as to the foundation on which it rests. Some high judicial authorities have supposed that it rests on an implied contract or on a term which must be deemed to be implicit in the contract as applied to some unforeseen, unpredictable, and unknown state of circumstances which has, in fact, arisen. The other view is that frustration depends on some such consideration as that the event which has happened has so completely destroyed the subject-matter and altered the circumstances that the contract can no longer be carried out or recognised in any shape or form and on that ground must be deemed (in equity, I suppose, for this, of course, is an executory contract) to be no longer enforceable, and, indeed, no longer in existence, so that it can be neither specifically performed by either party nor can any damages be recovered for any alleged breach of it.

Regarded as an action based on alleged frustration the case is a difficult one. It is remarkable that there is no authority either precisely in point or in the nature of an analogous case. If a compulsory purchase order—it matters not at what stage in the making of the order when the vital moment is said to arrive—relating to land subject to an uncompleted contract has the effect either of putting the vendors in the position that they are in breach of the contract and unable to perform it or of frustrating it, it is strange that such a matter has not been dealt with judicially hitherto, because, I should have thought, the situation must have arisen in a great number of cases, and in the large majority of those cases it must have been a most important point for consideration in the position of the parties. The complete absence of authority does rather suggest to my mind that the doctrine of frustration does not operate normally in the case of contracts for the sale of land.

What is the effect of the compulsory purchase order on, first, the rights and position of the purchasers, and secondly, on the rights and position of the vendors? There is no doubt that the position of the vendors and that of the purchasers in an unperformed contract for the sale of land is radically different—different in quality and different in nature. I have always understood (and, indeed, it is a common-place) that when there is a contract by A to sell land to B at a certain price, B becomes the owner in equity of the land, subject, of course, to his obligation to perform his part of the contract by paying the purchase money. What is the position of A, the vendor? He has, it is true, the legal estate in the land, but for many purposes from the moment the contract is entered into he holds it as trustee for B, the purchaser. He has certain rights in the land remaining, it is true, but all those rights are conditioned and limited by the circumstance that they are referable to his right to recover and receive the purchase money. His interest when he has entered into a contract for sale is not an interest in land. It is an interest in personal estate, in a sum of money, and it seems to me that in a case such as this, when the date for completion is long past, the purchasers, subject to the payment of that purchase money, are to be regarded as the owners of the land, as I think they are. The effect of the notice to treat and the compulsory purchase process is merely to place an obligation on the person who is already the owner of the land in question. The compulsory purchase order does not affect the vendor. He has no interest in the matter save in respect of the purchase money which he is entitled to be paid.

It has been said by ROMER, J., in Cardiff Corpn. v. Cook (1) ([1923] 2 Ch. 121), quoting from KINDERSLEY, V.-C., in Haynes v. Haynes (2) (1 Drew. & Sm. 450):

“ . . . the notice to treat constitutes, as between the landowner and the company [the person giving the notice to treat] the relation of vendor and purchaser to a certain extent and for certain purposes . . . and that some of the consequences which flow from an actual contract also follow upon the notice to treat; such as that the particular lands [which are to be taken by the authority] and which the landowner must give up to the company after certain steps prescribed by the Act [the Land Clauses Consolidation Act, 1845] shall have been taken, are fixed, and that neither party can get rid of the obligation, the one to take and the other to give up the lands specified in the notice; and that such is the meaning to be attributed to those expressions, which may have dropped from learned judges, which seem to intimate that it is a contract; but that in no other sense and to no further extent does the notice constitute a contract, at least on the part of the landowner ”.

That deals with the simple position as between the authority serving the notice and the fee simple owner of the land, but when I try to apply that to the position, on the one hand, of the local authority, and, on the other, of the two parties who are still concerned with the land, I find it very difficult to say that it is the vendor who is the notional party to the notional contract. I should have thought that it is the owner of the land who is the notional party to the notional contract, and in the present case it appears to me that it is the purchasers who have been subject to this notice to treat and that the vendors are unconcerned with it. I agree that this compulsory purchase order very much altered the situation, but I cannot appreciate that it has altered it in such a fundamental and catastrophic manner as to justify the court in saying that the whole contract has been frustrated. I can see no objection to the contract being completed by conveyance after the notice to treat has been served, or, indeed, at any time. The land could have been conveyed on the purchase money being paid by the purchasers to the vendors. It would have to be conveyed, I think, subject to the restrictive covenants, but how far anyone in the future will have the right to enforce those covenants, I do not know. It would also have to be made subject to the compulsory purchase, and that will put the purchaser in exactly the same position vis-à-vis the authority as he would have been if he had completed his contract within a reasonable time after the completion date. To say that the contract has been frustrated seems to me to go far beyond any authority to which my attention has been called, and does not accord with what I understand as frustration of a contract. There is no doubt that the whole of the compensation money under the compulsory purchase order will have to go to the purchasers, assuming, of course, that they complete. I think that the compulsory purchase order only affects the vendors in so far as they are given notice of it, and, if they choose to enforce the contract—i.e., the written contract of Jan. 13, 1938—they are under no obligation to do anything except to convey the property subject to, among other things, the compulsory purchase order.

No doubt these departmental interferences and interventions do make a very great difference to life in this country, but that does not mean that, whenever such interference or intervention arises, the parties are discharged from bargains solemnly entered into between them. I think that it is the duty of the parties in such a case as this to carry out their obligations, and I cannot see that there is in this case any reason for supposing that there is either an implied term of this contract that it should be frustrated in the event which has happened or that there has been such a destruction of the fundamental and underlying circumstances on which the contract is based as to justify my saying that the contract ceased to exist at the date when the notice to treat was served or at any other date in the process of the making and carrying into effect of the compulsory purchase order.

The nature of frustration has been very well defined by STREATFIELD, J., in Morgan v. Manser (3), where he collects together in a most convenient form the various pronouncements which have been made on this somewhat obscure subject. STREATFIELD, J., held that there was such a change of circumstances and of such a duration that the original contract, looked at as a whole, was invaded by the call-up of the defendant, who was a music hall artiste, and so fundamentally as to have been frustrated by that event: see [1947] 2 All E.R. 672. Applying those words to this case, I cannot hold that the contract here has been frustrated fundamentally or at all. The purchasers are no worse off than they would have been if they had completed their contract in a period rather less than twelve years from the time when they agreed to complete it. If they had completed the contract without the delay of twelve years, clearly the compulsory purchase order would have affected them without the least question. But, however that may be, I have to consider the matter as I find it, and, despite the long delay which has taken place, I think that the contract, so far from being frustrated, can and should be carried out.

For the best statement of the two views on which the doctrine of discharge from liability by frustration can be justified, I would refer to a passage in the opinion of VISCOUNT SIMON, L.C., in Joseph Constantine S.S. Line, Ltd. v. Imperial Smelting Corpn., Ltd. (4) ([1941] 2 All E.R. 171).

Counsel for the purchasers further submitted that the notice to treat is analogous to a contract between the Middlesex County Council and the vendors which obliged the vendors to convey the property to the county council. I think that that is entirely the wrong way in which to put it. I think that the duty of the vendors is to convey the property to the purchasers, subject to the notices to treat which were attached to the land, and of which the purchasers would have notice. Counsel argues that the existence of the notice to treat is an incumbrance and a condition which prevents the vendors from fulfilling their part of the bargain by conveying the property and giving a clean property to the purchasers, but my own view is that it is not a condition of that kind. I think that it is a matter which concerns the purchasers and not the vendors.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jen Distinguished. SLATER v. SLAT March 11, 12, 1952.) [1953] 1 All E.R. 246.]

Nullity—Approbation of unconsummated marriage—Adoption of child by spouses.

The parties were married in 1941, but attempts by the husband to consummate the marriage were unsuccessful. In April, 1945, on the suggestion of the husband, the parties adopted a child under the provisions of the Adoption of Children Act, 1926. In November, 1946, the husband left the wife, and later he presented a petition for the nullity of the marriage on the ground that the wife was unable to consummate the marriage, or, alternatively, that she wilfully refused to do so. On the hearing of the petition,

HELD: in view of the fact that the adoption of the child affected not only the parties to the marriage, but also strangers thereto, and in the absence of evidence that at the time of the adoption the husband was unaware of his legal rights if the wife were incapable of consummating the marriage and the legal consequences of the adoption of the child and of proof that the husband initiated the adoption in the hope that the wife would overcome her repugnance to intercourse, there were circumstances proved which so plainly implied on the part of the husband a recognition of the existence of the marriage as to render it inequitable and contrary to public policy that he should be permitted to challenge it.

Observations of LORD WATSON in G. v. M. (1885) (10 App. Cas. 197), applied.

Dredge v. Dredge (otherwise Harrison) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 29) and L. v. L. ([1949] 1 All E.R. 141), distinguished.

Per Jenkins, L.J.: "The adoption of a child . . . is a solemn act which involves a representation to the court in the case of joint adopters that the joint adopters are husband and wife. On that representation . . . the court will make an order which transfers the adopted child from the legal protection of its natural parents to the legal protection of its statutory parents, as the adopters by force of the order in effect become . . . It seems to me difficult to imagine any act by two spouses which could more clearly affirm the existence and validity of their marriage."

EDITORIAL NOTE. The Adoption of Children Act, 1926 (with the exception of s. 5 (3) and (4) and s. 10) was repealed and replaced by the Adoption Act, 1950 (c. 26).

APPEAL by the wife from an order of Mr. Commissioner GRAZEBROOK, K.C., dated Nov. 8, 1951, whereby he granted a decree nisi of nullity to the husband on the ground that, at the time of the marriage and ever since, the wife had been incapable of consummating the marriage, or, alternatively, that she had wilfully refused to do so. In her answer the wife denied that she had wilfully refused to consummate the marriage, said that it had been consummated, and also contended that the marriage was approbated by the parties jointly adopting a child on Apr. 11, 1945. The wife cross-petitioned for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's desertion. The commissioner found that the marriage had never been consummated and held that the joint adoption of the child had not the effect of approbating the marriage on the part of the husband.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSLED, M.R.: The present proceedings were begun in October, 1950, by way of a petition by the husband asking for a decree of nullity of his marriage. That was resisted by the wife, and, though we have not gone into the detail of the pleadings, she prayed in her answer for dissolution of the marriage on the ground of her husband's desertion. The question we have to decide in the present case is whether, assuming in the husband's favour that he can establish and has established incapacity on the part of the wife or its equivalent, he by his conduct has so approbated the marriage that on grounds of equity or public policy or both this court ought not now to entertain his petition.

The marriage took place in January, 1941, from which fact it will be observed that the petition was not presented for close on ten years after the marriage. By that I am not to be taken to be implying that the delay of itself can amount to approbation. Indeed, in Clifford v. Clifford (1) the view was expressly affirmed that it could not, but it is, nevertheless, a significant fact. It appears that at the time of the marriage both spouses were aware that the wife would probably not be able to bear children. A question was in issue between them whether she had also told her husband that there would be difficulty on her part in consummating the marriage. The first period of the marriage lasted from January, 1941, until the autumn of 1943. Though the husband was not particularly ardent sexually—and he was also clearly considerate—the attempts that were made prior to the autumn of 1943 to consummate the marriage admittedly were not successful. In that month the wife underwent an operation, first, for the removal of an ovarian cyst, and, secondly, for what is known as dilatation, intended to make penetration by the husband easier. The wife says that shortly after her return from hospital, namely, on Nov. 3, 1943 (a date which she precisely fixes), the marriage was consummated, and she says that sexual intercourse took place at times, though infrequently, thereafter. The husband's evidence (which was preferred by the commissioner) was that neither in November, 1943, nor at any later time was the marriage ever consummated, and, though the wife was to a degree acquiescent and helpful, on every occasion on which the attempt was made it was frustrated by a supervening repugnance or other reaction on her part. In 1943 the husband was in the Royal Air Force, and the parties lived together at various places during his service. At the end of 1944 the wife came into some money and purchased a bungalow at Carbis Bay, Cornwall, which thenceforth was the matrimonial home. The wife moved there immediately, and the husband went into the officers' quarters at the station where he was serving, joining the wife on his leaves. At the beginning of 1946 the husband was released from his service and joined his wife in Cornwall. The cohabitation there was not happy. It was said by the wife that sexual intercourse took place during that period, but for the last time somewhere about the early summer of 1946. On Nov. 26, 1946, the husband left the wife. He joined the Royal Navy and has remained a serving officer ever since.

[HIS LORDSHIP referred to the evidence relating to the non-consummation of the marriage and continued:] I cannot satisfy myself that there are good grounds for this court impeaching the conclusion of the commissioner that this marriage was never consummated, and that the reason for it was an incapacity, at any rate quoad this particular husband, on the wife's part. It then becomes necessary to consider the main question: Has the husband disabled himself from seeking the relief that he does by action amounting to approbation (as it is said) of the marriage he now seeks to have avoided? In June, 1944—that is to say, seven months after the wife had had her operation and when she was still unable to complete the sexual act, according to the husband's evidence—a child was adopted pursuant to the provisions of the Adoption of Children Act, 1926. Unhappily that child died, and in April, 1945, a suggestion was made by the husband (and there is no doubt whatever that it was at his instigation and initiative that this step was taken) of the adoption of a second child. On April 11 a second child was adopted.

The principle or rule of law (if it may be so called) that in certain circumstances a spouse is disabled or barred from proceeding to avoid a marriage on the ground of his wife's incapacity or wilful refusal to consummate has been established by the House of Lords since G. v. M. (2). That there were previous cases in which a petitioner had been so disentitled appears from the argument reported. Reference had been made to Guest v. Shipley (3) as an example, but the suggestion was made in G. v. M. (2) that the question turned on what had come to be called "sincerity". The word was derived from a judgment of LORD STOWELL and it was argued that to obtain a decree there must be no other motive on the part of the petitioner than a desire to obtain redress for a grievance really entertained, and that, if it could be said that the real reason why a husband wanted to have the marriage avoided was that he would by that means no longer have to make financial provision for his wife, the existence in his mind of that mercenary motive resulted in a fatal absence of "sincerity" in his petition. The House of Lords disposed of that argument, and, in doing so, stated what was the real principle of approbation. The classic expression of that principle is found in the speech of the EARL OF SELBORNE, L.C., and again in the speeches of LORD WATSON and LORD BRAMWELL, and in Clifford v. Clifford (1), TUCKER, L.J., set out the relevant passages in LORD SELBORNE's speech and those in the speeches of LORD BRAMWELL and LORD WATSON. I hope I shall be forgiven for not setting them out once more. It will suffice if I confine myself first to these words from LORD SELBORNE, L.C.'s speech (10 App. Cas. 186):

" . . . I think I can perceive that the real basis of reasoning which underlies that phraseology is this, and nothing more than this, that there may be conduct on the part of the person seeking this remedy which ought to estop that person from having it; as, for instance, any act from which the inference ought to be drawn that during the antecedent time the party has, with a knowledge of the facts and of the law, approbated the marriage which he or she afterwards seeks to get rid of . . . "

The matter was put thus by LORD WATSON in a phrase which counsel for the wife adopted for the purposes of his argument (ibid., 197):

" . . . there may be facts and circumstances proved which so plainly imply, on the part of the complaining spouse, a recognition of the existence and validity of the marriage, as to render it most inequitable and contrary to public policy that he or she should be permitted to go on to challenge it with effect."

Has there been conduct here on the part of the husband of such a character that the court must say that he has approbated the marriage and has affirmed its existence and validity so that it is inequitable, and (if it be necessary to

A have both conditions, though I do not so decide) also contrary to public policy, that his petition should be granted?

I have come to the conclusion that in this case an affirmative answer must be given to that question, and I first attach very great weight to this adoption in 1945. A proceeding to adopt a child under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, which was then in force, involved certain propositions and consequences.

B It involved that where two persons jointly adopted a child they must proceed on the footing that they were spouses. Where, indeed, a person claiming to be a married man or woman applied for an order for adoption under the Act, if he or she had a spouse, that spouse must consent. The Act further provided as a consequence of the adoption that the rights of the natural parent or parents as regards the child should be displaced, and that the adopted child should

C stand in relation to the adopters (if there be two) as if the latter had been the lawful father and mother of the child. Finally, it was provided that the fact that the child was adopted was to be entered in a special register. That was done in this case. I have in my hand the order made in April, 1945, on the joint application of the husband and wife, describing the spouses as husband and wife, jointly applying (as they could only do if they were husband and

D wife) to adopt a certain child, John, being the child of a woman named. The consent of that woman had either been obtained or dispensed with. So it was ordered that the applicants were authorised to adopt the infant and it was directed that the Registrar-General should make an entry recording this adoption in the adopted children register in accordance with the particulars set out in the schedule to the Act and the particulars in the schedule state the name

E of the adopted child (its Christian names only are given), the name, surname, and address of the adopters, and then the date of the birth and that of the adoption. That step seems to me to be very important and significant, affecting, as it does, not only the two persons who are the applicants, but also the child who was adopted and the mother of the child whose rights were displaced. The application was made on the footing that the applicants were parties to

F a valid marriage. In the course of the argument I put to counsel for the husband this extreme case. Supposing, in 1946, after admittedly the husband, according to his own story, had given up all hope of the consummation of the marriage, he had written to his wife and said: "A full marriage, a normal marriage, is impossible. We have to make the best of it, and in the circumstances it would be a help to us both to adopt a child, so let us do so", and then that they had

G adopted this child. In such circumstances, I think, it would be impossible to say that the act of the husband in initiating the application and in making it was not such an affirmation by him of the existence and validity of the marriage as would make it most inequitable and certainly contrary to public policy to permit him to turn round afterwards and say that there never was any valid marriage at all, but the whole basis on which he and his supposed wife

H had made the application was non-existent, and he asked to have the marriage avoided. There is this difference in the present case which I recognise—that, according to the evidence of the husband (which the commissioner accepted), at the time of the adoption he was still in the hope, and he was inspired by that hope in making the application, that the marriage would be eventually consummated. He says (though for my part I cannot help feeling doubt about this) that in the back of his mind when this second adoption was suggested by him was the hope that it would be a step helpful in achieving what he ultimately hoped would be achieved, namely, a physically normal marriage. That, I think, differentiates the case from the one I have stated by way of supposition, but the husband seems to me never to have put into words the hope which he expressed in evidence and never to have done other than to assert that the marriage was subsisting and valid and to have gone on doing so at a time when the hope, if it remained at all, must have been of a very remote character. Taking all those things together—and I am not saying that the one act of adoption in 1945, highly significant though it be, would necessarily have sufficed; it is unnecessary for me to do so—I feel impelled to hold, contrary to the view of the commissioner, that the husband has so approbated the marriage as to render it inequitable and also contrary to public policy for him now to assert and rely on its voidability.

Our attention was directed to a case which came before PEARCE, J., in 1949—L. v. L. (4). That was a remarkable case in which the petitioner was the wife and the incapacity was on the husband's side. It appeared that the husband had taken steps, by consulting a doctor, to try to improve his condition, but without success. It also appeared that the wife had been artificially inseminated from her husband's seed, and at the time she presented her petition, though she did not then know it, she was pregnant as a result of the insemination. Briefly, the argument for the husband was that the act plus the consequence of the artificial insemination amounted to such approbation of the marriage on the wife's part that it would be wrong and unconscionable and against public policy for her now to be heard to say that the marriage should be avoided. PEARCE, J., referred to the classic utterances of LORD SELBORNE and LORD WATSON and to certain other decisions—for example, Dredge v. Dredge (5), and put the matter to himself in this form [1949] 1 All E.R. 145):

“Her letters and her evidence show that she never intended to approbate an abnormal marriage.”

The reference to the letters shows (and it is a feature distinguishing L. v. L. (4) very strikingly from the present case) that throughout the distressing period when the husband and wife were trying to get over this overwhelming difficulty the wife had written making it plain beyond peradventure that, for her, normal sexual intercourse was an essential condition to the marriage. “The only security for marriage”, she said, “is the reality of marriage; this must be striven for at any price”; and that point of view was expressed with equal clarity throughout, during and after this period of her artificial inseminations.

How different is that from the present case where, as I have pointed out, whatever may have been in the back of the husband's mind, there is according to the evidence, and particularly the letters, no hint on his part of his having taken that view, still less of his having expressed it to the wife or anyone else, and I add that on any view of it the sexual side of the marriage was obviously far less important to this husband than it is to some. In the case before PEARCE, J., there was, concurrently with the wife's act in submitting to artificial insemination other conduct on her part, namely, the consistent and clear expression to her husband of her insistence on normal physical relations which must obviously have for him affected and qualified the nature of, and the true interpretation to be given to, the act and consequence of the artificial insemination relied on as constituting approbation. Nevertheless, I am not, for myself, satisfied of the correctness of the formula which I have read from the judgment of PEARCE, J. It is not, in my judgment, a question of “intending to approbate an abnormal marriage”, if by that language it is meant that the question is whether—whatever may have been the conduct, the “overt acts”, on the part of the complaining spouse—he or she intended (subjectively) to affirm or acquiesce in an abnormal marriage. The question, in my view, in this case, as in all such cases, is: Has the husband or wife (as the case may be) by conduct or overt acts consistent only with such affirmation approved the existence and validity of the particular marriage, whatever may be its particular attributes? I must not be taken to be saying that, on its particular facts, L. v. L. (4) was not correctly decided. It is unnecessary for me to express any opinion on that matter. Nor is it necessary for me to express any view on the question whether acquiescence in artificial insemination of a wife from the seed of a husband, without more, necessarily amounts to such an approbation by either spouse of the marriage between them as to constitute a bar to later proceedings by him or her for nullity on the ground of the other's incapacity or wilful refusal, or on the further question whether, if the answer to the preceding question be in the affirmative, the complaining spouse can, nevertheless, by the clear expression to the other of the necessary reservation on his or her part, protect himself or herself from the consequences that otherwise would flow from the act of artificial insemination, making it, as it were, an act on his or her part "without prejudice" to his or her other rights. In the present case, where there was no such expressed reservation on the husband's part, his conduct seems to me to have been consistent, and only consistent, with an approbation of the marriage by him of the most unequivocal character.

Dredge v. Dredge (5) I mention because it was referred to by counsel for the husband. That was a case in which the effect under the then legislation of a decree of nullity was to bastardise a child which had been conceived before the marriage. No question of that sort arises here, but counsel for the husband used it to show that the effect on the child of the two persons in question was not necessarily any bar to the granting of a decree of nullity if the grounds for such were shown. With that I agree. I have said, however, that this case is different from L. v. L. (4), and it is certainly different from Dredge v. Dredge (5), for the circumstance that the provisions of the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, have their effect on persons otherwise wholly unconnected with the marriage is, I think, a very important and significant circumstance.

There only remains this to be said. According to the formula which I have read from LORD SELBORNE's speech it is necessary that the complaining spouse who is said to have approved or affirmed the marriage should have known the facts and what his legal position was as a result of them. It is said by counsel for the husband that at the time when the adoption took place it was still not known as a certainty to the husband (according to his evidence) that the wife was incapable of consummation. I will assume that at that time there still lingered hope in his breast, though it must have been declining in strength, but it is not the adoption only; it is the adoption in the light of that which preceded and followed it that I think constituted affirmation. Certainly not so long after, it must have become plain to him that normal marital relations were impossible; and certainly the fact of their being difficult, if not impossible, never played any part whatever in anything he said in correspondence or otherwise as influencing his conduct. As regards his legal rights, there is no evidence before the court that he was unaware of what rights he would have if his wife was incapable of consummating the marriage, and at least in the absence of any such evidence it cannot, in my judgment, be assumed in his favour that he was ignorant of what the consequences would be if he could prove such incapacity. In all the circumstances of this case I think that the formula in LORD SELBORNE's speech has been satisfied and that the conduct of the husband, taken over the whole period, was consistent, and consistent only, with such affirmation of the marriage as now to make it inequitable (that is, unjust as between the two parties to the suit) and also contrary to public policy for this court to grant his prayer. The consequence will be that the judgment ought to be reversed and we must send the matter back to the court below in order that the question of dissolution of the marriage on the grounds of desertion may be pursued if the wife desires to pursue it, and it may be necessary for leave to be given for the husband to amend his pleadings.

Those are matters with which the judge will deal. I think that this decree nisi for nullity should be set aside.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. [His LORDSHIP said that the commissioner's decision on the question whether the marriage had been consummated should not be disturbed and continued:] The wife pleaded that the husband approbated the marriage by adopting, jointly with the wife, a boy born on Nov. 14, 1944, under an adoption order dated Apr. 11, 1945. The question is whether that adoption and the part the husband took in bringing it about amounted to an approbation of the marriage so as to prevent him now from relying on its non-consummation. The answer to that question depends on the application to the facts of this case of the principle stated in the House of Lords in G. v. M. (2). I have no desire to multiply citations, but I may, perhaps, be forgiven for referring again to the passage in the speech of LORD WATSON in which the principle is succinctly stated. It will be remembered that he says this (10 App. Cas. 197):

"I think that when those cases are dissected they do show the existence of this rule in the law of England, that in a suit for nullity of marriage there may be facts and circumstances proved which so plainly imply, on the part of the complaining spouse, a recognition of the existence and validity of the marriage, as to render it most inequitable and contrary to public policy that he or she should be permitted to go on to challenge it with effect."

Are the facts and circumstances proved concerning the adoption in this case facts and circumstances which so plainly imply on the part of the husband a recognition of the existence and validity of the marriage as to render it most inequitable and contrary to public policy that he should now be permitted to challenge it? In my view, that question admits of only one answer. The adoption of a child under the Adoption of Children Act, 1926, the relevant statute at the material time in this case, is a solemn act which involves a representation to the court in the case of joint adopters that the joint adopters are husband and wife. On that representation and on proper evidence as to the means, respectability, and responsibility of the spouses and the stability of their home the court will make an order which transfers the adopted child from the legal protection of its natural parents to the legal protection of its statutory parents, as the adopters by force of the order in effect become. There is a representation by them to the court expressly of the existence, and impliedly of the validity, of the marriage, and, acting on that representation, the court makes an order which irretrievably alters the status of the adopted child. More than that, the rights of the natural parents or parent of the adopted child are by force of the order put an end to, and the consent of the natural parents or parent is in ordinary circumstances a necessary preliminary to the order. Thus, the third parties affected by the order include, in addition to the child itself, its natural parents or parent, who, on the footing that the application for adoption is being made by a married couple, will in general have agreed to resign, and in any case will by virtue of the order have been caused to resign, to that married couple, all parental rights and duties with regard to the child. It seems to me difficult to imagine any act by two spouses which could more clearly affirm the existence and validity of their marriage. Unless, therefore, it can be said here that what was done as regards the adoption of this child was done, so far as the husband was concerned, without adequate knowledge of the facts and of the law (which is one of the conditions of approbation stated by LORD SELBORNE in G. v. M. (2)) it seems to me to be plain in the result that he must be taken to have approbated the marriage. A knowledge of the law must be imputed to him in the absence of evidence that he was ignorant of it. As regards knowledge of the facts, he knew full well of the difficulty there was as to intercourse with his wife, and he knew full well at the time of the adoption in April, 1945, that the operation from which an improvement had been hoped and which had taken place some eighteen months previously, had failed to produce the desired result.

A Counsel for the husband argued that the marriage was even then in what might be called a probationary or trial stage. The husband, he suggests, was still hoping to make it a normal marriage and prevailed on the wife to agree to and to concur with him in carrying out the adoption in the hope that this end might be achieved. I need not pause to consider what effect, if any, a private understanding of this nature between the adopting spouses might, if proved, have had on the result, for there is nothing, so far as I can see, in the contemporary correspondence which suggests that the husband initiated this project of adoption with any such object in view. To judge by the letter of Feb. 21, 1945, his reason for recommending an adoption was simply to help his wife get over her grief and feelings of anxiety in regard to the unfortunate death of the previously adopted child. There was certainly no suggestion at all, so far as I can tell from the correspondence, by the husband to the wife that the adoption was being proposed by him on any other footing but that this was a valid and subsisting marriage. He never suggested to her at all that it was an experiment with a view to turning an invalid marriage into a valid one. In my view, the effect of a proceeding such as this adoption cannot be judged by reference to any intention the husband may have had locked in his own bosom. His acts must be judged by reference to their own nature and by reference to his declared intentions at the material time. Judged by D that standard, it seems to me that the adoption in the circumstances of the present case fell within the statement of the principle of approbation contained in LORD WATSON'S speech in G. v. M. (2). Accordingly, for the reasons given by my Lord, and for such reasons as I have been able to add to them, I agree that on this issue of approbation the appeal should be allowed, with the consequences that my Lord has indicated.

E HODSON, L.J., said that he had no doubt that the decision of the commissioner relating to the non-consummation of the marriage was right, and continued: With regard to the other matter, the commissioner, on the question whether or not this marriage had been approbated, referred to the state of mind of the husband in this way:

F "It is quite clear from the letters that he was the one to persuade the wife to adopt this second child, the first child who was adopted having died, because he said he desired his wife to overcome a sort of fear she had got or seemed to have got over the loss of the first child, and he said he was anxious that she should adopt this second child, and hopeful that it would help the married life, and particularly on the sexual side."

G I think that that passage in his judgment is based, not on any evidence that the husband had given, but rather on a misapprehension of the effect of the letter of Feb. 21, 1945, the second paragraph of which is:

H "I know you're afraid of having another child. That's one of the reasons why I'm anxious for you to have one, because only by so doing will you get over that fear, and also a lurking fear every time you hold someone else's baby. I care for you too much to want to see you living for the rest of your life in terror."

In its context, that passage clearly refers to the sorrow which had come into their lives—particularly, perhaps, into the life of the wife—by the loss of the child that had been adopted and to the husband's anxiety to allay her fears and her feeling that she in some way had been responsible for the death of the child, and had nothing to do with the prospects of sexual unity between these people in the future. Even if the evidence had been such as to justify the commissioner in finding that such was the husband's state of mind, I agree with what has already been said by my Lords to the effect that the existence of such an intention, certainly an intention locked in his bosom and not declared, would not detract from the effect of his overt act, in concert with his wife, of adopting a child, and I think that that fact, namely, the adoption of the child in 1945, taken in its background in the circumstances of this case with full knowledge of the law and the facts—and I need not elaborate those two qualifications which are implicit in the doctrine relied on here—is sufficient to prevent the husband from obtaining a decree on the grounds stated in the speech of LORD SELBORNE in the case of G. v. M. (2). I agree, therefore, that the appeal should be allowed and the case sent back for re-hearing on the issues raised in the pleadings on the prayer for divorce. Appeal allowed.

INLAND REVENUE COMMISSIONERS v. GORDON.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Tucker and Lord Cohen), February 4, 5, 6, 7, March 26, 1952.]

Income Tax—Foreign possessions—“Income arising from possessions out of United Kingdom.”—Debts incurred in London and discharged in Ceylon—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Case V, r. 2.

The taxpayer was a partner in a firm in Ceylon, where he had an account with the N. Bank which had its head office in London. In 1940 he was in London, and, owing to the war, he was unable to return to Ceylon. Before Jan. 2, 1942, the taxpayer opened an account with the N. Bank in London, and on Mar. 4, 1942, he made an oral arrangement with the bank in London whereby the bank allowed him without security to overdraw his account in London, it being arranged that the bank would transfer portions of his overdraft to the Colombo branch. The Colombo branch debited the taxpayer's account with the equivalent in rupees of the said transfers, and when there was not sufficient to the credit of the Colombo account to meet these debits the taxpayer arranged to pay rupees into that account for that purpose.

HELD: the moneys received by the taxpayer in London were advances of capital and the debts in London were discharged in Ceylon, no income being transferred from Ceylon to London, and, therefore, the moneys received by the taxpayer in the United Kingdom were neither derived from remittances payable in the United Kingdom nor money or value so received on credit or on account in respect of such remittances brought or to be brought into the United Kingdom within the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, Case V, r. 2, and, accordingly, they were not taxable.

Hall v. Marians (1935) (19 Tax Cas. 582), approved.

Trinidad Lake Asphalt Operating Co., Ltd. v. Trinidad & Tobago Income Tax Comrs. ([1945] 1 All E.R. 9), considered.

Per LORD COHEN: In order to succeed on the ground that the sums received by the taxpayer were from money or value arising from property not imported within r. 2 the Crown must establish that the money or value had been brought or was to be brought into the United Kingdom.

Decision of Court of Session (1950 S.C. 362), affirmed.

APPEAL by the Crown against an order of the First Division of the Court of Session (the Lord President (LORD COOPER), LORD CARMONT and LORD KEITH) dated June 1, 1950, made on a Case stated by the Special Commissioners of Income Tax.

The Special Commissioners discharged assessments to income tax made on the taxpayer under the Income Tax Act, 1918, sched. D, Case V, r. 2, holding that no income from possessions of the taxpayer outside the United Kingdom had been remitted to the taxpayer in the United Kingdom. The First Division upheld the Special Commissioners.

The respondent was at all material times senior partner in a firm carrying on business in Ceylon. He had a bank account with the Colombo branch of the National Bank of India (hereinafter referred to as "the bank"), which had its head office in London. Prior to the war he made periodic visits from Ceylon to England and in 1940 he was here on a visit. Owing to the war he was unable to return to Ceylon and had to reside in England until the termination of the war. He thus found himself in the position in the years now in question that, being a British subject, he was unable to satisfy the commissioners that he was not ordinarily resident in the United Kingdom: see r. 3 of the Rules Applicable to Case V. Some time prior to Jan. 2, 1942, the respondent opened an account with the head office of the bank, and between that date and Mar. 4, 1942, the account remained in credit. On or about that date the respondent made a verbal arrangement with the bank in London whereby they allowed him, without giving any security, to overdraw his account with the head office, and the head office arranged to transfer portions of his overdraft to the Colombo branch. The Colombo branch debited the respondent's account with the equivalent in rupees of the said transfers and the respondent arranged to pay rupees into the branch account to meet such debits. Originally no arrangement was made as to when such transfers of overdraft should be made, but in September, 1942, correspondence was exchanged between the London office of the bank and the respondent, the effect of which was to provide that whenever the figure reached £500 the overdraft should be transferred to Colombo.

The respondent first became overdrawn on Mar. 4, 1942. Thereafter operations on the banking account were made in accordance with the arrangements above stated. Excerpts of the accounts in Colombo and London recorded three transactions from Colombo to London which, it was admitted, were chargeable under r. 2. They were as follows (the dates being from the excerpts of the London account and the amount given in sterling) :—Feb. 2, 1942, £1,428 12s. 8d.; May 23, 1942, £1,999 12s. 5d.; and Nov. 23, 1943, £600. The excerpts also recorded six transfers from London to Colombo, the amounts of which it is unnecessary to set out in full. They represented what the parties agreed were “ transfers of overdraft ”. A They differed only in this, that, as appeared from the excerpts from the Colombo account, three of them were made at a time when the balance to the credit of the Colombo account was not sufficient to wipe out the overdraft transferred. In those cases the debits appeared to have been met by payments in of rupees to the Colombo account. There was, however, sufficient to the credit of the Colombo account to meet the other three transfers at the dates when they were respectively B made. Interest was allowed by the bank on credit balances and was charged on debit balances of each of the accounts in Colombo and London. The Case Stated did not state whether or not interest was allowed and charged at the same rate in Colombo and in London.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 26. LORD NORMAND: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinion about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, D LORD COHEN. I agree with it in omnibus and have nothing to add.

The following opinions were read.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinion which is about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD COHEN. Subject to the reservation which I am about to E mention, I entirely agree with that opinion. I desire, however, to reserve for a future occasion any consideration of the meaning and effect of the words which appear in r. 2 of the Rules Applicable to Case V, sched. D, to the Income Tax Act, 1918. Counsel for the appellants did not rely on these words as being F applicable to the present case, and, consequently, your Lordships did not have the advantage of hearing any argument as to their meaning. For this reason, I find myself unable either to agree or to disagree with the views expressed by my noble and learned friend as to the meaning of those somewhat obscure words. I agree with the motion proposed.

“ the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom . . . from money or value arising from property not imported ”

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, in this case I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinion which is to be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD COHEN, in which the relevant facts and the words of r. 2 of Case V of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, are fully set out, and I, therefore, need not repeat them. I am in complete agreement with the reasoning by which he has arrived at the conclusion that the Crown has failed to bring this case G within the first or fourth sources of income referred to in r. 2, viz., (i) remittances payable in the United Kingdom and, (ii) money or value so received on credit or on account in respect of any such remittances, property, money or value brought or to be brought into the United Kingdom. In my view, the transaction in the present case consisted of a loan or loans granted in London on the express terms that the debt or debts thereby created were to be repayable only in Ceylon where they have been in fact repaid. That the loans produced “ actual sums H received in the United Kingdom" is not in dispute, but such sums were not derived from remittances payable in the United Kingdom nor were they derived from money or value received in the United Kingdom on credit or on account in respect of such remittances. There was no evidence that any moneys were ever remitted from Ceylon to London in connection with the loans, and, even if the Colombo branch did remit to head office in London, they would have been dealing with the bank's own moneys.

My Lords, I do not question the proposition that there may be remittances within the rule as a result of appropriate book entries without the transfer of bullion or negotiable instruments, but I share my noble friend's difficulty in following the reasoning of the judgment of the Privy Council in Trinidad Lake Asphalt Operating Co., Ltd. v. Trinidad & Tobago Income Tax Comrs. (1) in so far as the conclusion was reached that a settlement of cross accounts by appropriate book entries in Trinidad amounted to a transmission of money to a non-resident outside the colony. That there was a transmission to a non-resident which would seem to have been sufficient for the decision is, I think, clear, but how it was a transmission to New York where the non-resident resided I find difficulty in understanding, and I do not feel able to apply the reasoning in that case to the facts in the present case to the extent of holding that each time the debt incurred in London was transferred to Colombo and satisfied by the taxpayer in that place by money standing to his credit or subsequently paid in, it resulted in law in a remittance to him in the United Kingdom.

I only desire to add a few words with regard to the third source in r. 2, viz., money or value arising from property not imported. This does not seem to have figured prominently, if at all, in argument before the Special Commissioners or in the Court of Session, but it was to some extent relied on by the Crown in your Lordships' House. I do not think that the sums received by every loan in the United Kingdom can be said to have been received from money or value arising from property not imported. I find it difficult to ascertain of what the money or value consisted, and in any event the mere fact that it was contemplated that the loans would eventually be repaid out of the profits of a business conducted in Ceylon would not, in my opinion, make the source money or value arising from property not imported. I would prefer to reserve the question whether the "money or value arising from property not imported" must itself be brought into the United Kingdom. For these reasons I would dismiss this appeal.

LORD COHEN: My Lords, this appeal relates to additional assessments to income tax made on the respondent under Case V of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, to cover income alleged to be chargeable under r. 2 of the rules applicable to the said Case. The facts that are alleged to give rise to this liability are as follows. [His LORDSHIP stated the facts as set out above and continued:]

At this stage it will be convenient for me to set out the provisions of r. 2 as substituted by the Finance Act, 1940, s. 19 (2), on the construction of which the questions at issue between the parties depend. It provides:

"The tax in respect of income arising from possessions out of the United Kingdom, other than income to which r. 1 applies, shall be computed on the full amount of the actual sums annually received in the United Kingdom from remittances payable in the United Kingdom, or from property imported, or from money or value arising from property not imported, or from money or value so received on credit or on account in respect of any such remittances, property, money, or value brought or to be brought into the United Kingdom, on an average of the three preceding years as directed in Case I, without any deduction or abatement other than is therein allowed."

The three years average basis is not now applicable. It will be observed that to bring this rule into operation, the sums received in the United Kingdom must be derived from one of the four specified sources, viz.: (a) remittances payable in the United Kingdom; (b) property imported; (c) money or value arising from property not imported; (d) money or value so received on credit or on account in respect of any such remittances, property, money or value brought or to be brought into the United Kingdom.

Before the Special Commissioners the dispute between the parties was whether the transactions to which I have referred amounted to an arrangement for the remittance of money to this country from Colombo. The commissioners considered they were bound by Hall v. Marians (2)—the facts in which case they regarded as indistinguishable from the facts in the case before them—to hold that no sums of income from possessions outside the United Kingdom had been remitted to the appellant in the United Kingdom. They, therefore, allowed the respondent's appeal and discharged the additional assessments. They stated the questions for the opinion of the court as follows: (1) Were the commissioners entitled to hold that no sums of income from possessions outside the United Kingdom were remitted to the respondent in the United Kingdom? (2) Whether on the facts stated the respondent was assessable under Case V, r. 2, of sched. D, to the extent that the sums in the Colombo account used to repay the bank consisted of income, and, if so, (3) whether there was a remittance within the said r. 2 (a) each time the respondent drew money in London, or (b) when the London drawings were repaid to the bank in Colombo. When the case came before the First Division of the Court of Session they reached the conclusion that question (1) should be answered in the affirmative, and question (2) in the negative, with the result that they affirmed the decision of the Special Commissioners, and question (3) did not arise. Before us the dispute was finally concentrated on the question whether the appellants could bring their claim within the first or fourth of the sources specified in r. 2. It was common ground that there had been no property imported which could bring the second source into consideration. At one time counsel for the appellants suggested that it might be said that there were sums received in the United Kingdom from "money or value arising from property not imported", but I think that he ultimately recognised that it was impossible to bring this case within the third source without grossly distorting the language used and, in particular, without placing on the word "from" a meaning which it could not properly bear. There might have been another difficulty in counsel's way had he persisted in this argument. To succeed on it, it would have been necessary for him to satisfy us that the "money or value arising from property not imported" need not itself be brought into the United Kingdom. It is plain from the wording of the rule that sums cannot be said to be received in the United Kingdom from the first, second or fourth sources unless the source was itself payable in, imported into, or brought or to be brought into the United Kingdom. It would be strange if the sums received in the United Kingdom from the third source were within the rule although the money or value was not imported or to be imported into the United Kingdom. It would be all the more strange since sums received in the United Kingdom from the fourth source—i.e., "money or value so received on credit or on account in respect of . . . such . . . money, or value" (i.e., the third source)—could not bring the rule into operation unless such money or value had been brought or was to be brought into the United Kingdom. I incline, therefore, to the view that to succeed under the rule in respect of sums received from the third source the Crown must establish that the money or value had been brought or was to be brought into the United Kingdom.

Before I deal with the question whether on the facts of this case it can be said that the sums received by the respondent in the United Kingdom were received from the first or fourth source indicated in the rule, I may usefully mention certain matters arising on the construction of r. 2 which, as counsel for the appellants pointed out, are clearly established by authority. Thus, (i) to attract tax, remittances must be remittances of income not capital: see Kneen v. Martin (3); (ii) remittances may render the taxpayer liable to tax although the actual payment is not to the taxpayer, but to someone by his direction: see Timpson's Executors v. Yerbury (4); but, (iii) not if the cheque or other instrument or thing constituting the remittance has ceased to be the property of the taxpayer before it reaches this country: see Carter v. Sharon (5); (iv) the remittance may be a remittance of income notwithstanding that at the date of the remittance the account of the taxpayer abroad through which the remittance was passed is already overdrawn: see Fellowes-Gordon v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (6).

With these propositions in mind I turn to the argument that was addressed to us that the amounts in question in this appeal were received from remittances payable in the United Kingdom within the first source or from money or value received within the fourth source. As I have already said, both the commissioners and the First Division of the Court of Session regarded the case as concluded against the appellants by the decision of the Court of Appeal in England in Hall v. Marians (2). That case came before the commissioners and the court on two separate occasions: see Hall v. Marians (7) (18 Tax Cas. 148) and Hall v. Marians (2) (19 Tax Cas. 582). As the facts were the same on both occasions and only the contentions differed, it will be sufficient if I refer to the second case which, unlike the first, went to the Court of Appeal. I take the facts from the headnote:

"The respondent's wife, who lived with her husband in London, was entitled to a share of the profits of a business carried on in Colombo. Her share was paid into her current account with the Colombo branch of a bank which was registered in the United Kingdom and had its head office in London. On her instructions these profits were invested in Indian bonds. The respondent's wife had from time to time borrowed certain sums from the bank in London on the security of the bonds. On Apr. 1, 1930, she requested the bank in London to instruct its Colombo branch to sell sufficient securities to extinguish the loan. On the next day the bank informed her that the amount of her loan account (with interest) was being debited to the Colombo branch which was being instructed to realise securities to pay it off. The transfer was effected by cross entries in the books of the two offices, the entry in the London books being dated Apr. 3, 1930. A small credit balance in Colombo was thereupon converted into an overdraft on which interest was chargeable. A few weeks afterwards the overdraft and the interest accrued thereon were discharged in Colombo out of the proceeds of the sale of Indian bonds."

On those facts the Crown claimed income tax in respect of the amount of the overdraft transferred from the London office of the bank to the Colombo branch. The commissioners decided in favour of the taxpayer. FINLAY, J., allowed the appeal, but the Court of Appeal unanimously restored the decision of the commissioners.

As the Lord President (LORD COOPER) pointed out (1950 S.C. 362) in the court below, it is difficult to disentangle a single ratio decidendi from the judgments of the three members of the court. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., based his decision on the conclusion that there was clearly no actual remittance and, as he thought, nothing which amounted to a remittance in any form or in any value. ROMER, L.J., thought that there was a remittance, but that it was a remittance of capital and not income. MAUGHAM, L.J., agreed with ROMER, L.J., that, if it was a remittance, it was a remittance of capital, but, as I read his judgment, based his conclusion primarily on his acceptance of a contention advanced on behalf of the taxpayer and recorded in para. 9 (b) of the Case Stated as follows:

"That the loans owing to the National Bank of India in London had not been paid off by means of any remittances actual or constructive but that in substance and in fact there had been a series of capital advances in London charged on Indian securities in Ceylon and that the loans had been converted into a debt payable in Colombo with different incidents from those which had attached when the debt was payable in London."

I respectfully agree with the reasoning of MAUGHAM, L.J. There is this difference between the facts of the two cases, that there is no evidence in the present case that there were different incidents attached to the debt in Colombo from those which attached to the debt when it was payable in London. I do not, however, think that this difference in the facts necessarily leads to a different conclusion. It merely removes one piece of evidence supporting the conclusion that the loans in London had not been paid off by remittances from Ceylon. There was this further distinction in fact between the two cases, that in Marians' case (2) the respondent's husband had hoped to discharge his wife's indebtedness in London (see para. 7 of the Case Stated (19 Tax Cas. 585)), whereas, in the present case it was never contemplated that the debt should be repaid except in Colombo. I do not, however, think this affects the matter. Counsel for the appellants relied on a passage in the judgment of ROMER, L.J., where he said (ibid., 600):

"Had the bank in this country allowed her [Mrs. Marians] to draw the £440 on account or in advance or in respect of sums of money that they were expecting to receive in the future from the bank in Colombo, representing income from her foreign possessions, the matter would have been different, but, as I understand it, this money, the money that she was allowed to draw from the bank, was a loan from the bank in its strict sense, and that is found as a fact by the commissioners in para. 7 of the Stated Case."

Counsel read this passage as meaning that, if the stated hypothesis had been actual fact, ROMER, L.J., would have decided the case in the opposite way. ROMER, L.J., does not express a concluded opinion, but I think it is a fair inference that he would have done so. Even so, I do not think his observations help the appellants, since in the present case I am unable to trace any finding of fact that the bank in England ever made the loan on account of or in advance or in respect of money of the respondent representing income which the bank were expecting to receive in England from the branch in Colombo.

We have to decide this case on its facts, but I agree with the judges of the First Division that it is difficult to distinguish the case before us in any material respect from Hall v. Marians (2). Counsel for the appellants laid some stress on the fact that the accounts in Colombo and London were with the same bank in the case before us. So they were in Hall v. Marians (2). I do not think this fact can relieve the court of the burden of deciding whether or not there was a remittance of income to London. The solution of this question depends, in my opinion, on the effect of the agreement that the London overdraft should be transferred to Colombo. I agree with LORD KEITH that the only sensible meaning that can be given to that agreement is that the debt created in London was to be repaid in Colombo. If that be the correct meaning, it seems to me that when the debt was repaid, whether out of moneys standing to the credit of the Colombo account at the date the entries in the book were made or out of moneys subsequently paid into the Colombo account, the rupees applied in repayment became the property of the bank in Ceylon. There is no evidence whether they were remitted to London or not, but, assuming they were remitted, they had previously become the property of the bank and could not be said to be property of the respondent. The case would, therefore, fall within Carter v. Sharon (5) and not within Timpson's Executors v. Yerbury (4).

Counsel for the appellants says that this conclusion is inconsistent with the decision of the Privy Council in Trinidad Lake Asphalt Operating Co., Ltd. v. Trinidad & Tobago Income Tax Comrs. (1). In that case, the appellant company had been assessed under the Income Tax Ordinance, 1940, s. 30, in respect of a dividend payable to the Barber Asphalt Corpn. of New Jersey, U.S.A. (hereinafter called "Barber"). Barber had no office or place of business in Trinidad and never exercised or carried on any trade or business there, but was the holder of almost all the shares in the appellant company. At the date of declaration of the dividend, Barber were indebted to the appellant company in an amount equal to the amount of the dividend, and in pursuance of an agreement between the parties, no money or cheque changed hands, but the matter was settled by appropriate entries in the books of the two companies. In these circumstances, the Crown claimed income tax from the appellant company under the Income Tax Ordinance, 1940, s. 30, which provided:

"Any resident agent, trustee, mortgagor or other person, who transmits rent, interest, or income derived from any other source within the colony, to a non-resident person, shall be deemed to be the agent of such non-resident person and shall be assessed and pay the tax accordingly."

One question that arose was whether to bring the section into operation the transmission to the non-resident person must be to him outside the limits of the colony. There was nothing in the language of the section to necessitate such a construction, but the board proceeded on the footing that "transmits" meant transmits to a non-resident outside the limits of the colony. LORD WRIGHT delivered the judgment of the board. He relied on Spargo's Case (8) as establishing that there may be payment by settlement of accounts without the necessity of money actually changing hands. He referred to some observations of LORD LINDLEY in Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Bishop (9) ([1902] A.C. 296) as further supporting the view that a settlement of accounts may be equivalent to a receipt of a sum of money. He said that since 1902 the transmission of funds had become still more divorced in the minds of business men and even of lawyers from the idea of any material embodiment. His conclusion may be summed up in the following passages ([1945] 1 All E.R. 13):

"In the present case, no one could say that the entries in the books of the two companies did not represent a genuine transaction and a receipt of money in the form in which money is transmitted and received as between business men . . . The only evidence or material embodiment of the transaction may consist of entries in the books on each side made in pursuance of their agreement. But what has happened is, if so intended, equivalent to a receipt of money, in LORD LINDLEY's words, and a receipt of anything by a person who is at a distance from the sender involves a transmission. Hence, in their Lordships' opinion, the transaction in the present case involved a transmission of 'revenue' within the meaning of s. 30 from the appellant to Barber, with the consequence that the appellant became liable as statutory agent for the amount of the tax."

Speaking for myself, I doubt if I should have come to the conclusion that there had been a transmission outside Trinidad. I should have inclined to the view that the parties had expressly agreed that there should be no transmission outside Trinidad, but that the debt should be discharged by payment by way of set-off in Trinidad. I might still have reached the same concrete result as LORD WRIGHT, for, as at present advised, I see no reason why, for the purpose of the section, the transmission to the non-resident need be outside the island. This point does not, however, arise for decision in the present case. Even if I were to accept the whole of LORD WRIGHT's reasoning, it would not, I think, decide the present case. Let me assume that in the Trinidad case (1) Barber had not been indebted to the appellant company and had had no place of business in the colony and had never exercised or carried on any trade or business there. Let me assume, further, that before the dividend was declared it had been agreed that payment of it should be made by a transfer by the appellant company to an account to be opened in the name of Barber with a bank in Trinidad. If this had been carried out, there would, no doubt, have been a transmission by the appellant company to Barber, but I cannot imagine that any court would have held that that was a transmission outside the limits of the colony.

The hypothetical case I have put seems to me far nearer in its facts to the present case than the actual case which arose for decision in the Privy Council in 1945. True it is that in the present case the original indebtedness of the respondent to the bank was created by a loan in London, but the parties agreed that that loan should be discharged by payment in Ceylon. In these circumstances, to hold that there was a remittance to London in the present case would, I think, be to disregard the warnings given by the EARL OF HALSBURY, L.C., and LORD MACNAGHTEN in Gresham Life Assurance Society v. Bishop (9), to which the Lord President referred (1950 S.C. 359, 360), not to be led astray by an equivalent to a remittance or receipt or a constructive receipt.

Let me conclude with a citation from the speech of LORD SIMONDS in the very recent case of St. Aubyn (L.M.) v. A.-G. (No. 2) (10). LORD SIMONDS said ([1951] 2 All E.R. 485):

"LORD WENSLEYDALE's familiar words in Re Micklethwait (11) (11 Exch. 456), which were cited by LORD HALSBURY, L.C., in Tennant v. Smith (12) ([1892] A.C. 154), may again be repeated: 'It is a well-established rule, that the subject is not to be taxed without clear words for that purpose; and also, that every Act of Parliament must be read according to the natural construction of its words'. LORD HALSBURY adds that in a taxing Act it is impossible to assume any intention or governing purpose in the Acts to do more than take such tax as the statute imposes: it must be seen whether the tax is expressly imposed. This is true doctrine which I must bear in mind as I listen to the constant refrain of learned counsel for the Crown that this or that is just the transaction at which this or that section is aimed. The question is not at what transaction the section is according to some alleged general purpose aimed, but what transaction its language according to its natural meaning fairly and squarely hits."

Applying this citation to the present case it is attractive to suggest that, as the respondent obtained and spent these loans in London and was, so far as the evidence goes, able to discharge them only from moneys in Ceylon, part at any rate of which was income, and as the loan was, in fact, discharged, the money he received in England must have been received at least in part from remittances of income from Ceylon. Attractive though this may be, it seems to me quite impossible to bring what happened within the compass of the rule. It is plain that the income receipts of the respondent were all received in Ceylon. It is plain that the moneys he received in London were advances of capital. There is no finding that those advances were made on credit or on account in respect of income in Ceylon which it was intended should be brought to London. On the contrary, the parties expressly agreed that the debt should be discharged in Ceylon, it was so discharged, and there is no evidence that the rupees which the bank received in Ceylon were ever remitted to London. For these reasons, which are in substance the same as those given by the Court of Session, I would dismiss the appeal. The case must be remitted to the Court of Session in order that any necessary adjustments may be made to give effect to the admissions made by counsel for the taxpayer as to the transfers of £1,428 12s. 8d., £1,999 12s. 5d. and £600 to which I have already referred.

Appeal dismissed.

JAMIESON v. JAMIESON.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Normand, Lord Merriman, Lord Reid and Lord Tucker), January 30, 31, March 20, 1952.]

Divorce—Cruelty—Mental cruelty—Evidence—Effect of Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, on principles to be applied—Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925 (c. 49), s. 176 (c), as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (c. 57), s. 2.

A

Where it is sought to prove cruelty by evidence of a course of conduct adopted by one spouse with the deliberate intention of wounding and humiliating the other spouse and making his or her life a burden and of a continuance in that conduct in the knowledge that it is severely affecting his or her mental or physical health the offence may be proved by evidence of a number of acts each of which is serious in itself, but it may be even more effectively proved by evidence of a long continued series of minor acts, none of which could be regarded as serious if taken in isolation. The intention need not be proved by direct evidence. It can be inferred from the whole facts and atmosphere disclosed by the evidence. The respondent's acts must be judged in relation to the surrounding circumstances, which include the physical or mental condition and the capacity for endurance or the peculiar susceptibility of the innocent spouse, the intention of the offending spouse, and the offender's knowledge of the actual or probable effect of his conduct on the other's health.

Per curiam: There has been no change in the law of England regarding cruelty consequent on the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, and there is no difference between the law of Scotland and the law of England in relation to this matter.

APPEAL by the wife from an order of the First Division of the Court of Session (the Lord President (LORD COOPER) and LORD CARMONT, LORD KEITH dissentiente) dated Jan. 9, 1951, and reported 1951 S.C. 286, adhering to an interlocutor of the lord ordinary (LORD BLADES) dated July 19, 1950, whereby he sustained a plea by the husband that the wife's averments in an action for divorce on the ground of cruelty were irrelevant and dismissed the action. The husband pleaded that the wife's averments were irrelevant and that the action should be dismissed. This plea was sustained by the lord ordinary. C

In the course of his judgment the Lord President referred to "the marked contrast between the language and the phraseology" of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, and the Divorce (Scotland) Act, 1938, in dealing with divorce on the ground of cruelty, and said (1951 S.C. 292): D

"Whether it be that the Scottish character is of tougher fibre or of blunter susceptibilities, or that the Calvinist tradition still finds expression in a deeper sanctity of the marriage tie and its obligations, the fact remains that more than one decree on the ground of 'cruelty' has recently been pronounced in England which would not have been granted in Scotland. I conceive it to be the duty of the Scottish courts to continue to apply Scottish law and practice in the same spirit as in the past, and I do not feel called upon to examine narrowly the English decisions which were pressed upon us, for these were pronounced by a foreign court on the construction of a differently worded statute and against a different background of common law, practice and tradition." E

The First Division held that the facts averred did not constitute such cruelty as was required to support an application for divorce, and dismissed the action as irrelevant. F

 The House took time for consideration. G

Mar. 20. The following opinions were read. H

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, the circumstances which have led to this appeal are set out in the opinion which will be delivered by my noble and learned friend, LORD REID. We have to consider whether the averments of the pursuer and appellant are relevant to infer such cruelty towards her as would justify, according to the law and practice existing at the passing of the Divorce (Scotland) Act, 1938, the granting of a decree of separation a mensa et thoro, and, therefore, of a decree of divorce a vinculo since the passing of that Act.

A The action is based on what is conveniently called mental cruelty. Physical violence is not averred, but there are averments of conduct by the respondent causing injury to his wife's health and persisted in after he was aware of its injurious effects. There is also an averment that a continuance of life with the respondent would be seriously injurious to the appellant's health. Mental cruelty was well recognised as a ground for an action of separation long before the passing of the Act of 1938. Thus, in Aitchison v. Aitchison (1) LORD Low held that conduct of a defender, if it was improper and unjustifiable and if it caused injury to the pursuer's health, was a good ground of action, although no physical violence was averred. He distinguished the well-known case of Russell
v. Russell (2) because in that case there was no evidence of injury to the plaintiff's health. The Lord President found it necessary, in view of some of the arguments addressed to the First Division, to vindicate the jurisdiction of the court to entertain the plea of relevance and to dismiss actions of this sort on consideration of the averments. There ought to be no doubt whatever that, if the defender in such an action as this moves the court to sustain a plea to relevance, the court is bound to entertain the plea and to examine the averments no less strictly than in any other action, nor that, if it comes to the opinion that the averments do not satisfy the test of relevance, its duty is to sustain the plea and dismiss the action. The dismissal of an action when the averments do not satisfy the test of relevance not only saves the parties unnecessary expense but, as the Lord President pointed out, avoids, in a divorce case, the exacerbation of the parties' feelings and the destruction of any chance of reconciliation which are often inseparable from the ventilation in evidence of their charges and counter-charges and mutual suspicions. The test of relevance is the same for all actions; there is not one standard for actions of divorce and another standard for other actions.
Counsel for the respondent submitted at the hearing of the appeal that, if the pursuer's averments do not necessarily lead to a conclusion in her favour, the case is not relevant, and he cited in support of that proposition the opinion of LORD HUNTER: M'Dougal v. MacDougall (3) (1931 S.C. 114). LORD HUNTER's opinion is entitled to weight, nevertheless I think that the test was not accurately formulated by him. The true proposition is that an action will not be dismissed, as irrelevant unless it must necessarily fail even if all the pursuer's averments are proved. The onus is on the defender who moves to have the action dismissed and there is no onus on the pursuer to show that, if he proves his averments, he is bound to succeed. In the present case, however, the basis of the judgments both of the lord ordinary and of the learned judges of the majority in the First Division is that, if all the pursuer's averments were proved, she would be bound to fail.

There was some difference of opinion between the Lord President and LORD CARMONT on the question whether a defender's conduct is to be judged by reference to its probable effect on the health of a pursuer of normal susceptibilities or whether it is relevant for a pursuer to aver that the conduct alleged did in fact cause him or her mental suffering and consequent injury to health. Neither of the learned judges proposed a dogmatic answer and for my part I am respectfully inclined to accept the Lord President's view that "the conduct alleged must be judged up to a point by reference to the victim's capacity for endurance in so far as that capacity is or ought to be known to the other spouse". There is the high authority of LORD WATSON in Mackenzie v. Mackenzie (4) ([1895] A.C.
405) for the proposition that much depends in each case on its circumstances and, in particular, on the victim's capacity for endurance. That leaves it open to find, after evidence, that the pursuer was the victim of his or her own abnormal hypersensitiveness and not of cruelty inflicted by the defender. But the cases in which such a decision would be possible without evidence must be exceedingly rare, and this case is certainly not one of them. The Lord President, I think, reaches the crux of the case when he says that "where the cruelty is of the type conveniently described as mental cruelty, the guilty spouse must either intend to hurt the victim or at least be unwarrantably indifferent as to the consequences to the victim". There is room for differences of opinion about what kinds of case may be covered by the words "unwarrantably indifferent". I do not propose to go into that because I wish to avoid the discussion of hypothetical cases and because I am of opinion that actual intention to hurt may have in a doubtful case a decisive importance and that such an intention has been averred here. Actual intention to hurt is a circumstance of peculiar importance because conduct which is intended to hurt strikes with a sharper edge than conduct which is the consequence of mere obtuseness or indifference. My noble and learned friends have discussed the averments in the opinions which they will deliver and which I have had the advantage of reading, and they have shown that the appellant has averred a case of actual intention to hurt, wilfully persisted in after the injury to the appellant's health was apparent to the respondent. These averments are, in my opinion, relevant, and they are, I think, supported by sufficiently specific instances of the respondent's alleged cruelty. I, therefore, agree that the action should go to proof.

My Lords, I think that it does not do justice to the averments to take up each alleged incident one by one and hold that it is trivial or that it is not hurtful or cruel and then to say that cumulatively they do not amount to anything grave, weighty or serious. The relationship of marriage is not just the sum of a number of incidents, and in this case it has been overlooked that all the incidents averred are said to have been inspired by the respondent's intention to impose his will on his wife without consideration of her feelings or health. Moreover, it is impossible in the bald averments of a condescendence to convey the effects of the conduct of one spouse on the feelings, and through the feelings on the health, of the other spouse. What on paper may seem little more than a series of pin-pricks may present a very different aspect when it has been developed in evidence, though the evidence does not exceed by a single word the bounds set by the record. These considerations do not derogate from the jurisdiction of the court, but they do impose special caution in the application of the test of relevance to actions founded on mental cruelty. The observations of noble lords in Watt (or Thomas) v. Thomas (5) on the value to be attached in an action of divorce for cruelty to the opinion of the lord ordinary who saw and heard the witnesses, especially the parties, though they are directed to the caution which a court of appeal should observe in reversing the lord ordinary's decision after proof, carry also a warning on the caution to be observed in dismissing an action without proof and on consideration of the averments alone.

The Lord President has suggested that under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, the courts in England have, for the purposes of divorce, adopted in principle a less exacting standard of cruelty than was required for the purposes of separation, whereas the Scottish courts have, in compliance with the express provision of the Divorce (Scotland) Act, 1938, adhered to the principles already established in actions of separation. It would be a misfortune if that were so. Certainly before 1937 the courts of England and Scotland followed the same principles in granting and refusing judicial separation for cruelty. The law they both administered was derived from the ecclesiastical courts, and decisions in Scottish cases and in English cases were cited indifferently in both countries as, indeed, they still are. The position is entirely different from that in the law of divorce for desertion, and I regret an unguarded sentence of mine in Weatherley v. Weatherley (6) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 566), if it has led to confusion through being thought to apply beyond divorce for desertion, which was the subject-matter of that case.

When divorce on the ground of cruelty was introduced, a difference was made between the language of s. 176 (c) of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925, as substituted by s. 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (now

s. 1 (1) (c) of the Act of 1950) and the language of the Divorce (Scotland) Act, 1938, s. 1 (1) (c). The Scottish Act expressly prescribed that the cruelty that shall justify divorce shall be the same cruelty as would justify, according to the law and practice existing at the passing of the Act, the granting of a decree of separation. The English Act had made no reference to existing law or practice. It humbly appears to me that the reason for this difference is not very abstruse.

A In England before 1937 cruelty played a part, if a subordinate part, as a ground of action in divorce when the husband was the defendant, and, as I understand, the cruelty was the same in kind and degree as the cruelty that would justify a decree of separation in England or in Scotland. In Scotland cruelty had no place as a ground or partial ground of action in divorce, but it had a place as a defence in actions of adherence, and, consequently, in actions of divorce for desertion. But there was a controversy whether a less degree of misconduct would serve as a defence in an action of divorce for desertion than was required as the foundation of a decree of separation. The question was discussed in Mackenzie v. Mackenzie (4) and opinions on it were reserved. Accordingly, it was appropriate that the Scottish Act should define the kind and degree of cruelty to be required as the ground of an action for divorce. It was not necessary C to do this in the English Act since cruelty was already recognised as a partial ground of action in divorce procedure, and it was cruelty of the same kind and degree as was necessary for separation. If that is the explanation of the difference of language between the two Acts, that difference ought not to have led to any divergence in principle between the law of Scotland and the law of England as regards the kind or degree of cruelty necessary for divorce. It is not necessary D in this appeal to consider whether there has been in English cases a departure from principles firmly established as part of the law of cruelty before 1937. There may be a difference between the views of individual judges on the value of the facts proved as justifying a finding of cruelty, but that is not a difference of principle. Uniformity of judgment in assessing the value of facts is an ideal which is never attained, even in the courts of a single country. It has sometimes E been said in England that the Scottish courts have been too easy and liberal in granting divorce, and sometimes the same has been said in Scotland of the English courts. Allowance in judging of the significance of language or conduct used by one spouse to another must be made for national, local and social habits, but I would find it difficult to sustain an argument that a country, which since the Reformation has allowed divorce for adultery to either spouse and to both spouses and has since 1573 allowed divorce for desertion to either spouse, has F consistently followed a tradition more favourable to the sanctity of the marriage tie than a country which permitted no action for divorce in its courts till the year 1857.

On another aspect of the Act of 1938 I respectfully and emphatically agree with the Lord President. The Act does not in any way restrain the development G of the law of cruelty as the foundation of actions of separation or of divorce. I wish to add that nothing that I have said should be understood as casting doubt on the decision in Dunlop v. Dunlop (7). I think that M'Donald v. M'Donald (8) was rightly decided and I agree with the reasoning of the Lord Justice-Clerk in that case. I have had the advantage of reading the opinion about to be delivered by my noble and learned friend LORD MERRIMAN, and I respectfully agree with H his observations on the identity of principles of the law of divorce for cruelty in England and Scotland. I agree with the dissenting judgment of LORD KEITH and I would allow the appeal.

LORD MERRIMAN: My Lords, while I wish to make it plain that I cast no doubt on the jurisdiction of the court to entertain in a consistorial cause the plea of relevance, I agree with LORD KEITH that it is desirable to bear in mind, particularly in connection with a charge of cruelty, how much depends on the general picture of the married life of the parties which it is so difficult to appreciate without a proof. Nowhere has the advantage, particularly in this class of case, of seeing and hearing the witnesses been stated more emphatically than in the opinions of LORD THANKERTON and LORD MACMILLAN in Watt (or Thomas) v. Thomas (5). It is true that their observations were directed to limiting the right of an appellate tribunal to interfere with the findings of a trial judge who has had that advantage. Nevertheless, the application of these observations to the question before your Lordships may be tested by supposing that the clear and accurate summary of the averments made by the lord ordinary was expressed, after proof, in the same words, mutatis mutandis, as a finding of the facts on which a decree of divorce had been pronounced, and that there was sufficient evidence to support those findings. Let it also be supposed that your Lordships were hearing an appeal from a reversal of the lord ordinary by the Inner House, and that their judgment was founded on the version of those facts given by the Lord President, beginning with the words (1951 S.C. 294): "Considerable space is devoted to the sexual relations of the spouses" down to the words (ibid., 295) "so preyed upon her mind that she attempted to commit suicide by putting a gas tube in her mouth." On these suppositions I think that the judgment would be open to criticism in the following respects. First, it is by no means clear in what sense the question of sexual relations was abandoned. It appears only to have been abandoned as a substantive charge, but not as a basic factor on which much of the subsequent unhappiness between the parties was founded. Secondly, if, as I doubt, it can truly be said that the shortage of house-keeping money was "the main count", it was so because it is said that "on many occasions" the pursuer, with growing children, requested more money than she had had when she was first married, and the husband "always refused to give it to her and in doing so told her that he hated the sight of her." This, and the further statement that the husband had been "frequently rude and threatening to the wife in the presence of the children and had greatly humiliated her", appears in the Lord President's judgment (1951 S.C. 295) as "a few allegations of harsh language, some of the incidents being associated with the pursuer's demands for money, and one threat of violence alleged to have been made 'in the winter of 1949'—to throw the pursuer downstairs."

This, which the Lord President describes as an "isolated incident" but which appears to be part of the allegation of humiliation by frequent rudeness and threats in the presence of the children, he finds it impossible to construe as indicative of ferocity or serious malignity of purpose. This statement renders all the more serious the omission in his judgment of any trace of the averment that the husband intended to impose his will on the wife, and, although the Lord President refers to the husband's conduct being said to have caused the pursuer "great grief" and to have been "a considerable strain on her nerves", so that in 1944 she consulted a doctor who is still treating her, he does not refer to the averment that the husband had persisted in what is alleged to be his callous conduct although he was aware not merely that it was causing her grief and putting a considerable strain on her nerves, but that it had caused a serious breakdown in her health. On this version of the facts your Lordships' House would, in my opinion, be justified in holding that a reversal of the trial judge on the ground that it was "a case of lack of accommodation, failure of due consideration, selfish neglect and rudeness of language" and nothing more, would conflict with the principles laid down in Watt (or Thomas) v. Thomas (5) because a court which had not had the advantage of seeing and hearing the witnesses had substituted its own findings of the facts for those of the trial judge.

I fully agree with your Lordships that the averment of an intention on the part of the husband to impose his will on the pursuer, and the averment of persistence in his callous conduct, although aware of its effect on his wife's health, both of which are plainly made, are important averments in this case.

In saying this, however, I must not be taken to suggest that either in England or in Scotland it is essential to impute to the wrongdoer a wilful intention to injure the aggrieved spouse in order to establish a charge of cruelty. In Mackenzie v. Mackenzie (4) LORD WATSON said ([1895] A.C. 409):

"I do not impute to the appellant that his conduct, cruel and reprehensible though it was in my estimation, was dictated by a wilful intention to injure the respondent."

Likewise in Kelly v. Kelly (9), to which I shall recur later, because it is the leading case in England on the subject of cruelty without physical violence, LORD PENZANCE in his judgment in the full court said (L.R. 2 P. & D. 72):

"He says that he does not desire to injure her, and it has never been asserted that he does."

So, also, in Squire v. Squire (10) TUCKER, L.J., said ([1948] 2 All E.R. 54) that in his view the law on this point could not be more clearly expressed than in the brief statement quoted (ibid., 53), from the judgment of SHEARMAN, J., in Hadden v. Hadden (11):

"I do not question he had no intention of being cruel but his intentional acts amounted to cruelty."

During the argument, however, the question arose whether the averments of the husband's intention to impose his will on the wife and of persistence in his callous conduct although aware of its effect on her health could legitimately be supported at the proof merely by invoking the presumption that a person intends the natural and probable consequences of his acts. I deprecate the exclusion in advance of any particular method of proving an averment. I make this reservation because I am unable to agree with the Lord President's view that this presumption leads to the conclusion that if injury to health occurs "any" conduct, however meritorious, which brings about that result would be cruelty. I have expressed my own views on this matter recently in Simpson v. Simpson (12) and I do not propose to repeat them, but I may, perhaps, be allowed to quote one sentence ([1951] 1 All E.R. 962):

"Without going through the careful examination of the doctrine in Squire v. Squire (10) with which I respectfully agree, I venture to suggest that in this jurisdiction, at any rate, we may continue to use the time-honoured maxim, provided always that we remember that it does not express an irrebuttable presumption of law and that it is only to be applied in connection with conduct which can fairly be described as ill-treatment."

I coupled with these views an observation of LORD GREENE, M.R., in Buchler v. Buchler (13) ([1947] 1 All E.R. 325). In relation to the kindred topic of desertion by expulsion of a wife from the matrimonial home, he said that conduct which did not amount to a justification for withdrawing from cohabitation could not be made so by a wife announcing her intention of leaving her husband if he did not change his conduct. He added (ibid.):

"This is not, in my opinion, affected by the doctrine that a person must be taken to intend the probable consequences of his acts, for, if the acts are not such as to justify the wife in treating herself as expelled from the matrimonial home, no inference can be drawn from those acts of an intention to expel her."

I do not regard the instances of the patriotic volunteer or of the gallant ship's captain given by the Lord President (1951 S.C. 292, 293) as legitimate illustrations of the doctrine. However, I would not necessarily exclude LORD CARMONT's illustration of the cat (ibid., 298); for if a spouse insisted on introducing one into the home in spite of the knowledge that the other spouse was one of those persons who are made positively ill by the presence of a cat, that familiar pet could not then properly be described as "harmless".

I must now turn to the suggestion of the Lord President that by reason of what he terms "the marked contrast" in the wording of the English and Scottish Acts of 1937 and 1938 there has been a change in the legal conception of cruelty in England. The Lord President expressly concurred with observations to the same effect in the Inner House in Dunlop v. Dunlop (7) which appear to have been prompted by the decision of the Court of Appeal in Meacher v. Meacher (14). It would be idle to deny that this case has raised, in England as well as in Scotland, the doubts to which allusion is made in the judgments under appeal. For instance, in his dissenting opinion in Watt (or Thomas) v. Thomas (5) VISCOUNT SIMON, in support of the view that in the Scottish Act the words "has been guilty of cruelty" make it difficult to introduce as a necessary condition of divorce that further cruelty must be apprehended, though this was necessary if the remedy of separation was being sought, said ([1947] 1 All E.R. 585):

"In England, at any rate, it has been held by the Court of Appeal that under the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937 (where, however, the words differ from those used in the Scottish Act) a decree of dissolution on the ground of cruelty is based on past behaviour, and that there is no condition that the decree should be withheld 'unless there is also a reasonable fear that further acts of cruelty will be committed' (Meacher v. Meacher (14))."

LORD THANKERTON (ibid., 586) and LORD MACMILLAN (ibid., 590) expressly reserved their opinions. I am so fully in agreement with what my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, has said on this matter that I should not have found it necessary to add anything were it not that it may be thought advisable to consider whether the divergence supposed to be represented by these two cases is not, in truth, more apparent than real. I need not pursue what my noble friend has said about the reason for the wording of the Scottish Act. I shall try to show that in this country we do not recognise two degrees of cruelty, although, as the Court of Appeal in Russell v. Russell (2) itself decided, conduct which is expressly held not to be cruelty may, nevertheless, be an answer to a suit for restitution of conjugal rights. Suffice it to say that when Parliament, in the Act of 1938, defined the cruelty on which divorce first became permissible in Scotland, it was, in fact, following a precedent set by s. 27 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857, whereby divorce for cruelty was first allowed in England. It is true that the Act of 1857 made it necessary to couple adultery with the charge of cruelty, but it was expressly provided, as in the Scottish Act of 1938, that the cruelty must be such as, without adultery, would have entitled the wife to divorce a mensa et thoro. Elsewhere in the Act of 1857 the word "cruelty" occurs by itself (s. 16), and in s. 31, making cruelty a discretionary bar to divorce, the words are "has been guilty of . . . cruelty". So far as I am aware, however, no distinction has ever been drawn between those phrases in relation to the Act of 1857. But it does not end there. By the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1866, s. 2, if either spouse in a suit instituted for dissolution of marriage opposed the relief sought on the ground, inter alia, of "cruelty", the court might give the respondent the same relief to which he or she would have been entitled if he or she had filed a petition seeking such relief. This section was replaced in substantially the same terms by s. 180 of the Supreme Court of Judicature (Consolidation) Act, 1925. Likewise, in the proviso to s. 176 of that Act, preserving the right of a wife to present a petition on any ground on which she might have done so before the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1923, enabled her to obtain a divorce on the ground of adultery alone, it is provided that on any petition presented by a wife for divorce on the ground of the "adultery and cruelty" of her husband the parties shall be competent and compellable witnesses with regard to "the cruelty". Again, when by the Summary Jurisdiction (Married Women) Act, 1895, magistrates were enabled to make an order in favour of a wife on the ground of "persistent cruelty" SIR SAMUEL EVANS, P., in Cornall v. Cornall

(15), said (74 J.P. 380) that cruelty in s. 4 of that Act meant the same thing as cruelty had always meant in the Divorce Court, but with the addition of the element of persistence. This, as has been repeated by the Divisional Court of the Probate Division more than once in recent weeks, precludes the making of an order on a single act, however, grave, but has no other effect on the meaning of "cruelty". Finally, by s. 5 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, itself, the decree of judicial separation is dealt with by the substitution of two new sub-sections for the corresponding sub-sections of s. 185 of the Judicature Act. The first of these enables a petition to be presented for judicial separation on any grounds on which a petition for divorce might have been presented . . . or on any grounds on which a decree for divorce a mensa et thoro might have been pronounced immediately before the commencement of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1857. In relation to cruelty that would mean, if s. 176 (c) of the Judicature Act, as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2, has really altered the law as regards divorce, that two different standards of cruelty as regards judicial separation are set up in the same sentence of the same sub-section, one based wholly on past behaviour and the other on the need for protection for the future.

I must confess that until I read the argument in Meacher v. Meacher (14) which went the length of submitting that even if it were correct (the italics are mine) that the practice of the ecclesiastical courts and subsequently of the Divorce Court in granting judicial separation on the ground of cruelty was based wholly on the necessity for future protection, that was not the case under s. 2 of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, which makes no reference to the likelihood of the cruelty continuing or to further cruelty at all, I had never seen or heard the suggestion that the words "has treated the petitioner with cruelty" in that Act had made any difference to the legal conception of cruelty. Nor do I understand why it should be so, merely because cruelty is now by itself a ground for divorce, whereas formerly it had to be coupled with adultery. What that conception is was settled by Russell v. Russell (2), a case which, as appears from the judgments under appeal as well as from other Scottish decisions to which we have been referred, is evidently regarded as a leading case in Scotland as well as in England. But it is important to bear in mind that in determining, to use LORD HERSCHELL'S words in Russell v. Russell (2) ([1897] A.C. 445),

" . . . what elements were treated as essential to the constitution of the saevitia, or cruelty, which entitled to a divorce ",

LORD HERSCHELL was careful to point out (ibid., 449) that judges had not infrequently, when speaking of acts as "cruel", used that word in its popular sense, and not as indicating that the acts were cruel in the legal acceptance of the term, that is to say, such as would entitle to a divorce, and he quoted pronouncements both of LORD STOWELL [in Popkin v. Popkin (16) and D'Aguilar v. D'Aguilar (17)] and of SIR JOHN NICHOLL [in Bray v. Bray (18).] in that sense to illustrate the risk of confusion arising from the use of the words "cruelty" and "cruel" in the popular sense. Therefore, when the legal conception of cruelty is described as being conduct of such a character as to cause danger to life, limb or health, bodily or mental, or to give rise to a reasonable apprehension of such danger, it is vital to bear in mind that it comprises two distinct elements—first, the ill-treatment complained of, and, secondly, the resultant danger or the apprehension thereof. Thus, it is inaccurate, and liable to lead to confusion, if the word "cruelty" is used as descriptive only of the conduct complained of, apart from its effect on the victim.

There seem to me to be some traces of this confusion in Meacher v. Meacher (14). For example, such phrases as ([1946] 2 All E.R. 308) "unless . . . such assaults are likely to continue", "unless there is a reasonable fear that further acts of cruelty will be committed" are used to illustrate the rejection of the proposition that the court intervenes "only to protect the parties from what they expect to happen", as if all these phrases necessarily expressed the same idea. But where, as in that case, a wife has withdrawn from cohabitation because a series of violent assaults has caused danger to limb and health, bodily and mental (for she had not only suffered bodily injuries but had had a nervous breakdown) the expectation of a renewal at least of the apprehension of danger to bodily or mental health, if she were called on to resume cohabitation, is not necessarily the same thing as the likelihood of the continuance of the actual assaults or even as the fear that further "acts of cruelty" will be committed. I say "if she were called on to resume cohabitation" because that test is common to both countries: see for example LORD PENZANCE in Kelly v. Kelly (9) (L.R. 2 P. & D. 32), and M'Donald v. M'Donald (8). In my opinion, it is indisputable that the twofold test was laid down in Russell v. Russell (2) because the majority, both in the Court of Appeal and in your Lordships' House, were satisfied that protection of the aggrieved spouse lay at the root of the matter. But protection from what? Not necessarily from a repetition of the whole course of ill-treatment, or even the same kind or degree of ill-treatment. To use a homely metaphor, the camel needs protection from the last straw which is to break its back, or even from the penultimate straw which threatens to do so, and not only from being laden afresh with another whole bale of straw. That is why it may be confusing to speak of repeating "the cruelty". This is well illustrated by a recent case of Cooper v. Cooper (19), decided in your Lordships' House on Mar. 29, 1950. VISCOUNT JOWITT, L.C., in an opinion with which the other noble Lords concurred, said ([1950] W.N. 201):

"The more serious the original offence, the less grave need be the subsequent matters to constitute cruelty, for the subsequent acts must be looked at in the light of the earlier history from which they derive their significance . . ."

He added that, if authority were needed for such an obvious proposition, it was to be found in Wilson v. Wilson (20). Both of these were cases in which, after the wife had left the matrimonial home because of earlier ill-treatment, cohabitation had been resumed. I would add that there have been many other decisions in the intervening century to the same effect, not only in cases where cohabitation has been resumed, but also where it has been continued until what may be called the imposition of the "last straw".

If I may say so respectfully, the Court of Appeal in Meacher v. Meacher (14) was bound to set aside a decision refusing a decree on the grounds, first, that the parties having separated, there was no likelihood of further cruelty, and, secondly, that the court would not intervene on behalf of a wife who could have put a stop to the cruelty by complying with the husband's unreasonable prohibition of visits to her sister. These reasons were manifestly unsound and conflicted in both respects with Kelly v. Kelly (9) and Mackenzie v. Mackenzie (4). Moreover, there being ample evidence of conduct causing danger to limb or health and of the need for protection if cohabitation were to be resumed, the court was fully justified in drawing its own conclusion that cruelty was proved. But if it was also intended to decide that by reason of the wording of s. 176 (c) of the Judicature Act, as substituted by the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, s. 2, it is no longer necessary, in a case where a spouse has withdrawn from cohabitation because of ill-treatment, to consider whether, if he or she were obliged to resume cohabitation, there would not at the least be a reasonable apprehension of danger to life, limb or health, bodily or mental, I feel bound to express my opinion that this is not the law of England. As regards Dunlop v. Dunlop (7) on the other hand, I would only say that it is possible to share the scepticism expressed by LORD JAMIESON (1950 S.C. 243) about the certainty, or the permanence, of the drunkard's somewhat rapid reformation without doubting that an English court, if it were fully satisfied that an aggrieved spouse could resume cohabitation without danger to life, limb or health, bodily or mental, or even a reasonable apprehension of such danger, would be bound in principle to arrive at the same conclusion.

Having already referred in passing to Squire v. Squire (10), it only remains to say a word about Lauder v. Lauder (21), the other decision of the Court of Appeal which, as we were given to understand, was thought by the majority below to represent an extension of the legal conception of cruelty. Here, again, let me
 A say that I am not suggesting for a moment that this or any other English case is binding in Scotland, but, whether the decision itself was right or wrong, at least it can be said that there was no intention to make a departure from established principle. The case was determined in light of the decisions in Kelly v. Kelly (9), Mytton v. Mytton (22), Bethune v. Bethune (23) and Moss v. Moss (24). Meacher v. Meacher (14) was not even mentioned in the argument. Also, it was expressly
 B insisted that the case was one in which it was pre-eminently necessary to bear in mind the principles laid down in Russell v. Russell (2), but it was said ([1949] 1 All E.R. 79) that in applying those principles it was impossible to doubt that if there had been evidence that the wife's conduct had caused any injury to mental health, or a reasonable apprehension of such injury, the decision in the Court of Appeal and in the House of Lords must have been the other way. This
 C distinction had already been drawn by LORD LOW in Aitchison v. Aitchison (1) (10 S.L.T. 332) and by SIR FRANCIS JEUNE, P., in Jeapes v. Jeapes (25). Moreover, in Duffy v. Duffy (26), LORD JAMIESON referred without disapproval to LORD LOW's judgment in Aitchison v. Aitchison (1).

To conclude, I also agree emphatically that the Act of 1938 does not in any way restrain the development of the law of cruelty as the foundation of actions
 D of separation or of divorce. To refer once more to Kelly v. Kelly (9), the same thing was said (L.R. 2 P. & D. 61) in relation to English law in the judgment of CHANNELL, B., and HANNEN, J., in a passage which was quoted and followed by LORD LOW (10 S.L.T. 332) in Aitchison v. Aitchison (1). Like my noble friend LORD NORMAND, I agree with the dissenting judgment of LORD KEITH and would allow the appeal.

E LORD REID: My Lords, the appellant in this case is the pursuer in an action for divorce on the ground of cruelty. The respondent pleaded that, the pursuer's averments being irrelevant, the action should be dismissed. This plea was sustained by the lord ordinary by interlocutor of July 19, 1950. The appellant reclaimed against that interlocutor on Jan. 9, 1951, but the First
 F Division by a majority (the Lord President and LORD CARMONT, LORD KEITH dissenting) adhered to the interlocutor of the lord ordinary. This is an appeal against that interlocutor.

The appellant's averments are extensive and I shall attempt to summarise them. The parties were married on Mar. 20, 1936, and they lived together until the appellant left the respondent in February, 1950, about four months after she had raised this action. There were three children of the marriage, born
 G between 1939 and 1945, of whom two survive. The appellant's specific averments are prefaced by this general averment: "Initially the marriage was quite happy, but gradually it became apparent that the defender intended to impose his will upon the pursuer." There are averments regarding the sexual relations of the parties, but these were not relied on by counsel for the appellant except as part
 H of the history of the marriage and throwing light on the relationship of the parties. It is then averred that the appellant's housekeeping allowance was completely inadequate and that on frequent occasions she had to ask the respondent for extra money to meet necessary expenses.

"On such occasions the defender has always refused to give it to her, and in so doing has frequently told the pursuer that he hated the sight of her and shut the door of his bedroom in her face so that the subject could be pursued no further."

It is then averred that

"The defender has also been frequently rude and threatening to his wife in the presence of the children and greatly humiliated her. On one recent occasion in the winter of 1949 the defender in the presence of the children threatened to throw the pursuer down the stairs of their house."

It is not suggested that this latter averment is intended to shew that the pursuer was in any danger from physical violence. Counsel for the appellant presented it rather as an example of the rude, threatening, and humiliating conduct of the respondent averred in the preceding sentence. It is a feature of this case that there is no allegation either of physical violence or of any serious apprehension of violence. Then there are averments that the respondent has failed to entertain the appellant in any way, or to discuss business or financial affairs with her, or to share his life with her in any way, and that he ignored the appellant in the house. The appellant then avers that the respondent's conduct has undermined her mental and physical health which rapidly deteriorated during the last twelve months of their married life and that she was on the verge of a complete breakdown. It is averred that in 1947 she attempted to commit suicide, and that a continuance of life with her husband

"would be seriously injurious to her life, health and peace of mind, and she is afraid to continue to live with him. The pursuer believes and avers that the defender is fully aware of the cruelty he has inflicted on the pursuer, but at no time has he attempted to be considerate towards his wife or make her life with him happy or even bearable."

I read these averments as alleging a deliberate course of conduct intended to wound and humiliate the appellant and persisted in by the respondent although it was obvious that this was seriously affecting the appellant's mental and physical health. It is true that the appellant's case does not appear to have been presented in this light to the First Division. The argument there presented appears to have been that any conduct by one spouse which injures the health of the other is cruelty whatever may have been the intention of the defender. I am not surprised that the First Division rejected this argument. But there can hardly be a more grave matrimonial offence than to set out on a course of conduct with the deliberate intention of wounding and humiliating the other spouse and making his or her life a burden and then to continue in that course of conduct in the knowledge that it is seriously affecting his or her mental and physical health. Such conduct may consist of a number of acts each of which is serious in itself, but it may well be even more effective if it consists of a long continued series of minor acts no one of which could be regarded as serious if taken in isolation. Once it is established that physical violence is not a necessary ingredient of cruelty—and I think that that has long been recognised by the law of Scotland—then I can see no justification in principle for requiring that the deliberate acts of the defender must be of a certain character, and I know of no authority which requires me to make any such distinction.

If a case is to be remitted for proof it is very undesirable to say anything which may embarrass the future conduct of the case. I do not think that it is necessary for the decision of this appeal to make a detailed examination of the authorities either in Scotland or in England, and I, therefore, refrain from doing so. But to avoid misunderstanding there are some observations of a general character which I think it necessary to make. What I have said is only intended to apply when a deliberate intention such as I have described was the cause of the defender's conduct. Such an intention need not be proved by direct evidence. It may be inferred from the whole facts and atmosphere disclosed by the proof. I do not doubt that there are many cases where cruelty can be established without it being necessary to be satisfied by evidence that the defender had such an intention, but I do not intend to decide anything about such cases. If the defender did not, in fact, intend to ill-treat the pursuer, I desire to reserve my opinion whether or to what extent it is necessary or proper to impute an intention which did not exist by invoking a legal presumption that everyone must be supposed to intend or foresee the natural and probable consequences of his acts, and I also wish to reserve my opinion on the question whether or in what circumstances it can be enough in such cases to prove that a series of comparatively minor incidents has caused injury to the health of the pursuer if the defender was not guilty of deliberately ill-treating the pursuer.

In view of certain observations of the Lord President I think that I must express my opinion on the question whether there is any difference between the law of Scotland and the law of England as to what the law regards as cruelty. I take the question in two stages. Down to 1937 I can find no difference in principle as to what is cruelty for the purpose of separation a mensa et thoro. English cases were copiously cited by Scottish judges and Scottish text writers of authority, and citation of Scottish cases in England was by no means infrequent. It would be somewhat strange if it were otherwise looking to the similar origin of the law in the two countries. That is not to say that there were not differences from time to time in the way in which established principles were applied, but that is a feature of a developing system of law, and, indeed, human nature being what it is, different judges applying the same principles at the same time in the same country to similar facts may sometimes reach different conclusions. In 1937 cruelty became a ground for divorce in England, and in 1938 it became a ground for divorce in Scotland. The two enactments are in different terms and questions have arisen out of this difference, but I do not recollect that anyone has suggested that either enactment altered the established principles by which it must be determined what is sufficient and what is not sufficient to justify a finding of cruelty, and I see nothing in any enactment to require the Scottish courts to depart from established principles, or, indeed, to authorise them to do so. Equally, I see nothing to prevent the Scottish courts from developing the application of those principles in the same way as development takes place in other branches of the common law.

Finally, I do not think that the decision of your Lordships in this case should be taken as casting any doubt on the value of the Scottish procedure of disposing of suitable cases on relevancy without inquiry into the facts, or on the applicability of that procedure to consistorial cases. If it can be shewn that, even if the pursuer succeeds in proving all that he avers, still his case must fail, it appears to me to be highly advantageous that time and money should not be spent on fruitless inquiry into the facts, and this appears to me to be no less advantageous in consistorial cases. But there is this difference between these cases and others. In many of these cases the whole history of the marriage and the demeanour of the witnesses may be specially important when it comes to assessing the bearing of particular facts, and, therefore, before a pursuer's averments are held to be irrelevant, it must be clear that, even if the proof discloses an atmosphere wholly favourable to the pursuer, the pursuer's case would still fail. But if that is clear, as it may be even where cruelty is alleged, then I think that it is proper to dispose of the case on relevancy. I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, judges have always carefully refrained from attempting a comprehensive definition of cruelty for the purposes of matrimonial suits and experience has shown the wisdom of this course. It is, in my view, equally undesirable—if not impossible—by judicial pronouncement to create certain categories of acts or conduct as having or lacking the nature or quality which render them capable or incapable in all circumstances of amounting to cruelty in cases where no physical violence is averred. Every such act must be judged in relation to its surrounding circumstances, and the physical or mental condition or susceptibilities of the innocent spouse, the intention of the offending spouse, and the offender's knowledge of the actual or probable effect of his conduct on the other's health (to borrow from the language of LORD KEITH) are all matters which may be decisive in determining on which side of the line a particular act or course of conduct lies. For this reason I agree with LORD KEITH that it is, generally speaking, not possible to compartment acts for the purposes of relevance as being gross so as to constitute cruelty or less gross so as not to constitute cruelty, though there may be extreme cases where the acts in themselves are so trivial as to justify dismissal of an action for lack of relevance without proof. It is with regard to the sufficiency of the facts and matters relied on as amounting in the aggregate to cruelty that I think consistorial causes are so different from many other types of action, though I agree with counsel for the respondent that it would be wrong to say that no such suit could ever fail for lack of relevance. In the present instance I think that the averments of knowledge, intention, and persistence remove this case from the area of doubt in which it might otherwise have lain in the absence of such averments.

I agree for the reasons which have been stated by my noble and learned friend, LORD MERRIMAN, that there has been no change in the law of England with regard to cruelty consequent on the passing of the Matrimonial Causes Act, 1937, and, this being so, I can find no difference between the law of Scotland and England in this respect. I also agree with his observations on Meacher v. Meacher (14). For these reasons I agree that this appeal should be allowed.

Appeal allowed.

Income Tax—Profits—Book debt—Profit on collection—Book debt included among assets acquired from predecessor—Purchase of debt at discount—Election to be treated as having set up new trade—Ultimate payment of debt in full—Income Tax Act, 1918 (c. 40), sched. D, Case I.

One of the assets of a partnership firm of cotton brokers as originally constituted was a debt owing by a customer which had been incurred in the course of their trade as cotton brokers. In 1938 a change took place in the constitution of the firm, and the firm which was then formed carried on the business, purchased the assets, and took over the liabilities of the previously existing firm, but elected, under the proviso to r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D (as substituted by the Finance Act, 1926, s. 32 (1)) to be treated for tax purposes as having set up a new trade. The assets taken over by the new firm included the book debt which was acquired at a written-down figure, but which later was collected in full, a profit of £50,000 being thereby made by the new firm. It was found as a fact that the new firm did not trade in book debts.

Held: although the debt was a trading debt in the hands of the old firm, its acquisition by the new firm and its subsequent collection was not a transaction within the scope of the cotton broking business carried on by that firm, but produced an accretion of value analogous to the profit made by the sale of a fixed asset, and, therefore, the profit which accrued was not assessable to tax under Case I of sched. D.

(1) Hall (Harry), Ltd. v. Barron, (1949), 30 Tax Cas. 451; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEALS by the Crown from orders of the Court of Appeal (SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., SINGLETON and JENKINS, L.J.J.), dated July 14, 1950, and reported [1950] 2 All E.R. 502, allowing appeals by the taxpayers from orders of ROXBURGH, J., made on Apr. 3, 1950, whereby he dismissed appeals by the taxpayers on Cases stated by the Special Commissioners confirming assessments to income tax and profits tax in respect of annual profits or gains from the trade of cotton brokers carried on by the taxpayers. The question at issue in respect of both the assessments was the same and the appeals throughout were heard together.

C

In 1930 a partnership firm of cotton brokers, called Reynolds & Gibson, were the creditors of Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd. for £200,000 for cotton supplied to them. This partnership firm, firm No. 1, had doubts about the recoverability of the debt, and made reserves against it, amounting to £50,000 in all. These reserves were duly allowed as deductions for income tax purposes in the appropriate years. On a change of partners, firm No. 2 took over the debt which was subsequently reduced to £174,600, but the reserve against that amount remained at £50,000. On Oct. 1, 1938, a further change of partners occurred, and firm No. 3 came into existence and took over the assets and liabilities of firm No. 2 on its succession to that firm and paid for the book debt in question a sum less by £50,000 than its face value. All the partners of firms No. 2 and No. 3 elected, under the proviso to r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D, that the firm should be treated, for income tax purposes, as though a new trade had been set up. In the years ended Sept. 30, 1939, 1940, 1941, 1942, 1943, and 1944, firm No. 3 received from the debtor company in reduction of the debt sums totalling £84,114 13s. 10d., and in the years ended Sept. 30, 1942, 1943, 1944 and 1945, firm No. 3 re-credited to profit and loss account reserve sums totalling £40,000. There was a further change in the constitution of the firm, but firms No. 3 and No. 4 fell to be treated for income tax purposes as one and the same firm since on the occasion of that succession recourse was not had to the proviso to r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D. The position at the date of firm No. 4's succession was that the debt stood at £90,485 6s. 2d., with a reserve against it of £10,000, and, in taking over the assets and liabilities of firm No. 3, firm No. 4 paid for this particular asset £10,000 less than its face value. At a subsequent date firm No. 4 received payment of the debt in full. The debt of £174,600 having thus been discharged completely, its acquisition by firm No. 3 from firm No. 2 at the price of £124,600 resulted in a profit of £50,000 of which £40,000 was received by firm No. 3 and £10,000 by firm No. 4. The Special Commissioners found (in para. 7 of the Case) that neither firm No. 3 nor firm No. 4 traded in book debts. They found also (in para. 11 of the Case) that in the hands of firm No. 1 and firm No. 2 the debt in question was not a capital asset but an ordinary trading debt, and that the debt did not change its quality from revenue to capital when it was taken over by firms Nos. 3 and 4. They, therefore, confirmed the assessment on firm No. 4. On appeal by the taxpayers, firm No. 4, ROXBURGH, J., held that the debt in question did change in quality from revenue to capital on its acquisition by firm No. 3, but that it represented circulating capital, so that the profit on its collection properly fell for inclusion in the profits of firm No. 4, and he, therefore, confirmed the determination of the Special Commissioners. The Court of Appeal held that the profit accrued, not in the course of carrying on a trade, but from the purchase of a capital asset which subsequently appreciated in value, and was, therefore, not assessable to income tax under Case I of sched. D.

D

G

Mar. 26. The following opinions were delivered.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, this is an appeal from orders of the Court of Appeal allowing appeals by the respondent from orders of ROXBURGH, J., whereby two appeals by the respondent on Cases separately stated by the Commissioners for the Special Purposes of the Income Tax Acts were dismissed.

The respondent is a partnership trading under the firm name of Reynolds & Gibson and the appeal relates to two separate assessments made on the partnership (a) for the year ended Apr. 5, 1949, in respect of income tax under the provisions of Case I, sched. D, to the Income Tax Act, 1918, and (b) for the chargeable accounting period ended Dec. 31, 1946, in respect of profits tax, under the provisions of the Finance Act, 1937, as amended by the Finance Acts, 1942 and 1946. The appeals in respect of both of these assessments were heard before the Special Commissioners on the same date, and have since been heard together in the High Court and the Court of Appeal. At the hearing before the Special Commissioners it was agreed by the parties that the question at issue was the same in both appeals, and it is stated by the Special Commissioners in the Case stated by them in relation to the profits tax appeal, that the questions at issue, the facts, and the contentions of the parties are identical with those in the income tax appeal. The sole question raised in each of the appeals is whether a sum of £50,000 falls to be included in each of the assessments. For the complete statement of the facts I refer to the Case Stated and to the judgment of JENKINS, L.J., who has narrated them and elucidated them by valuable explanations and comments. I, therefore, content myself with a short summary.

Four successive firms have for a long time carried on business as cotton brokers in Liverpool, all of them under the name Reynolds & Gibson. The respondent is the fourth of these firms. On the formation of each new firm the assets and liabilities of its predecessor were valued for the purpose of fixing the amount of the consideration to be paid by the new firm to the old and were taken over at the figure so fixed. On the formation of firm No. 3 on Oct. 1, 1938, the proviso to s. 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1926, the terms of which I shall recite later, was invoked by the partners of firms Nos. 2 and 3. The proviso was not invoked on the formation of No. 2 firm nor on the formation of No. 4 firm. As a consequence No. 3 firm fell to be treated for income tax purposes as if a new trade had been set up by it, but No. 1 firm and No. 2 firm fell to be treated for the purpose of income tax as one firm carrying on the same trade, and so also No. 3 firm and No. 4 firm fell to be treated as one firm carrying on the same trade. About the year 1920, No. 1 firm, in the course of its business, supplied cotton to Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd., and in 1930 a debt of £200,000 for cotton so supplied was owing to No. 1 firm. When firm No. 3 was formed this debt had been reduced to £174,600 against which a reserve of £50,000 had been created. The debt was thus valued at £124,600 at that time and that was the consideration paid by No. 3 firm for the right to collect the debt and retain the sums collected. Between Oct. 1, 1938, and Dec. 24, 1946, the whole sum of £174,600 was repaid and the whole debt extinguished partly by repayments to No. 3 firm and partly by a final payment to No. 4 firm. There is an important finding (in para. 7) by the Special Commissioners that "neither firm No. 3 nor firm No. 4 traded in book debts." After stating the facts the Special Commissioners in the Stated Case set out the contentions of the parties and proceed (in para. 11) to give their decision, which it will be well to quote:

A “ We, the commissioners, gave our decision as follows: ‘ In September, 1938, firm No. 3 took over from firm No. 2, for £124,600, the debt of £174,600 due from Combined Egyptian Mills. Eventually the full sum of £174,600 was realised, £84,114 13s. 10d. being received by firm No. 3 and £90,485 6s. 2d. by firm No. 4. For income tax purposes firm No. 3 fell to be treated as having set up a new trade, and we accept that it did not trade in book debts. Nevertheless, in the hands of firms Nos. 1 and 2 the debt in question was in no sense a capital asset, but simply an ordinary trading debt, and, on the facts of this case, we are unable to see that when it was taken over by firms Nos. 3 and 4, successively, its “ quality ” was changed from revenue to capital, as contended on behalf of the appellant firm. In our opinion, it remained a debt on revenue account, collectible in the ordinary course of trade and its collection was incidental to the trade. If the full £174,600 had been received by firm No. 3, we should have felt no doubt that its profit of £50,000 over the amount which it had paid for the debt would have been a profit on revenue account. But the final £90,485 6s. 2d. was received by firm No. 4 (the present appellant firm) and the Crown admits that, if all the members of firms Nos. 3 and 4 had given the requisite notice under the proviso to s. 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1926, firm No. 4 would fall to be treated as having set up a new trade, with the result that its profit on realisation would have been only £10,000 (being the excess of the amount received over the amount at which it took over the debt from firm No. 3). It is admitted, however, that no such notice was given, and we accept the contention of the Crown that, in these circumstances, for income tax purposes this change of partnership must be ignored, with the result that the above profit of £50,000 must be brought into the income tax assessment of firm No. 4.’ ”

E At this stage it is convenient to turn to the statutory provisions dealing with successions to trades and businesses. By s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1926, an amendment was made to the income tax provisions dealing with successions to trades and businesses in relation to the computation of profits. Previously the general position was that, under r. 11 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918 (subject to exceptions not material), on a succession taking place in the ownership of a business, the business was treated for the purpose of the computation of profits as a continuing business and as though there had been no change in ownership. Section 32 of the Finance Act, 1926, repealed the old r. 11 and replaced it by a new r. 11 of which para. (1) dealt with changes in ownership due to changes in partnerships or the creation of a partnership. By para. (2) all successions other than those dealt with in para. (1) are directed to have effect for the purpose of computing profits as though on the change in ownership a business had ceased and a new business had been set up. Paragraph (1) of the new r. 11 so enacted in s. 32 of the Finance Act, 1926, and the proviso thereto are as follows:—

H “ If at any time after Apr. 5, 1928, a change occurs in a partnership of persons engaged in any trade, profession or vocation, by reason of retirement or death, or the dissolution of the partnership as to one or more of the partners, or the admission of a new partner, in such circumstances that one or more of the persons who until that time were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation continue to be engaged therein, or a person who until that time was engaged in any trade, profession or vocation on his own account continues to be engaged in it, but as a partner in a partnership, the tax payable by the person or persons who carry on the trade, profession or vocation after that time shall, notwithstanding the change, be computed according to the profits or gains of the trade, profession or vocation during the period prescribed by the Income Tax Acts: Provided that, where all the persons who were engaged in the trade, profession or vocation both immediately before and immediately after the change require, by notice signed by all of them or, in the case of a deceased person, by his legal representatives, and sent to the surveyor within twelve months after the change took place, that the tax payable for all years of assessment shall be computed as if the trade, profession or vocation had been discontinued at the date of the change, and a new trade, profession or vocation had been then set up or commenced, and that the tax so computed for any year shall be charged on and paid by such of them as would have been charged if such discontinuance and setting up or commencement had actually taken place, the tax shall be computed, charged, collected and paid accordingly."

"Twelve" was substituted for "three" in the above proviso by s. 16 of the Finance Act, 1930.

In the High Court, ROXBURGH, J., in his judgment dismissing the appeal, expressed some doubt about what the Special Commissioners' findings of fact included, but he came to the conclusion that para. 7 of the findings together with the findings in para. 11 amounted to a finding of fact that, although firms Nos. 3 and 4 did not trade in book debts generally, it was a part of their trade to acquire and collect this particular book debt of £174,600. He did not, however, share the view of the Special Commissioners that when the debt had been acquired by firm No. 3 it remained a debt on revenue account. He held that it was a capital asset, purchased out of capital, but that it was circulating capital. He also said that to hold that it was a fixed capital asset would be inconsistent with Harry Hall, Ltd. v. Barron (1). In the Court of Appeal SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R., said that he was impressed with the argument for the Crown that it was a question of fact whether the debt was a capital or a revenue item in the hands of firm No. 3 and firm No. 4, and that there was much to be said for the view that the Special Commissioners had intended to find that the debt was treated as a revenue item and retained its original revenue character. But he deferred to the views of the other members of the court and did not dissent. SINGLETON, L.J., and JENKINS, L.J., both agreed that there was no finding of fact concluding the case in favour of the Crown, that the debt in the hands of firms Nos. 3 and 4 was not part of their circulating capital, and that it was not acquired for or employed in the trade carried on by them. JENKINS, L.J., was further of opinion that the Special Commissioners had failed to address themselves adequately to the question whether a debt that had been a trading debt owed to firm No. 1 or firm No. 2 became a trading debt owing to firm No. 3 notwithstanding that firm No. 3 by virtue of the invocation of the proviso above cited was to be considered as having set up a new trade as opposed to merely continuing the trade of its predecessor. He said that the true question was whether the acquisition of the debt was an operation in the course of firm No. 3's trade, and he held that it was not.

My Lords, I agree that, unless the acquisition of the debt was in course of the business carried on by firm No. 3, the profit which arose on the full discharge of the debt cannot be regarded as a profit of the business carried on by firms No. 3 and No. 4. The Crown's argument was that the Special Commissioners had by a finding of fact, not open to review, concluded that the acquisition of the debt was a transaction within the scope of the business carried on by firm No. 3. We have, therefore, to consider para. 7 of the Case and along with it para. 11 or the relevant part of it. Paragraph 7 is unqualified in its terms:

"Neither firm No. 3 nor firm No. 4 traded in book debts."

I think that that means that trading in book debts was never part of the business of either firm. If the Special Commissioners meant to say only that the two firms were not financial firms though they did on this occasion trade in this particular debt, I can see no reason why they should not have said so in plain language in this paragraph. Instead, they use language which, on the face of it, seems to exclude any trading in book debts from the business of the firms.

From para. 7 I go on to para. 11, and I can discover no finding in it that firms No. 3 or No. 4 entered into an isolated transaction of the nature of trade in acquiring the debt. What the Special Commissioners say is that in the hands of firms Nos. 1 and 2 the debt in question was in no sense a capital asset, but simply an ordinary trading debt, and that, on the facts, they were unable to see that when it was taken over by firms Nos. 3 and 4 successively its "quality" was changed from revenue to capital. This is not a finding that firms Nos. 3 and 4 embarked pro hac vice on a business of trading in book debts. The finding in para. 11 is, in my view, a finding in law that this trade debt, when it was acquired by firms No. 3 and No. 4 did not alter its quality from revenue to capital "on the facts of this case". The Special Commissioners do not specify the facts on which they relied. One salient fact is that all the partners of firms Nos. 2 and 3 had given notice in terms of the proviso to s. 32, with the legal consequence that the trade carried on by firms Nos. 1 and 2 must be taken to have been discontinued and a new trade by firm No. 3 to have been set up when firm No. 3 succeeded to firm No. 2. Another salient fact is that the debt had been incurred in trading operations completed at least eight years before the new trade of firm No. 3 began. Then, not less important is the absence of any finding that the debt was acquired in order to further in any way the trade of cotton broking about to be begun by firm No. 3. The acquisition of the debt was in no way a transaction within the scope of the cotton broking business carried on by firm No. 3, but a transaction precedent to the commencement of that business. The collection of the debt by firms Nos. 3 and 4 was likewise not a transaction in the course of their cotton broking. To say, as the commissioners did, that it was incidental to the trade is merely a consequence of the previous finding in law that the debt retained its "quality" as a trading debt. If a debt is a trading debt of a firm its collection is necessarily an incident of that firm's trade. The finding in law ignores the consequences which result from giving notice in terms of the proviso, and is, therefore, erroneous. The right which No. 3 firm acquired was a right to receive a sum of money from the debtor of its predecessor and the origin of the debt represented by that sum became immaterial as soon as the right to collect it passed to a firm which was about to commence a new trade. So, too, the collection of the sum from the debtor was the exercise of the right which firms Nos. 3 and 4 had acquired by expending a part of their capital on the purchase of a non-trading debt, and it was in no way an exercise of the trade of cotton brokers. If firm No. 3 had ceased to carry on business as cotton brokers it would still have collected the debt precisely as it did collect it, and, as was said by JENKINS, L.J., precisely the same profit could have arisen to any purchaser of the debt whether a cotton broker or not. No exertions of trading were employed in the collection and the profit was not a profit of the business carried on by firms Nos. 3 and 4 as cotton brokers—and, I repeat for the sake of completeness, these firms did not carry on a trade in book debts. The fact that entries were made in the books of these firms recording reductions of the reserve made against the debt and the receipt of sums in payment does not affect the matter. These entries are not inconsistent with the acquisition of the debt as an asset outside the scope of the trade carried on by the firms.

My Lords, no assistance is to be obtained by the Crown from the contention that the debt was not a fixed asset, but part of the circulating capital of firms Nos. 3 and 4. Such a contention merely clouds the simple issue whether the acquisition and collection of the debt were within the scope of the trade carried on by the two firms, so that the surplus collected over the price paid for the right to collect was a fruit or profit of that trade. I agree with JENKINS, L.J., on this point, and, indeed, I most respectfully agree with his whole judgment, which unanswerably develops the reasons for the conclusion that the profit of £50,000 is an accretion of value analogous to the profit made by the sale of a fixed asset and not a profit accruing in the course of any trade at all.

I cannot distinguish Harry Hall, Ltd. v. Barron (1) from the present case. It is true that in that case there were express findings that the appellant company acquired from the old company more than one trading debt arising from business completed by it, whereas here we are told only of one such debt. But there was a finding in Harry Hall, Ltd. (1) that the appellant company's business was not that of a dealer in book debts, just as there is here. The reasoning which excludes from the computation of trading profits for the purposes of taxation one book debt acquired by a new company which does not deal in book debts will equally apply where several or many such debts are so acquired. I, therefore, think that the decision in Harry Hall, Ltd. (1), rests on the same mistake of law as the decision of the Special Commissioners in this case and that it should be disapproved so that it may not hereafter appear as a case which may be distinguished from the present case and become a source of future error. I would dismiss both appeals with costs.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I have had the advantage of reading in print the opinion which has just been delivered by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack. I agree so entirely with his reasoning and his conclusions that I find it unnecessary to add any observation of my own. I agree that both appeals should be dismissed with costs.

LORD REID: My Lords, on Sept. 30, 1938, one partner of the firm of Reynolds & Gibson retired and a new partner was taken into partnership. On the occasion of this change a notice was given in terms of the proviso to the new r. 11 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D which had been substituted for the old rule by s. 32 (1) of the Finance Act, 1932. It is common ground that by reason of this notice the new firm must be treated as if it had commenced a new business on Oct. 1, 1938. There had been previous changes in the firm and there were also subsequent changes, but these are immaterial in this case because the statutory notice was not given in respect of these changes. The Case refers to firms Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4. The change in respect of which the notice was given was the change from firm No. 2 to firm No. 3, and I shall refer to firms Nos. 1 and 2 as the old firm and to firms Nos. 3 and 4 as the new firm.

In 1938 Combined Egyptian Mills, Ltd. owed to the old firm a debt of £174,600. About 1920 the old firm had sold cotton to this company for a sum of £200,000 and of that sum £174,600 was still owing in 1938. This debt had been treated by the old firm as a bad debt to the extent of £50,000, and when the new firm took over the old firm's assets at a valuation this debt was valued at £124,600 and was assigned to the new firm for that price. In 1946 the debt was paid in full to the new firm who thus made a profit of £50,000. The question is whether that profit is assessable to income tax under Case I of sched. D. The Rule Applicable to Case I provides that tax shall be computed on the full amount of the balance of the profits or gains of the respondents' trade. The trade of the new firm, like that of the old, was that of cotton brokers. There is a finding in the Case that the new firm did not trade in book debts, and there is no suggestion that they conducted any other trade than that of cotton brokers. So, if the profit of £50,000 is taxable under Case I, it can only be because it was a profit earned by the new firm in carrying on that trade. Accordingly, the task of the Special Commissioners was to determine whether the scope of the trade of cotton brokers as carried on by the new firm was wide enough to include the acquisition, holding, and collection of this debt. But, unfortunately, the commissioners did not address themselves directly to that question. Harry Hall, Ltd. v. Barron (1) had been decided shortly before this case was heard by the commissioners and they appear to have had that case in mind in reaching their decision. I find it very difficult to discover the precise meaning of the crucial findings in the Case stated by the commissioners, and to determine to what extent they are findings of fact and to what extent findings of law. I do not think that I should here examine these findings again in detail, but, giving them the best consideration I can, I have come to the conclusion that the commissioners misdirected themselves in two respects. In the first place, they appear to have attached decisive importance to the nature of the debt in the hands of the old firm, and, secondly, they appear to have thought it sufficient that the collection of the debt by the new firm was incidental to the trade of the new firm without deciding whether the acquisition and collection of the debt by the new firm were or were not in themselves trading operations or part of the trade of the new firm. The commissioners truly state that the debt was a trading debt in the hands of the old firm. It arose from a sale of cotton by them in the course of their ordinary business, and, if it had been paid to them, the money received would have been the fruit of their trading. But, on being assigned to the new firm or to anyone else, it could not remain a trading debt in that sense: the money could not then be the fruit of any trading in cotton by the assignee. It could only be a trading debt in the hands of the assignee if the acquisition of the debt by him was a trading operation on his part. I think that the commissioners assumed that a trading debt in the hands of one cotton broker would remain a trading debt in the hands of a successor in the business unless something more than the assignment had happened to change its character, and this was a natural assumption on their part in view of the decision in Harry Hall, Ltd. v. Barron (1). But I agree with your Lordships in thinking that this decision must be overruled.

I venture to think that some unnecessary difficulty has been introduced into this case by the respondents' original contention that the debt was part of the fixed assets of the new firm and was never part of its circulating capital. If circulating capital means no more than capital expended in the course of a firm's trade or capital represented by a trading asset, then to inquire whether this debt or the money spent to acquire it was circulating capital or fixed capital is only to inquire in a circuitous way whether the acquisition of this debt by the new firm was a trading operation or not. But, if the term "circulating capital" is used in any other sense, then to inquire whether this debt or the money spent to acquire it was circulating capital or not is likely to be misleading because it may divert attention from the real issue. In the same way I doubt whether it is helpful to put the question whether the debt was a capital or a revenue asset. If by a revenue asset is meant something of which the proceeds on realisation must be treated as a trading receipt (anything else being a capital asset), then one comes back to the same question whether the acquisition and realisation of the asset are or are not trading operations. But if the terms "capital asset" and "revenue asset" are used in any other sense, again the use of these terms may be misleading.

If, as I think, the commissioners never decided the vital question in this case, then one must examine the facts which have been found to see whether there is any evidence on which the commissioners could now decide in favour of the appellants. If there is, the Case must be sent back to them, but, if there is not, there is no reason to send the Case back. If, on the other hand, I am wrong in my interpretation of the commissioners' findings and they did decide the right question in favour of the appellants, then the question is whether there is anything in the Case to support this decision. So, on either view one must examine the facts found in the Case. The commissioners have found that the new firm did not trade in book debts. If one gives to this finding its natural meaning, it is fatal to the appellants' case, because the debt with which this case is concerned was a book debt and the respondents can only be liable to income tax if their dealings with it were trading operations. But, reading this finding with the findings in para. 11 of the Case, I doubt whether the commissioners intended this finding to apply to debts which the new firm took over from the old firm. The new firm took over all the old firm's assets. The Case does not disclose whether those assets included any other trading debts, but it is probable that there were others and for the purpose of this argument I am willing to assume that there were. But this debt was in a special position. It had been outstanding for a long time and special arrangements had been made with regard to it. Even if there were other book debts I do not think that the mere fact that they were taken over and collected would assist the appellants' argument. The real question is whether there is anything in the Case to indicate that the new firm's dealings with this debt could properly be regarded as a trading operation. The Case does not state that the new firm did anything more than take over the old firm's rights, receive payments to account and become parties to bills of exchange for the balances outstanding from time to time, and finally receive payment of the full sum due. This was no more than any other assignee of the old firm's rights would have done. It had nothing to do with buying or selling cotton, and if that is all that the new firm did I do not see how it had any connection with the business of a cotton broker. I do not think that it is at all impossible that a new firm should take over and deal with an old firm's book debts as a trading operation, but in order to establish that I think that something more would have to be proved than the mere fact that they took over the debts and received the sums due, and in this case there is really nothing more than that. I, therefore, agree that these appeals must be dismissed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, I concur.

LORD COHEN: My Lords, I concur.

DUNDEE GENERAL HOSPITALS BOARD OF MANAGEMENT v. WALKER AND ANOTHER.

[HOUSE OF LORDS (Lord Normand, Lord Morton of Henryton, Lord Reid, Lord Tucker and Lord Cohen), February 18, 19, 20, March 26, 1952.]

Executor and Administrator—Discretion—Legacy conditional on being satisfied that hospital not taken over by State—Test of validity of executors' decision.

Will—Legacy—Condition—Executors to be satisfied that hospital not taken over by State—Validity of executors' decision.

By his will, dated Mar. 11, 1946, a testator, who died on Apr. 16, 1947, gave a legacy of £10,000 "to the Dundee Royal Infirmary . . . provided always, however, that the said £10,000 shall be payable as aforesaid only if my trustees shall in their sole and absolute discretion be satisfied that at my death the said infirmary has not been taken over wholly or partly by or otherwise placed under the control of the State or of a local authority or of a body directly or indirectly responsible to the State and/or a local authority". The Dundee Royal Infirmary was a voluntary hospital within the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947. On Mar. 21, 1946, the National Health Service Bill for England received its first reading, and on Nov. 6, 1946, it received the Royal Assent. The Scottish Bill received its first reading on Nov. 26, 1946, and the Royal Assent on May 21, 1947 (five weeks after the testator's death). Section 9 (8) of the Scottish Act provided that where any property was at any time between Mar. 21, 1946, and July 5, 1948, held or used by such persons and for such purposes as would result (but for anything done after Mar. 21, 1946) in the transfer thereof to the Secretary of State or to a board of management, it should be treated for the purposes of the Act as if it had continued to be so held or used until the appointed day. The trustees took the opinion of counsel who advised, having regard particularly to s. 9 (8) which, in his view, in effect applied a government nexus retrospectively from Mar. 21, 1946, to all property of the Dundee Royal Infirmary, that the trustees were entitled to resolve that, as they were satisfied that the proviso qualifying the bequest was applicable, the bequest to the infirmary could not take effect. On Mar. 1, 1948, the trustees decided not to pay the legacy because, in view of s. 9 (8), they were not satisfied that at the testator's death the infirmary had not been placed under the control of the State. The board of management in whom the infirmary was vested did not allege mala fides.

HELD: the only reasonable interpretation of the words used by the testator was that he intended his trustees to be the sole judges of all the matters which they had to consider in carrying out the duty which he had put on them; assuming reasonableness on the part of the trustees to be the test of the validity of their decision, they were entitled to take into consideration the retrospective effect of s. 9 (8), and the conclusion which they had reached with regard to the effect at the date of the testator's death of s. 9 (8) was such as a reasonable man could have reached; and, therefore, having reached that conclusion, they were bound to withhold payment of the legacy.

Quaere, whether the proper test of the validity of the trustees' decision was not their honesty rather than the reasonableness of the course which they had adopted.

Decision of Court of Session (1950 S.C. 406), affirmed.

EDITORIAL NOTE. In England, the National Health Service Act, 1946, s. 9 (7), establishes a nexus during the period from Mar. 21, 1946, to the appointed day in terms similar to those contained in the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947, s. 9 (8).

APPEAL by the Board of Management for the Dundee General Hospitals from an order of the First Division of the Court of Session (the Lord President (LORD COOPER), LORD CARMONT and LORD RUSSELL, LORD KEITH dissentiente) dated May 26, 1950, reported 1950 S.C. 406, reversing the interlocutor of the lord ordinary (LORD GUTHRIE). The First Division rejected the claim of the Board of Management that they were entitled to receive payment of a legacy conditionally bequeathed to the Dundee Royal Infirmary under the will of Thomas Norman Jarvis Bell, deceased.

R. P. Morison, Q.C., and W. Grant, Q.C. (both of the Scottish Bar), for the appellants.

The House took time for consideration.

Mar. 26. The following opinions were read.

LORD NORMAND: My Lords, in this appeal the question to be decided is whether the appellants, who have been sisted as pursuers in place of the original pursuers, the now dissolved corporation of the Dundee Royal Infirmary, are entitled to payment of a legacy conditionally bequeathed to the corporation by the late Mr. Bell. The First Division of the Court of Session, LORD KEITH dissenting, have held, reversing the interlocutor of the lord ordinary pronounced after proof, that the appellants' claim failed, and they have sustained the respondents' plea to relevance and dismissed the action.

The testator appointed three trustees of whom one prædeceased him. The respondents are the surviving and acting trustees. One of them is a chartered accountant in Dundee and a member of the firm which acted as treasurers of the Dundee Royal Infirmary for about forty years down to July 5, 1948, the appointed day under the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947, when the Royal Infirmary was taken over by the present appellants. The other is a nephew of the testator. By the sixth purpose of his will, the testator directed his trustees as soon after his death "as may be convenient to them . . ." to pay the following legacies, viz.:

A

"(c) £10,000 to the Dundee Royal Infirmary, where £1,050 shall be appropriated for endowing a bed in the said infirmary, and the balance shall be available for the general purposes of the infirmary; provided always, however, that the said £10,000 shall be payable as aforesaid only if my trustees shall in their sole and absolute discretion be satisfied that at my death the said infirmary has not been taken over wholly or partly by or otherwise placed under the control of the State or of a local authority or of a body directly or indirectly responsible to the State and/or a local authority."

B

The will is dated Mar. 11, 1946, and the testator died on Apr. 16, 1947.

C

In 1946 the project of nationalising, to use a convenient term, the voluntary hospitals (and the Dundee Royal Infirmary was a "voluntary hospital" both in the popular sense and as defined in the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947), was a topic prominently before the public notice. On Mar. 21, 1946, the National Health Service Bill for England received its first reading, and on Nov. 6, 1946, it received the Royal Assent. It was understood that the general pattern of the legislation would be the same for Scotland as for England, and the publication of the Scottish Bill confirmed this understanding. The Scottish Bill received its first reading on Nov. 26, 1946, and the Royal Assent on May 21, 1947, just five weeks after the testator's death. It is now admitted by the appellants that, though the respondents, as early as Apr. 22, 1947, at their first meeting after the testator's death, came to a tentative view adverse to the payment of the legacy, they did not come to a final decision till a meeting held on Mar. 1, 1948, after the Scottish Act had received the Royal Assent and after taking the opinion of counsel on their duty as trustees.

The trustees' solicitors, on Apr. 24, 1947, intimated their tentative decision and, as they were instructed, put it on the ground that the trustees

F

"are not satisfied that the infirmary can now be considered free from State control."

Counsel, in his opinion of Feb. 26, 1948, referred to the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947, s. 9 (8), which enacts:

"Where any property was, at any time between Mar. 21, 1946, and the appointed day, held or used by such persons and for such purposes as would result, but for anything done after the said date, in the transfer of the property to the Secretary of State or to a board of management under the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act, and that property ceases to be so held or used before the appointed day, it shall nevertheless be treated for the purposes of those provisions as if it had continued to be so held or used until the appointed day, unless it is proved by a person whose interest in that property would be transferred to the Secretary of State or to a board of management under those provisions, that the fact that it was not so held or used immediately before the appointed day was due to something done or occurring in the ordinary course of business, or was in no way connected with the said provisions."

H

Counsel observed that this provision came into operation on Mar. 21, 1948, but in effect applied a government nexus retrospectively from Mar. 21, 1946, onwards on all property belonging to the Royal Infirmary. He concluded by advising the respondents that they were "entitled formally to resolve that as they were satisfied that the proviso [qualifying the bequest] is applicable the bequest to the infirmary could not take effect."

A As has been said, it was after considering this opinion that the respondents came to a final determination to refuse to pay the legacy. They intimated their decision by a letter of their solicitors dated Mar. 1, 1948, and the ground given is that "they are satisfied that the proviso contained in cl. 6 (c) of Mr. Bell's will is applicable". Those words are somewhat cryptic, but I think that they were intended to convey, and did convey, that the respondents were not satisfied that at the testator's death the infirmary had not been placed under the control of the State. It would be a mistake, however, to suppose that the respondents had not, before taking counsel's opinion, been alive to the possible effect on their duty as trustees of cl. 9 (8) of the Bill, afterwards s. 9 (8) of the Act. Mr. Thomas, one of the respondents, depones that that clause was present in his mind at his first consideration of the bequest and that he was fully aware of it before counsel drew attention to it. When the respondents reached their final decision he depones that s. 9 (8) was one of the things which caused him to have doubt whether the Royal Infirmary had been placed under the control of the State at the testator's death. His co-trustee was influenced more by counsel's opinion than by anything else, and in the respondents' pleadings counsel's opinion takes the first place among several grounds for the decision to refuse to pay the legacy.

D My Lords, it is necessary to notice the unusual and, so far as my experience goes, the unique terms of the condition by which the bequest is qualified. This is not a case in which the trustees were given a discretionary power to pay or not to pay a legacy. The bequest was payable only if the trustees should in their sole and absolute discretion be satisfied that at the testator's death the infirmary had not been (to read short) taken over by or otherwise placed under the control of the State. The trustees, as a condition of refusing payment, had not to be satisfied positively that the infirmary had been taken over by or placed under control of the State. They were under no duty to come to a decision, whether of fact or of law, that the infirmary had been taken over or placed under control or that it had not. The right to receive the legacy was contingent on the trustees' state of mind, the absence of a state of doubt. Now, it is not alleged that the trustees were untruthful or guilty of any mala fides, and so the appellants have to accept that the trustees were unquestionably in a state of doubt, not about the taking over, but about the control of the infirmary. The appellants must, therefore, show good reasons in law for ignoring the trustees' actual state of doubt. But the peculiar terms of the proviso have another effect. If a state of doubt was brought about by one circumstance which cannot successfully be assailed, it does not matter that the doubt was increased or confirmed by other circumstances which the trustees might not be entitled, under the terms of the proviso, to take into account. That is a consideration of importance in the case, because besides relying on s. 9 (8) and its retrospective effect as justifying a doubt whether the infirmary had not been "placed under the control of the State", the respondents put forward in evidence certain other matters which also had influenced them. Of some of these notice had been given on record, but of others no notice had been given. There has consequently been a difference of opinion in the courts below whether some of these matters were competently before the court and whether, since the trustees had no duty to disclose any reasons for their decision, they might, if it suited them, bring forward in evidence reasons of which no previous notice had been given. I think myself that it would be misleading to give some reasons on record and to reserve others for disclosure only in the witness box. It is not, however, necessary to pursue this question or to go into any reason but that connected with s. 9 (8), because all the other reasons argued to us are weaker, and if the appellants succeed in their attack on the reason based on s. 9 (8), the other reasons also will fall before their assault. On the other hand, if the appellants fail on s. 9 (8), it will be unnecessary to consider any of the other reasons. At this stage one other comment naturally arises. It was said for the appellants that the courts have greater liberty to examine and correct a decision committed by a testator to his trustees, if they choose to give reasons, than if they do not. In my opinion, that is erroneous. A The principles on which the courts must proceed are the same whether the reasons for the trustees' decision are disclosed or not, but, of course, it becomes easier to examine a decision if the reasons for it have been disclosed. LORD TRURO's judgment in Re Wilkes's (Beloved) Charity (1) ought not to be construed as going beyond that.

On what grounds, then, do the appellants attack the decision of the trustees to refuse payment and ask that the doubt which the trustees felt should be disregarded, and the legacy paid as if the condition attached to it had been performed? First, it was said that the trustees had exceeded the limit of the powers committed to them. This was the ground on which the lord ordinary proceeded. "The trustees failed", he said, "to consider the situation as it was at the testator's death". This view did not commend itself to any of the learned judges of the First Division, and I think that it is a misunderstanding of the evidence which makes it clear that the testator's death was the date to which the respondents addressed themselves. Then it was also said that it was not committed to the trustees to give a meaning to the words "placed under the control of" and that by misunderstanding these words they had gone beyond the limits of what had been committed to them. It was submitted that the words "or otherwise placed under the control" were only exegetical of the prior words "taken over by", and that, by interpreting them in a much looser sense, the trustees had given themselves a latitude beyond that assigned to them by the testator. I cannot agree. It appears to me clear that a taking over, which is an event which could result only from a particular operation of statute or from specific agreement, is contrasted with a much less definite condition of things, assumption of control, which may begin at a period difficult to fix and which may progress imperceptibly before becoming so complete as to divest the existing governing body of all control. And it is precisely because the testator appreciated that there might be an infiltration of control of this kind, difficult to define, and, perhaps, difficult to prove by evidence, that he committed to his trustees the duty of withholding the bequest unless they were satisfied that no such infiltration had occurred. He used the words "sole and absolute discretion" because he wished to make manifest his intention that the trustees' failure to be satisfied should be final and conclusive and not subject to correction by a court of law which might take a different view from the trustees either on the meaning of "control" or on the assessment of the surrounding circumstances as evidence of control. It is material here to remember that one of the trustees, by his association with the infirmity, was in full possession of the facts, if any, which would be indicative of control. It was objected that on this view the testator had committed to his trustees the construction, both of his will and incidentally of the meaning and effect of the statute. I would not deny that, but no case was cited to us nor do I know of any which would compel me to treat as invalid the condition as I have construed it. The only relevant authority cited was Low's Trustees (2) when Lord President INGLIS, giving the leading judgment in the First Division, refused to entertain a question of law presented to the court in a Special Case, because it was a question which the testator had lawfully committed to his trustees. I see no reason to doubt the Lord President's judgment. If these two matters of law were committed to the trustees, it cannot be urged against their decision that it is invalid because it is founded on a misunderstanding or an error of law in respect of them. If it was committed to the trustees to construe the word "control" or incidentally the terms of the Act, it was necessarily committed to them to construe wrongly as well as to construe correctly.

But then it was said that there is a limit of error which, if exceeded, will be corrected by a court of law.] Counsel for the appellants submitted that the test was whether any reasonable man fairly considering the matter could have arrived at the result at which the trustees arrived. He then argued that the trustees had committed two errors, each of which was in this sense excessive. First, he said, it was an error to treat the infirmity as affected at the testator's death by the nexus over its property created by a statute which had not then been passed; and, secondly, it was an error to entertain a doubt whether the effect of the nexus over the infirmity property had not placed the infirmity under the control of the State. I will assume that the trustees committed these two errors (for, in truth, as I shall explain later, I doubt if it is within my province to consider whether or how far they were wrong in their doubts or decisions). But the question, then, is whether these errors were so extravagant that no reasonable man could have fallen into them. On this I have no doubt whatever. It cannot be said that it was extravagantly unreasonable to apply a retrospective provision in considering the position of the infirmity at any time within the retrospective period, for the effect of making a provision retrospective is the same as a statutory declaration that at any time within the retrospective period the provision should be deemed to have been in force. Nor do I think it extravagantly unreasonable to doubt whether a nexus affecting the entire property of the infirmity and intended pro tanto to prevent the evasion of the expropriation sections of the Act might not have placed the infirmity to some extent under the control of the State.

These considerations suffice to dispose of the appeal. On the last issue discussed I have assumed that the appellants' major premise is well founded and that such an error committed by the trustees in arriving at their decision as a court of law would hold to be extravagant would in itself suffice to invalidate the decision. I think that the premise is open to doubt. Error, either of fact or of law, is no more than evidence of unreasonableness or of bad faith. Here, bad faith is not in issue. We are concerned only with unreasonableness, but there is other evidence in the case that the trustees addressed themselves to their duty carefully, seriously and impartially, and with a real desire to perform their duty to the best of their ability. One most important fact is that they took the advice of counsel and were guided by it and acted on it. That is itself powerful evidence against unreasonableness. I am not prepared to accept the view that the supposed unreasonableness of their decision or of the ground on which they reached it must outweigh more direct and satisfying evidence that they behaved as reasonable men would.

My second doubt is more fundamental. I desire to reserve the question whether the trustees' decision to withhold payment because they were in doubt whether the infirmity had not been placed under the control of the State was, under the terms of this bequest, open to question on any ground save that it was dishonest, or that it involved a trespass beyond the limits of what was committed to them by the testator. What we have to ascertain is, after all: What did the testator intend? His intention must be inferred from the language of his will, and not guessed at. But it is one thing to say that the trustees must honestly discharge their trust and keep within the bounds of the powers and duties entrusted to them, and quite another to say that they must not fall into errors which other persons, including a court of law, might consider unreasonable. One may usefully reflect that reasonable people often differ about what is reasonable, and it may be that the testator inserted the words "in their sole and absolute discretion" in order to exclude from the purview of the courts the kind of questions which have occupied so large a part of the time given to this appeal. The analogy which the Lord President found helpful, between the duty of the trustees under this will and the duty of a Scottish arbiter acting under a contract, may not be complete, but I am not satisfied that it is misleading. LORD KEITH's criticism that the trustees' duty was fiduciary, with the implication that an arbiter's duty is not, does not appeal to me. A fiduciary duty is one which must be discharged with a good conscience and, regardless of personal interests and prejudices, for the benefit of another, and the arbiter's duty is no less fiduciary than that of trustees.

Before parting with the case there are two points of procedure with which I must deal. LORD CARMONT was of opinion that the action was incompetent because it did not conclude for reduction of the trustee's minute in which their final decision was recorded. The Dean of Faculty declined to support this opinion. I think that it is not necessary for beneficiaries suing for payment of a legacy to reduce the minute in which the decision of the trustees to withhold payment is recorded, and I do not know of any advantage which a reductive conclusion would secure. Then the Lord President took the view that, though a proof had been taken in which the whole facts had been investigated, the respondents were not entitled to a decree of absolvitor, and accordingly the defenders' plea to relevance was sustained and the action was dismissed. Counsel for the appellants was not able to explain the reasons for this, and I think that the respondents were entitled to be assoilzied. In the fullest sense the decision between the parties is res judicata and I cannot conceive that the appellants ought to be entitled to raise another action on the same grounds and concluding for payment of the legacy. Cunningham v. Skinner (3) shows the confusion and injustice that may result from dismissing an action when the defender is entitled to a decree of absolvitor. But no motion has been made on behalf of the respondents except to dismiss the appeal. I would, therefore, dismiss the appeal with costs.

LORD MORTON OF HENRYTON: My Lords, I concur in the motion proposed by my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack, but as there has been a considerable difference of opinion in the Court of Session I shall state my reasons briefly in my own words.

By cl. 6 (c) of his will, the testator Thomas Norman Jarvis Bell directed his trustees, as soon after his death as might be convenient for them and free of all government duties, but without interest, to pay (inter alia) a legacy of £10,000

"to the Dundee Royal Infirmary . . . provided always, however, that the said £10,000 shall be payable as aforesaid only if my trustees shall in their sole and absolute discretion be satisfied that at my death the said infirmary has not been taken over wholly or partly by or otherwise placed under the control of the State or of a local authority or of a body directly or indirectly responsible to the State and/or a local authority."

My Lords, I read this bequest as a gift of a legacy on a condition. If, but only if, the trustees are in their sole and absolute discretion satisfied as to the existence of a particular state of facts at the death of the testator, the legacy is payable; if the trustees are not so satisfied, the legacy is not payable. It is, I think, plain that the trustees were entitled to consider the matter for a reasonable time, but when they came to give it their final consideration it would be their duty to cast their minds back to the state of affairs at the death of the testator. The trustees gave this matter their final consideration on Mar. 1, 1948, and it is not suggested that they delayed their decision to an unreasonable extent. On that date the trustees, through their solicitors, said, in effect, "We are not satisfied that at the testator's death the infirmary had not been taken over wholly or partly by or otherwise placed under the control of the State or of a local authority or of a body directly or indirectly responsible to the State and/or a local authority". Thus, the only event on which, according to the terms of the will, the legacy was payable has not happened. Notwithstanding the words "in their sole and absolute discretion", I do not regard the trustees as having a discretionary power under this will, in the ordinary sense of that phrase. The case differs from one in which, for instance, trustees are given a discretion to pay or not to pay certain sums by way of maintenance of a particular beneficiary.

A The duty of the trustees was simply to apply their minds honestly to a consideration of the question whether a certain event had or had not happened at the date of the testator's death. If they were satisfied that this event had happened, or if they were not satisfied that it had not happened, they were bound to withhold the legacy. On the other hand, if they were satisfied that this event had not happened, they were bound to pay the legacy. In neither case did it lie within their discretion to pay or to withhold the legacy. In my view the effect of the words "in their sole and absolute discretion" was simply to emphasise the testator's wish that the matter should rest entirely on the satisfaction or non-satisfaction of the trustees, and that the trustees, and not the court, were to decide as to the existence or non-existence of the given state of facts. The trustees named by the testator, two of whom survived him, were (i) his brother-in-law, (ii) a close friend who was also the treasurer of the infirmary, and (iii) his nephew, and I think the will shows that he relied on their judgment and good sense.

My Lords, if this is the true construction of the clause, it is necessary to consider on what grounds the appellants can claim this legacy. They do not allege that the trustees acted dishonestly and I can see no evidence that the trustees did not apply their minds to the proper question. Counsel for the appellants submits that the appellants can succeed if they prove that no reasonable man, fairly considering the facts, could have taken the view which the trustees took. I am prepared to assume that the burden of proof resting on the appellants is no heavier than this, though I think that it may well be heavier, having regard to the wording of this very unusual clause. On that assumption, I think it is impossible to say that the appellants have discharged this burden. The trustees have given their reasons, whether or not they were bound to do so, and I only find it necessary to refer to one of them. They took the view that the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947, s. 9 (8), which came into operation on May 21, 1947, in effect applied a "government nexus" retrospectively from Mar. 21, 1946, onwards, on all property belonging to the Royal Infirmary and that for this reason the infirmary had, at the death of the testator, been placed under the control of the State. I am not sure if I should have taken the same view, but I am quite unable to say that it is a view which could not be taken by any reasonable man, and it was confirmed by learned counsel whose opinion was sought by the trustees. For these reasons I agree that the appellants' claim to this legacy must fail.

G LORD REID: My Lords, the testator's legacy of £10,000 to the Dundee Royal Infirmary was bequeathed subject to the condition that it was only to be payable if his trustees, the respondents,

"shall in their sole and absolute discretion be satisfied that at my death the said infirmary has not been taken over wholly or partly by or otherwise placed under the control of the State or of a local authority or of a body directly or indirectly responsible to the State and/or a local authority."

H It is for the court to determine the meaning of this condition. If the respondents are right its meaning is simple: the testator directed his trustees to consider the whole matter and to decide whether or not they were satisfied that none of the events referred to had occurred before the testator's death. The determination of every question which the trustees might find it necessary to determine before deciding whether or not they were so satisfied as well as this final decision was to be in the sole and absolute discretion of the trustees, i.e., they and they alone were to be the judges of all these matters.

I find it more difficult to state in simple form the contention of the appellants, but I think that it comes to this. The testator intended that his trustees should be judges of fact but not judges of law; before reaching their final decision the trustees would not only have to find out the facts; they would also have to consider what the testator meant by "taken over" or "placed under the control"; and, if they did not come to a final conclusion until some time after the testator's death, they might also have to consider whether or how far it was proper for them to have regard to things that had happened after the date of death. These are questions of law, and if it could be shown that the trustees took a wrong view on any of these questions, and so misdirected themselves in law, then it is said that their decision cannot stand.

It was argued that the testator entrusted a power to his trustees and that it must always be for the court to determine the limits of any power. If the trustees, on a mistaken view of the limits of the power, acted beyond its limits, then their action is of no effect. It was said that in this case the power was to decide whether the infirmary had been placed under the control of the State or any other authority mentioned; to decide anything else would be to go beyond the limits of the power; and, if the trustees took a wrong view of the meaning of control in this context, they did decide something beyond the limits of the power entrusted to them. I do not think that the duty which the testator placed on his trustees in this matter can properly be described as a power, but, apart from that, this argument appears to me to beg the question, because it assumes that the testator did not confer a "power" on his trustees to determine what the testator meant by control. The argument could only have any validity if it were beyond the power of a testator under Scots law to make his trustees the judges of such a question. I can see no reason in principle why a testator should not be entitled to do this, and I know of no authority against it. The only authority at all near the present case which was cited is Low's Trustees (2). There a Special Case was presented to have it determined whether certain sums realised from working a quarry and from the sale of thinnings of plantations belonged to the life renter of the residue of the testator's estate or should be retained by the trustees and accumulated for the benefit of the fiar. The testator had made his trustees the sole and only competent judges of what was to be included in the residue and what formed part of the annual profits. By reason of this provision the First Division held that they could not entertain the case. Lord President INGLIS said (8 Sc. L.R. 638):

"... we must satisfy ourselves that it was the intention of the testator here to prevent any such legal proceedings being taken by his trustees or the beneficiaries. As to the competency of a testator making such a provision, I really cannot entertain much doubt. If a testator were to lay down in his will that there was to be no litigation about his succession whatever, I should have great doubt about the validity of such a provision. But where a testator, merely provides that there shall be no going to law upon certain special points, and arranges so clearly for their determination as here, the case is very different, and the provisions must receive effect."

I am content to accept that statement of the law, and, therefore, the question is one of construction: Has the testator so provided in this case?

In my opinion, the only reasonable interpretation of the words used by the testator is that he intended his trustees to be the sole judges of all the matters which they had to consider in carrying out the duty which he put on them. That is the natural meaning of the clause, and, even if it is capable of being otherwise construed, I can see nothing either in the context or in any other relevant circumstances to make one think that he had any other intention. If it were for the court to determine the meaning of control in this context then very little would be left for the trustees to determine and the words "in their sole and absolute discretion" would not be at all appropriate. I am satisfied that these words show that the testator did not intend that there should be anything in the nature of an appeal from the decision of his trustees. But by making his trustees the sole judges of a question a testator does not entirely exclude recourse to the court by persons aggrieved by the trustees' decision. If it can be shown that the trustees considered the wrong question, or that, although they purported to consider the right question they did not really apply their minds to it or perversely shut their eyes to the facts or that they did not act honestly or in good faith, then there was no true decision and the court will intervene, but nothing of that kind is alleged in this case. The appellants' case here is that, although the respondents acted with deliberation and in good faith, their decision was unreasonable in the sense that no reasonable man could have failed to be satisfied that the infirmary had not been placed under the control of the State before the testator's death. In this case, the respondents have not objected to that being taken as a proper test and I shall consider the facts on that view, but I wish to reserve my opinion whether that is the proper test in cases of this kind.

The testator died on Apr. 16, 1947. The respondents first considered the condition attached to the legacy on Apr. 22 when they came to the provisional decision that, having regard to the provisions of the National Health Service (Scotland) Bill, they were not satisfied that the infirmary could then be considered as free from State control. This was intimated to the infirmary and correspondence followed. Then in February, 1948, the respondents took the opinion of counsel. In their memorial they put the whole matter before counsel, and stated that notwithstanding what had been said on the other side they were still not satisfied. They asked whether they should resist the demand made to pay over the legacy. Counsel advised that the decision to refuse to pay the bequest was, in his opinion, justified on the terms of the National Health Service (Scotland) Act, 1947, and, in particular, he referred to s. 9 (8) of the Act as in effect applying a government nexus retrospectively from Mar. 21, 1946, onwards on all property belonging to the infirmary. He stated with regard to the words "placed under the control of the State" that they appeared to him apt to cover just such a situation as was created by s. 9 (8). The respondents accepted this advice, and intimated their final decision on Mar. 1, 1948.

Section 9 (8) of the Act is in the following terms:

"Where any property was, at any time between Mar. 21, 1946, and the appointed day, held or used by such persons and for such purposes as would result, but for anything done after the said date, in the transfer of the property to the Secretary of State or to a board of management under the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act, and that property ceases to be so held or used before the appointed day, it shall nevertheless be treated for the purposes of those provisions as if it had continued to be so held or used until the appointed day, unless it is proved by a person whose interest in that property would be transferred to the Secretary of State or to a board of management under those provisions, that the fact that it was not so held or used immediately before the appointed day was due to something done or occurring in the ordinary course of business, or was in no way connected with the said provisions."

The reason why the sub-section is retrospective to Mar. 21, 1946, is that the Bill for England was published on that day. Apparently it contained a similar provision and it still contained that provision when it became law in November, 1946. The Scottish Bill containing that provision was published on Nov. 26, 1946. In those circumstances, at the date of the testator's death no prudent governing body of a voluntary hospital in Scotland could neglect this retrospective provision in the Scottish Bill in dealing with their property. They could not safely alienate it unless they were satisfied that if any question were raised later they would be able to prove affirmatively that the alienation had been in the ordinary course of business or was in no way connected with the provisions of the Bill. [What the respondents had to consider was whether they were satisfied that this did not amount to placing the infirmary under the control of the State. They were advised by counsel that in his opinion it did. So, if the appellants are to succeed, they must be able to say that any reasonable man in the position of the respondents would have been satisfied that counsel was wrong. That appears to me to be a hopeless contention.] The respondents also relied on other grounds, but, if they had one ground on which they could reasonably not be satisfied, that is sufficient, and I need not consider those other grounds. I have had an opportunity of reading the speech of my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, and I agree with it. I agree that this appeal should be dismissed.

LORD TUCKER: My Lords, the testator, by his will dated Mar. 11, 1946, left a legacy of £10,000 to the Dundee Royal Infirmary, but added a proviso in these words:

“provided always . . . that the said £10,000 shall be payable as aforesaid only if my trustees shall in their . . . absolute discretion be satisfied that at my death the said infirmary has not been taken over wholly or partly by or otherwise placed under the control of the State or of a local authority or of a body directly or indirectly responsible to the State and/or a local authority.”

It is important to notice that before the legacy could be paid the trustees had to be satisfied of a negative, i.e., that certain results had not been brought about. In other words, if they were left in doubt whether or not any one of these results had occurred the legacy would not be payable. The contingency on which the payment depended was the state of mind of the trustees, not the existence in fact or in law of some objective state of control. Although the word discretion is used, this is not a case of the exercise of a discretion in the true sense of the word, as, for instance, when trustees are given a discretion to pay or not to pay money to a beneficiary or a discretion as to the amount of any such payment. I do not, therefore, derive much assistance from authorities dealing with the exercise by trustees of discretionary powers such as these. The proviso in this case is, in my view, designed to put the trustees in much the same position as an arbitrator under an arbitration clause in a contract. The words “in their sole and absolute discretion” in their present context mean, I think, that the trustees are to be the sole judges of matters which in the present instance may involve mixed questions of fact and law and that their decision both as to the relevance of the matters to be considered and as to the resulting conclusion is to be final. It is, I feel, to be regretted that a provision so clearly intended to avoid expensive litigation should have resulted in a journey to your Lordships’ House. No case has been cited in argument to show that the courts in Scotland will not give effect to such a clause as this. On the contrary, Low’s Trustees (2) tends to support its validity. It is, no doubt, true that the court has power in a case like this, if the trustees have perversely failed or refused to consider the question committed to them, or have determined a matter which was never left to them, or have acted in bad faith, but no such considerations exist in the present case.

The testator died on Apr. 16, 1947. On that date the National Health Service (Scotland) Bill was before Parliament, and had received its first reading. It received the Royal Assent on May 21, 1947, and came into force on the appointed day, July 5, 1948. The trustees’ final decision as to non-payment of the legacy was not reached until Mar. 1, 1948. On that date the trustees had to consider the position as it had been on Apr. 16, 1947, but they were entitled to take into consideration any matters which had come to their knowledge in the interval in so far as they affected the position as at Apr. 16, 1947. One of these matters—and, in my view, on the evidence clearly the decisive factor—was s. 9 (8) of the Act which had by then become law with retrospective effect to Mar. 21, 1946, with the result that on that date the funds and property of the infirmary were to a certain extent “frozen”. They had taken counsel’s opinion on this sub-section and had been advised that it had resulted in “control” within the meaning of the will. My Lords, I hold the view that nothing short of dishonesty on the part of the trustees in arriving at their decision would avail the appellants in this case, but I will assume that unreasonableness would suffice. Even so, I find it quite impossible to say that there was not material which could reasonably raise a doubt in the minds of the trustees whether or not the infirmary had as at Apr. 16, 1947, been placed under some degree of State control by the retrospective operation of this sub-section. On this view of the case, I find it unnecessary to consider any of the other matters relied on by the trustees. As I consider the doubts arising from this section would alone justify the non-payment of the legacy, it is not material to investigate whether that which had already been made doubtful had become more doubtful in the minds of the trustees by the consideration of matters which might appear to me—as distinct from the trustees—to be irrelevant. I would, accordingly, dismiss the appeal.

LORD COHEN: My Lords, counsel for the appellants urged, and the Dean of Faculty did not dispute, that it was for the court to construe the language of the testator’s will in order to ascertain the ambit of the discretion or duty conferred or imposed on the trustees of the will. Applying this principle, counsel argued that it was for the court to determine what was meant by the words “otherwise placed under the control” and that the trustees’ discretion or duty, whichever it might be, played no part in this field at all. The Dean of Faculty contended that this was giving inadequate effect to the words “in their sole and absolute discretion” and that the duty of the trustees was to ascertain the relevant facts as at the date of the testator’s death and then decide as a matter in their discretion whether those facts established to their satisfaction that the infirmary was not under the control of the State or of a local authority or of a body directly or indirectly responsible to the State and/or a local authority. I agree with the Dean of Faculty. The expression “under the control of” is not a technical expression, and I do not think it is limited to legal control. It would cover de facto control. For instance, to adopt the language of the Companies Act, 1948, s. 200 (9) (a), if the governors of the infirmary were “accustomed to act” in accordance with the “directions or instructions” of the Minister of Health, the trustees would, I think, plainly be entitled not to be satisfied that the infirmary was free from what may loosely be called “public control”. The question whether or not de facto control exists seems to me to be essentially a question which the testator might wish to leave to the unfettered discretion of his trustees, especially as one of them was the treasurer of the hospital, and, in my opinion, he has used language apt for this purpose.

Counsel for the appellants argued that the court would invalidate the decision of trustees on a matter in their discretion if (i) they acted in bad faith, or (ii) they exceeded the bounds of their discretion, or (iii) if the discretion has been exercised unreasonably. The Dean of Faculty did not dispute that the court might interfere on the first or second grounds. He argued that the third ground should be stated as follows: “if trustees in purported exercise of their discretion acted in a manner that no reasonable trustee acting within the bounds of the duty laid on him by the testator could possibly act.” There is much to be said for this statement of the principle, but I do not find it necessary to decide whether counsel or the Dean of Faculty is right, since I am satisfied that on either statement of the principle the appeal must fail. Counsel did not suggest that the trustees had acted in bad faith. He did, however, argue that they had exceeded the bounds of their discretion by not confining themselves to the position as at the date of the testator's death. If by that he meant that the point of time to which they directed their attention in deciding whether the infirmary was under public control was not the date of the testator's death, I agree with my noble and learned friend, LORD NORMAND, that on a true reading of the evidence it makes it clear that the date of the testator's death was the date to which the trustees addressed themselves. I think, however, counsel's real complaint was that in reaching their conclusion the trustees had taken into account events which occurred after the testator's death, viz. (i) an arrangement reached in May, 1946, with the Department of Health for advances which contained conditions restrictive of the freedom of action of the governors of the infirmary and retroactive to a date antecedent to the death of the testator; (ii) discussions subsequent to the testator's death with regard to the re-allocation of patients among hospitals in the area after the National Health Service should come into operation; (iii) correspondence as to the nurses' home which led to the department referring back to the infirmary plans for alterations in order that alterations required by the department involving an additional expenditure of over £3,000 might be made therein. I will assume without deciding that all these were irrelevant matters, but I do not think this helps counsel. The legacy was only to be payable if the trustees entertained no doubts on the control question. Even if all the above matters are excluded, I am unable to say that there was no evidence on which the trustees might reasonably entertain doubts thereon. At the testator's death, the Scottish Bill had been before Parliament for over five months. It contained a clause (cl. 9 (8)) with retroactive effect which has already been read to your Lordships, and which might well raise doubts in the trustees' minds as to whether at the date of the testator's death the infirmary was free from the control of the Department of Health. These doubts would be reinforced by the fact that a similar clause had been included in the English Act which had already been passed by Parliament.

Having regard to the nature of the discretion conferred on the trustees, it seems to me impossible to hold that they had exceeded the bounds placed by the testator on the exercise of that discretion. It seems to me still more impossible to say that they acted unreasonably. As I have already said, I think the provisions of cl. 9 (8) might give rise to reasonable doubts, but the trustees did not act on their own unaided judgment. They consulted counsel, and their final decision was in accordance with his advice. Reading the evidence as a whole, I think their conduct throughout was eminently reasonable. For these reasons I agree that the appeal should be dismissed.

Appeal dismissed.

B. AND B. VIENNESE FASHIONS v. LOSANE.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Sir Raymond Evershed, M.R., Jenkins and Hodson, L.JJ.),
February 26, 1952.]

Control of Goods—Sale of controlled goods—Omission to furnish invoice containing specified particulars—Contract rendered illegal—Utility Mark and Apparel and Textiles (General Provisions) Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 2642), art. 10 (1).

By the Utility Mark and Apparel and Textiles (General Provisions) Order, 1947 art. 10 (1): "A manufacturer of controlled goods shall in relation to the supply in pursuance of a contract of sale of any such goods, being utility goods manufactured by him, to a person other than a retail customer furnish to that person . . . an invoice containing the particulars hereinafter specified." By art. 18 (2): "'manufacture' includes making up . . . and goods shall be deemed to be manufactured by . . . (b) any person who in the course of his business was a party to a contract of work and labour (with or without the provision of materials) providing for the carrying out of a process in the manufacture of those goods . . ." In purported performance of a contract for the sale of non-utility ladies' jackets the plaintiff employed outworkers to make, and delivered to the defendant (a person other than a retail customer), utility jackets which the defendant had ordered to be made up for him, and he failed to deliver to the defendant an invoice as required by art. 10 (1). In an action for the price of the goods, HELD: (i) the plaintiff was a "manufacturer" within the meaning of art. 10 (1) of the order since he had been a party to a contract of work and labour for the manufacture of utility goods; art. 10 (1) contained a positive obligation to furnish the invoice specified; as the result of the failure to supply the invoice the contract became tainted with illegality; and, therefore, the plaintiff could not recover.

Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel ([1924] 1 K.B. 138), applied.

EDITORIAL NOTE. The Utility Mark and Apparel and Textiles (General Provisions) Order, 1947, was revoked as from March 17, 1952, by the Utility Goods (Revocation) Order, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 489), but it is submitted that this decision applies whenever an order provides for the furnishing of documents or invoices in relation to the sale or supply of goods. For instance, the Domestic and Ornamental Pottery (Manufacture, Marking and Supply) Order, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1130) and the Women's and Maids' Nylon Stockings (Marking and Supply) Order, 1952 (S.I., 1952, No. 402) require the furnishing of documents or invoices in relation to the supply of the goods to which they relate, and the Price Controlled Goods (Invoices) Order, 1943 (S.R. & O., 1943, No. 604), which has much the same provisions as art. 10 of the Utility Mark and Apparel and Textiles (General Provisions) Order, 1947, requires the furnishing of an invoice in relation to the sale of any price controlled goods otherwise than to a retail customer.

APPEAL by defendant and cross-appeal by plaintiff from an order made by His Honour JUDGE BLAGDEN at Westminster County Court, on Dec. 13, 1951.

The plaintiff claimed £68 10s. 11d. the price of goods sold and delivered. The defendant contended that the contract was for the sale of non-utility jackets, but that the plaintiff delivered utility goods without an invoice as required by the Utility Mark and Apparel and Textiles (General Provisions) Order, 1947, made under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939. The county court judge gave judgment for the plaintiff, but without costs, on the ground that the illegal performance of the valid contract did not disentitle the plaintiff to sue for the price of the goods. The defendant appealed, and the plaintiff cross-appealed against that part of the order depriving him of costs.

SIR RAYMOND EVERSHED, M.R.: This action was brought by B. & B. Viennese Fashions, which is the trade name of a Mr. Alexander, whom I shall call the plaintiff, for the recovery of £68 10s. 11d. in respect of the supply of certain goods. That sum was made up by reference to two separate parcels or lots (i) certain articles, the price of which was £13 10s. 11d., and (ii) ten ladies' jackets, for which the price was £55. The judge gave judgment for the plaintiff for both sums, and there is no appeal before us in respect of the smaller sum of £13 10s. 11d. The judge, however, deprived the plaintiff of costs in respect of both items, he taking the view, not unnaturally as will appear, that the performance of the plaintiff, both in court and in regard to the subject-matter of the larger claim, was in certain respects of a reprehensible character.

The difficulties in the case have not been eased by the form of the pleading. The particulars of claim, quite properly, specify generally that the cause of action was for the recovery of £68 10s. 11d., the price of goods sold and delivered between certain dates. The defence to that claim was (putting it briefly, and confining myself now to the £55), that the contract in respect of which the ten jackets were delivered was a contract for the sale of ten non-utility jackets and that the jackets delivered were utility jackets, but that the plaintiff, in breach of certain regulations, had disguised the nature of those goods, which rendered the sale unenforceable as being tainted by illegality. By way of reply the plaintiff said the contract was for the sale of utility jackets, and utility jackets were delivered. The judge came to the conclusion that the bargain was for the sale of non-utility jackets. He also came to the conclusion that while the goods were in the hands of the plaintiff's firm the utility labels originally attached to the goods had been unlawfully removed. It was not in dispute that no invoice had been delivered or furnished to the defendant pursuant to art. 10 (1) of the Utility Mark and Apparel and Textiles (General Provisions) Order, 1947 (S.R. & O., 1947, No. 2642), which, as the defendant has contended, was applicable to this case on the footing that the goods were utility goods. It is not in dispute that that order was duly made under the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939, and is applicable to utility goods of the kind here in question. The defendant accepted these goods as delivered, but he said that he did so innocently, supposing that they were non-utility. He proceeded to dispose of them in the ordinary way of business to customers from whom he received a price, but he now says that he is excused from paying the price which the plaintiff claims because of the taint of illegality. It may be that the conduct of none of the parties concerned in this transaction is wholly laudable, but we are concerned on this appeal with the single question: Was there here such a breach of the regulations affecting these goods that, in the interests of public policy, the plaintiff is disabled from enforcing his contract?

These goods were made originally as utility goods. The judge accepted the evidence of the actual person who made them, a Mr. Shine. He, apparently, only manufactured utility goods, and, according to his evidence, he applied the appropriate labels to the goods when they were manufactured. Two articles of the order I have mentioned have been in question here. The first is art. 2, the first paragraph of which provides:

"No person shall remove or deface the utility mark . . ."

or certain other marks, from any utility goods. It is, therefore, beyond doubt that, if the plaintiff removed or defaced these utility marks he committed a breach of the regulations. The provision which is more important as matters have turned out is art. 10 (1), which provides:

A "A manufacturer of controlled goods shall in relation to the supply in pursuance of a contract of sale of any such goods, being utility goods manufactured by him, to a person other than a retail customer furnish to that person, not later than seven days after the supply of the goods, an invoice containing the particulars hereinafter specified".

I need not read what is "hereinafter specified," for it is not in dispute here that no such invoice was delivered by the plaintiff to the defendant. It is, perhaps, convenient to say that the obvious purpose of that provision is to identify, in the way in which it sets out to achieve, the source and character of the utility goods, so as to see that goods sold as such comply with the requirements affecting such goods.

B The first question which arises on art. 10 (1), is whether the plaintiff in any case was a "manufacturer of controlled goods". The actual making, the physical operation of making the goods, was performed by Mr. Shine, but the evidence of the plaintiff in the course of cross-examination included these statements:

C "I am a manufacturer. I buy from other firms. I employ outworkers. These people [Mr. Shine and others] were outworkers and supplied own material remnants left over. This is what is called 'making up'. I take or choose materials and order garments to be made up: 'Here is what I want, make me so many jackets.'"

D Unfortunately the judge has not in terms come to a conclusion of fact on this matter, although he has indicated by his notes in the course of the evidence that he thought that the plaintiff was a manufacturer within the paragraph, and I agree with him. The definition to which it is necessary to refer appears in art. 18 (2)

E "'manufacture' includes making up . . . and goods shall be deemed to be manufactured by . . . (b) any person who in the course of his business was a party to a contract of work and labour (with or without the provision of materials) providing for the carrying out of a process in the manufacture of those goods . . . 'manufacturer' shall be construed accordingly".

F On the evidence I have read from the cross-examination of the plaintiff, it seems to me that he was a "person who in the course of his business was a party to a contract of work and labour", namely, a contract with Mr. Shine, which provided "for the carrying out of a process in the manufacture of those goods". Mr. Shine was engaged, as the plaintiff says, as an outworker to make as many jackets as the plaintiff ordered and specified.

G Counsel for the plaintiff has said that the words which follow in the paragraph:

" . . . so, however, that a reference to any person as having actually manufactured any goods shall be construed as a reference only to a person of the description specified in sub-para. (a) hereof . . . "

H take this case out of the ambit of the definition. I cannot agree with that contention. We are not here concerned with a reference to any person as having actually manufactured the goods. For the reasons which I have indicated, I think that the plaintiff was a manufacturer within the definition of art. 18 (2), and, therefore, is "a manufacturer of controlled goods" within art. 10 (1).

Does what immediately follows in art. 10 (1) apply? Such a manufacturer, says the paragraph " . . . shall in relation to the supply in pursuance of a contract of sale of any such goods, being utility goods manufactured by him, to a person other than a retail customer furnish to that person . . . "

an invoice of the kind mentioned. It is said by counsel for the plaintiff that the words "any such goods, being utility goods manufactured by him" qualify the phrase "in pursuance of a contract of sale", and that, since on the judge's findings it was a contract of sale of non-utility goods, art. 10 (1) has no application. I do not agree. I think the natural reading of this phrase compels the reader to relate the words "any such goods, being utility goods manufactured by him" back to the phrase "in relation to the supply". Unless it were so, as JENKINS, L.J., pointed out, the words "in relation to the supply" would be left (as it were) in the air. The effect, therefore, in my judgment, is that, if the plaintiff, being, as I hold, a manufacturer, proceeded to supply in pursuance of a contract of sale utility goods manufactured by him to a person other than a retail customer—all of which he did, for the defendant was not a retail customer—then he was obliged to furnish to that person, within the time specified, an invoice containing the requisite particulars. That he failed to do.

What then is the result? In my judgment, Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel (1) provides the answer to that question. That was a case concerned with the supply under a contract for sale of certain articles which fell within the Fertilisers and Feeding Stuffs Act, 1906, s. 1 (1), which says:

"Every person who sells for use as a fertiliser of the soil any article which . . . has been imported from abroad, shall give to the purchaser an invoice stating . . . what are the respective percentages (if any)"

of certain chemical substances contained in the article. It appeared that the plaintiffs in that action had sold some stuff known as salvage, which was the sweepings of the holds of ships bringing from abroad cargoes of, among other things, sodium nitrate, and it was, therefore, not in issue that the subject-matter of that sale of salvage was an article within the language of s. 1 (1) of that Act of 1906. The plaintiffs had failed to supply any such invoice as was required. It was argued that commercially speaking it was impracticable to do so, because the chemical composition of these sweepings could only be ascertained as a result of an elaborate analysis which would make nonsense of the commerce between buyers and sellers of salvage. This court came to the conclusion that the words of the Act were compelling in their effect and that there was a duty imposed by the statute in the clearest terms (and subject to a penalty in case of breach) to provide such an invoice, that the object of that provision was to protect the public, and that failure to comply with the section was an illegality which tainted the contract and prevented the plaintiff suing on it.

In my judgment, that is the effect of art. 10 (1) of the order of 1947. It contains a positive obligation that a supply of utility goods under a contract of sale must be followed within the requisite dates by the invoice specified. Regulation 92 of the Defence (General) Regulations, 1939 (which is applicable to the case) imposes a penalty for failure to comply with these requirements. The plaintiff having failed so to do, he cannot escape the result that his sale is tainted with the illegality consisting of a breach of the regulations, and, therefore, it cannot be enforced by him.

It was alternatively suggested that, since, on the judge's findings, the plaintiff had committed the further offence of defacing the utility mark, he was for that reason also disabled from enforcing his contract. I find it unnecessary to express any final conclusion on that. Counsel for the plaintiff has argued that there was no, or no sufficient, evidence to support the finding that the defacement had been done by the plaintiff's agent. As at present advised, I think there was sufficient evidence, but I do not find it necessary to express any view whether, assuming that against the plaintiff, his breach of that paragraph vitiates his right to sue for the purchase price of the articles so defaced which he supplied to the defendant and which the defendant accepted.

In the result, I have come to a different conclusion from that of the judge. According to him, the present case was to be distinguished from Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel (1), and he gave illustrations to show that the conclusion which I reach would lead to remarkable results. I do not find that difficulty. I think the question turns on the meaning and effect of art. 10 (1) of the order of 1947, and, if its effect is to make it illegal to supply utility goods save on the terms or under the condition that the requirement in regard to such a sale for delivery of an invoice are observed, then I think that, as happened in Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel (1), the breach by the plaintiff of that obligation so tainted the contract as to disable him from suing for the purchase price. The result of that view is that the defendant must be entitled to succeed as to the £55. With regard to the £13 10s. 11d., no appeal has been brought against the finding of the learned judge in favour of the plaintiff, but the question will then arise as to how the costs of the hearing below fall to be dealt with. There was a cross-appeal against the learned judge's refusal to allow any costs to the plaintiff as regards any part of his claim in the court below and I must say that in the circumstances I find it impossible to say that the judge was not, in all the circumstances of this case, entitled in his discretion to say that the plaintiff should not be entitled to any costs. The cross-appeal, therefore, must fail.

JENKINS, L.J.: I agree. On the evidence it is reasonably plain that the plaintiff was, in relation to the garments here in question, a manufacturer within the meaning of art. 18 of the order of 1947. I think that under art. 10 (1) a manufacturer is obliged, when, in pursuance of a contract of sale of any controlled goods, he supplies to any person other than a retail customer utility goods manufactured by him, to furnish an invoice within the time and containing the particulars prescribed by the regulation. It follows that the plaintiff, in supplying to the defendant firm in purported pursuance of the contract of sale, utility goods which were not accompanied or followed in due time by the prescribed invoice, committed a breach of art. 10 (1). The judge held in effect that this was immaterial because the contract in itself had nothing illegal about it. He held that on the evidence it was a contract for the sale of certain non-utility garments, and, being such a contract, it could only be properly performed by delivery of garments of that description. The judge's reasoning from that point in effect proceeded thus: In this state of things it matters not that the plaintiff chose, in breach of the contract, to deliver utility goods and in so doing to commit a breach of art. 10 (1). This conduct of the plaintiff involved a breach of contract, but the breach was waived and the goods were accepted by the defendant firm, and there is no reason for disentitling the plaintiff firm from recovering the purchase money. With this reasoning I find myself unable to agree.

It is plain from Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel (1) that illegality in the performance of a contract may avoid it although the contract was not illegal ab initio. That being so, one has to consider whether the mode in which the contract was performed, or purported to be performed, in this case sufficed to turn it into an illegal contract. I find myself constrained to hold that this was the result. If the judge's reasoning was right, the most remarkable consequences would ensue. The contract, having been made as a contract for non-utility garments, the plaintiff having purported to perform that contract by delivering utility garments and having broken the regulation in the matter of the invoice, and the defendant firm having waived the breach and accepted the utility garments, there would result a transaction which was on the face of it illegal as having infringed art. 10 (1), but was, nevertheless, enforceable as a lawful transaction merely because the contract was in origin expressed to be a contract for the sale of non-utility garments. The plaintiff chose, in purported performance of the contract, to deliver utility garments without an invoice. As a performance of the contract, that was clearly an illegal performance in view of the provisions of art. 10 (1). The defendant firm accepted the goods so delivered and disposed of them. In my judgment, that course of events must taint the whole contract with illegality, just as much as if it had been in origin a contract for the sale of utility garments. To hold otherwise would produce this absurdity. The plaintiff comes to the court and claims payment for goods sold and delivered. To make out that claim he must show delivery of the goods, and the delivery he relies on is the delivery of utility garments without an invoice. Thus, the plaintiff must either admit that he is seeking to recover on an illegal contract or else he must set up his own breach of contract and say that this delivery of utility garments without an invoice, although illegal, was not a delivery in pursuance of the contract at all, with the surprising consequences that, notwithstanding the breach of contract, the illegality, the plaintiff is entitled to recover the contract price. It seems to me that this is an absurd result. In my view, notwithstanding that the contract provided for the sale of non-utility goods, the delivery of what were in fact utility goods without an invoice did so taint the contract in its performance with illegality as to disentitle the plaintiff from recovering the price of the goods. I agree that the appeal should be allowed.

HODSON, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The judge rightly held that the plaintiff was a manufacturer within the meaning of art. 10 (1) as defined by art. 18 of the order of 1947, and, having arrived at that conclusion, he was bound to find that, no invoice having been provided by the manufacturer, art. 10 (1) had been broken. He then, faced with the decision of this court in Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel (1), sought to distinguish that case, and I think it was there that he fell into error. In Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel (1) BANKES, L.J., in dealing with the statutory penalty imposed for supplying fertilisers without an invoice, said ([1924] 1 K.B. 114):

"Here the penalty is imposed wholly for the protection of the public, and the purchaser is entitled to take the objection that as the vendors have failed to give the required invoice the contract of sale is illegal and they cannot sue for the price... So here I say that a vendor of fertilisers must comply with the provisions as to invoice in order to take advantage of the contract of sale. From that point of view it is unnecessary to consider whether the contract was illegal ab initio".

The matter is summarised by SCRUTTON, L.J., where he says (ibid., 147):

"When the policy of the Act in question is to protect the general public or a class of persons by requiring that a contract shall be accompanied by certain formalities or conditions, and a penalty is imposed on the person omitting those formalities or conditions, the contract and its performance without those formalities or conditions is illegal, and cannot be sued upon by the person liable to the penalties".

In my opinion this case is parallel with Anderson, Ltd. v. Daniel (1), and, therefore, the appeal must be allowed.

Appeal allowed. Cross-appeal dismissed.

WALLIS v. WALLIS (QUEEN'S PROCTOR SHOWING CAUSE).

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Pearce, J.), March 6, 14, 1952.]
Legal Aid—Costs—Queen's Proctor's intervention—Certificate granted for divorce suit—Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), reg. 5 (2).

By the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, reg. 5 (2), a certificate entitling an assisted person to legal aid "shall not relate to more than one action, cause or matter". Where the Queen's Proctor intervenes in a divorce suit after a decree nisi has been pronounced, the suit and the intervention are not "one action, cause or matter" within the regulation, and, therefore, the petitioner is not entitled to contest the intervention under a certificate granted to him for prosecuting the suit.

FOR THE LEGAL AID (GENERAL) REGULATIONS, 1950, reg. 5 (2), see HALSBURY'S STATUTORY INSTRUMENTS, Vol. 5, p. 206.

INTERVENTION by the Queen's Proctor.

The case is reported only on the question of the costs of the intervention. The Queen's Proctor contended that the legal aid certificate granted to the petitioner for the purpose of prosecuting the suit did not cover the costs of the intervention. The petitioner contended that the certificate continued in operation until it was either discharged or revoked or until the conclusion of the "action, cause or matter", which in this case meant the decree absolute.

Comyn for the Queen's Proctor.

C. T. Reeve for the petitioner.

PEARCE, J.: This was a Queen's Proctor's intervention caused by the fact that the petitioner deliberately deceived the court as to the true circumstances of his own adultery. Counsel for the Queen's Proctor has submitted that the petitioner's legal aid certificate does not apply to the Queen's Proctor's intervention. The petitioner started as an assisted person, and, by reg. 20 (4) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950, those regulations have applied to him at all material times.

Regulation 3 deals with applications by persons desiring legal aid and reg. 3 (3) reads:

"Every application shall contain such information and shall be accompanied by such documents as may be requisite to enable—(a) a local committee to determine—(i) the nature of the proceedings in relation to which legal aid is sought and the circumstances in which legal aid is required; and (ii) the question whether it is reasonable that a certificate should be granted . . ."

By reg. 5:

"(1) A certificate may be issued in respect of the whole or a part of—(a) proceedings in a court of first instance; or (b) proceedings in an appellate court. No certificate shall relate to proceedings (other than interlocutory appeals) both in a court of first instance and in an appellate court. (2) A certificate shall not relate to more than one action, cause or matter, but may include proceedings for the enforcement of any such order or agreement as is referred to in para. (3) of reg. 16."

Regulation 6 states that the committee may refuse an application for a certificate on the grounds:

" . . . (d) that the applicant has not shown that he has reasonable grounds for taking, defending or being a party to proceedings; or (e) that it appears unreasonable that he should receive legal aid in the particular circumstances of the case (whether as a result of any discretion given to a local committee under any provision of these regulations or otherwise) . . ."

Regulation 11 provides for the discharge and revocation of certificates. They may be revoked inter alia where the committee are satisfied that an assisted person in furnishing information has knowingly made a false statement or false representation. By reg. 11 (4):

"At any time during the hearing of any proceedings to which an assisted person is a party the court may, upon application by or on behalf of any other party to the proceedings . . . consider whether the assisted person . . . (b) in furnishing . . . information has knowingly made a false statement or false representation; and . . . may make an order revoking the certificate or discharging it from such date as may be appropriate and the court's decision shall be final . . ."

Regulation 14 provides that in certain circumstances an assisted person's solicitor shall apply to the legal aid committee and by para. (3):

"Where it appears to the assisted person's solicitor necessary for the proper conduct of the proceedings to take or to apply to the court for leave to take any one or more of the following steps, namely:—(a) to add any further party to the proceedings; or (b) to bespeak any transcript of short-hand notes of any proceedings; or (c) to lodge any interlocutory appeal; or (d) to instruct more than one counsel; or (e) to set up or set off any right or claim having the same effect as a cross-action (other than a counterclaim or set off arising out of the same transaction and capable of being pleaded as a defence), or to reply to any right or claim so set up or so set off by any other party; he shall (unless the certificate provides for the act in question to be done) apply to the appropriate area committee for authority so to do, and no payment shall be allowed on taxation for any such step taken without their approval."

Counsel for the Queen's Proctor argues that from the point of view of common sense it is right that a petitioner should have to go back to the legal aid committee in a case where he has obtained a decree nisi, but, owing to his own deception, the Queen's Proctor has intervened. It would be in accordance with the sense of the regulations, it is said, that the petitioner should have to put forward circumstances which will show the extent of the intervention, the nature of the intervention, and whether it is reasonable that a certificate should be granted to deal with that intervention. Alternatively, if the certificate is in force, counsel asks me to revoke it under reg. 11 (4).

Counsel for the petitioner, on the other hand, contends that the Queen's Proctor's intervention is covered by the certificate which was given to the petitioner for prosecuting a suit for divorce. He relies on reg. 11 (2) (c), which says that a certificate may be discharged or revoked by the area committee,

"if they are satisfied, after considering any report of the assisted person's solicitor, that the proceedings to which the certificate relates have been disposed of."

He argues that no certificate comes to an end until it is either discharged or revoked, and that this certificate has never been discharged or revoked. He says that a suit for divorce is not finished until a decree absolute has been pronounced, and in this case no decree absolute has been pronounced and the solicitor has not reported to the area committee under reg. 11 (2) (c). Further, he argues that under reg. 5 (2), whereby a certificate shall not relate to more than one action, cause or matter, it is implied that a certificate continues to exist for so long as that one action, cause or matter continues, and that the Queen's Proctor's intervention is part of the action, cause or matter which started as a suit for divorce. I am told that there is no authority which bears on the matter.

In my view, the Queen's Proctor's contentions are correct, for this reason. I do not think that the Queen's Proctor's intervention can properly be said to be included in the action, cause or matter for which the petitioner was given a certificate. That certificate was for a suit for divorce. In this intervention the title of the suit is different. There are new pleadings, new parties, and new issues. The issues fought out in the intervention were not issues in the original suit. The regulations envisage that the local committee shall have a reasonable control over the proceedings before they start, and should know what their nature is and whether it is reasonable to grant a certificate. If the result of giving a certificate for prosecuting a suit for divorce is that the assisted person may continue to keep the protection of that certificate even though he has lied and thus drawn down on himself a Queen's Proctor's intervention (which might last for several days), the control of the proceedings is entirely removed from the supervision of the local committee. From an administrative point of view it is clearly better that, as soon as the Queen's Proctor intervenes, the matter should go to the local committee again for them to consider whether they will issue a certificate for the petitioner to contest the Queen's Proctor's intervention.

Under reg. 11 (4), if the certificate were in force, I should have to consider the question of revoking a certificate where (as here) the assisted person has knowingly made a false statement or representation, and in such a case as this I should feel bound to do so. It is obviously better that the question whether there shall be a certificate for the intervention should be dealt with at the beginning of the intervention, rather than afterwards when all the costs have been incurred. That is a consideration which, of course, would not weigh with me if the regulations expressly provided otherwise, but where the rules are silent on a particular point and one is trying to get guidance from the general intention as shown by express regulations, that consideration is not to be wholly disregarded. Both from the language of the regulations and the general intention to be derived from them and also from the common-sense point of view it appears to me that a petitioner is not entitled to contest a Queen's Proctor's intervention under a certificate given to him for prosecuting a suit for divorce. Therefore, the petitioner in this case is not covered by the certificate that has been issued.

The practical result, so far as concerns the Queen's Proctor's costs, is unchanged by that conclusion. I have decided that I ought to order the petitioner to pay enough costs to make him appreciate that legal costs have to be paid, but at the same time order him to pay only such sum as he can over a period hope to discharge. I heard evidence in regard to his finances, and, in my view, the right order is that he should pay £25 towards the Queen's Proctor's costs. I shall assess the costs at that figure in order to avoid the expense of a taxation. The costs will be payable under an instalment order of 5s. a week, the first instalment being within fourteen days.

Order accordingly.

TOWNSEND (INSPECTOR OF TAXES) v. ELECTRICAL YARNS, LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Donovan, J., sitting as a judge of the Division), February 26, 29, 1952.]

Income Tax—Deductions against profits—Wear and tear—Balancing charge—Assessment—No effect on amount of profit chargeable—Income Tax Act, 1945 (c. 32), s. 55 (3).

B
A company permanently discontinued its trade in the year of assessment 1949-50. Its assessment for the penultimate year, 1948-49, based on the profits of the preceding year, was £3,038, and the actual profits of that year were £2,578. During that year the company sold plant and machinery on which, under r. 6 (1) of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D to the Income Tax Act, 1918, it had been allowed deductions for wear and tear, the sale being at a price which recouped the company for its loss through wear and tear. As a result the company was assessed to a balancing charge under s. 17 and s. 55 (3) of the Income Tax Act, 1945. On the question what was the correct figure of assessment for the penultimate year,

C
HELD: under s. 55 (3) the assessment in respect of the balancing charge was a separate assessment and did not affect the amount of the profits chargeable, so that the company was correctly assessed on £3,038 in respect of the profits of the penultimate year and in addition on £600 in respect of the balancing charge.

CASE STATED by General Commissioners of Income Tax.

F
The company appealed to the general commissioners against an assessment of £600 in respect of a balancing charge for the penultimate year of its trade, 1948-49. The company contended that the balancing charge should be added to the amount of its profits of the penultimate year, and that, since its actual profits of the penultimate year, when added to the balancing charge, exceeded the assessment based on the profits of the preceding year, the additional assessment was limited to £140, the amount of the excess, by virtue of s. 31 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1926. The general commissioners accepted the company's contention, and reduced the assessment accordingly. The Crown appealed.

Cur. adv. vult.

H
Feb. 29. DONOVAN, J., read the following judgment. This company ceased to trade as cotton spinners on Dec. 21, 1949, and, accordingly, the assessment to income tax on its trading profits for the year of assessment 1949-50 fell to be computed on the company's actual profits from Apr. 6, 1949 to Dec. 21, 1949. In addition, the last year but one of the company's trading had to be considered in case the existing assessment for that year should require to be increased. Section 31 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1926, requires that this should be done in cases where the actual profits of a trader's penultimate year of trading exceed the assessment for that year. This might well happen in some cases because that assessment would be based on the profits of the year before the penultimate year. Accordingly, the inspector of taxes in the present case looked at the penultimate year of the company's trading and found the actual profits were £2,578. But the existing assessment for that year, 1948-49, based on the results of the year before, was £3,038, and so no upward revision of the assessment was required. One may note in passing that no downward revision was required either, for the Income Tax Acts are one-sided on this point, and allow no such relief to the taxpayer.

- A So far, the case presents no difficulty, but, oddly enough, the next thing one finds is the company insisting that its assessment for the penultimate year, 1948-49, should be increased by £140. The explanation of this seeming aberration lies in the following circumstances. In this penultimate year the company sold some of its plant and machinery. In respect of that plant and machinery it had previously received wear and tear allowances. Deducting those allowances from the cost of the plant would leave what may be called the written-down value. The sale price of the plant and machinery exceeded the written-down value. In these circumstances something called a balancing charge has to be made on the company, the amount of that charge being on the surplus of sale price over written-down value, limited, however, to the amount of the wear and tear allowances previously received by the company. In other words, the effect of the balancing charge is to cancel allowances previously given for capital loss through wear and tear where that loss is recouped by the taxpayer on a sale of his machinery. In the present case it is agreed that the facts justified a balancing charge on the sum of £600 for the year 1948-49. Accordingly, a separate assessment was made for that year in that sum.

- D Against this assessment the company appealed to the general commissioners and persuaded them to reduce the assessment to £140. How this came about can best be explained by referring first of all to certain statutory provisions relating to a balancing charge. They are all contained in the Income Tax Act, 1945, and they begin with s. 17, which, so far as here material, says this:

- E “(1) Subject to the provisions of this section, where, on or after the appointed day, any of the following events occurs in the case of any machinery or plant in respect of which an initial allowance or a deduction under r. 6 of the Rules Applicable to Cases I and II of sched. D has been made or allowed for any year of assessment to a person carrying on a trade, that is to say, either—(a) the machinery or plant is sold, whether while still in use or not . . . and the event in question occurs before the trade is permanently discontinued, an allowance or charge (in this Part of this Act referred to as ‘a balancing allowance’ or ‘a balancing charge’) shall, in the circumstances mentioned in this section, be made to, or, as the case may be, on, that person for the year of assessment in his basis period for which that event occurs . . . (2) Where there are no sale, insurance, salvage or compensation moneys or where the amount of the capital expenditure of the person in question on the provision of the plant or machinery still unallowed as at the time of the event exceeds those moneys, a balancing allowance shall be made, and the amount thereof shall be the amount of the expenditure still unallowed as aforesaid, or, as the case may be, of the excess thereof over the said moneys. (3) If the sale, insurance, salvage or compensation moneys exceed the amount, if any, of the said expenditure still unallowed as at the time of the event, a balancing charge shall be made, and the amount on which it is made shall be an amount equal to the excess or, where the said amount still unallowed is nil, to the said moneys.”

Sub-section (4) limits the amount of the balancing charge to tax allowances previously received. As I say, it is common ground that s. 17 (1) (3) and (4) applies in this case, and that a balancing charge has to be made and the amount on which it is to be made is £600. Section 22 of the Act provides, among other things, that where a balancing charge is made it shall, except in a case which is not this one, be made on a person "in charging the profits or gains of his trade." Section 55 (3) enacts thus:

"Any charge falling to be made under any of the provisions of this Act on a person for any year of assessment in charging the profits or gains of his trade shall be made by means of an assessment on the profits or gains of that trade for that year of assessment in addition to any other assessment falling to be made thereon for that year."

So a balancing charge is to be made by means of an assessment on the profits and gains of that trade for the relevant year. It is these words which create the difficulty. The company contend that s. 55 requires the amount of the balancing charge to be added to the trading profits for 1948-49 (the relevant year) for the purpose of assessment. If that be done, the result is to bring such profits up to the aggregate figure of £3,178, or £140 more than the existing assessment for 1948-49. Then, it is argued, s. 31 (1) (b) of the Finance Act, 1926, comes into operation and requires an assessment to be made on the £140, but on no more. When that is done all liability in respect of the balancing charge of £600 is satisfied. With this argument the general commissioners agreed.

It is an odd result, but, if it clearly flows from the relevant statutory language, there is no more to be said. The crucial words are those in s. 55 (3) requiring the balancing charge to be made "by means of an assessment on the profits or gains of that trade". Do these words require that the balancing charge must be levied as the company contends? If so, it would seem also to follow that in a year for which a balancing charge has to be made, but in which there are no profits or gains of the trade to be taxed, no balancing charge can be made at all. Or, on the contrary, do the words merely define the kind of assessment by which the balancing charge is to be levied? In considering this problem it has to be remembered that the balancing charge falls to be made because, by the sale of his plant and machinery, the taxpayer has recouped the capital loss in respect of which he was previously given wear and tear allowances. That is the whole purpose of the balancing charge, and there is, therefore, no reason whatever why the effective levy of the charge should depend on whether there are profits or gains of the trade, or, as in this case, on the amount of them. In the present case the taxpayer had £600 allowed for capital loss. He has got back £600 at least as a profit above written-down value by the sale of his plant. So a balancing charge on £600 is imposed by s. 17. Nevertheless, says the company in this case, the result of s. 55 is to reduce the balancing charge to £140 only. If that be so, then I ought to be satisfied that such is the clear result of the language employed.

In Whitney v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (1) LORD DUNEDIN said this ([1926] A.C. 52):

"Once that it is fixed that there is liability, it is antecedently highly improbable that the statute should not go on to make that liability effective. A statute is designed to be workable, and the interpretation thereof by a court should be to secure that object, unless crucial omission or clear direction makes that end unattainable. Now, there are three stages in the imposition of a tax: there is the declaration of liability, that is the part of the statute which determines what persons in respect of what property are liable. Next, there is the assessment. Liability does not depend on assessment. That, ex hypothesi, has already been fixed. But assessment particularises the exact sum which a person liable has to pay. Lastly, come the methods of recovery, if the person taxed does not voluntarily pay."

In the present case a balancing charge on £600 is clearly imposed by s. 17 of the Act of 1945. Is the charge defeated except to the extent of tax on £140 by the clear language of s. 55? The company says it is because that section requires the assessment to be made on the profits or gains of the trade. That means you must in the present case simply augment the profits or gains of 1948-49 by £600, and, if the resulting assessment by reason of other considerations comes out only at £140, that is simply the result of the statutory language which is not to be distorted so as to produce a different result thought to be more in line with what the legislature intended. Alternatively, it is said, if s. 55 leaves the matter in doubt, the doubt should be resolved in the taxpayer's favour on the well known principle that he is not to be taxed except by clear words.

A In Penang & General Investment Trust, Ltd. v. Inland Revenue Comrs. (2), a question arose on the construction of s. 21 of the Finance Act, 1922, which penalises a company which does not declare reasonable dividends "in such manner as to render the amount distributed liable to be included in the statements to be made by the members of the company of their total income for the purposes of surtax". In that case the shareholders were trustees and trustees are not liable to include trust income in their return of total income for the purposes of surtax. Accordingly, it was argued, the section had no application to the company, for how could it be penalised for not doing the impossible. The House of Lords held that the words in question were simply descriptive of the kind of distribution the legislature had in mind and not the result of such distribution. As LORD MACMILLAN put it, it is the character of the distribution, not its ultimate tax effect, that is referred to in the section. This result which undoubtedly modified the literal meaning of the words was reached by considering among other things the purpose of the particular legislation. In the present case, bearing in mind that the purpose of s. 17 and s. 55 is clearly to levy a balancing charge on £600, I am faced with the problem whether the words in s. 55, "by means of an assessment on the profits or gains of the trade", mean literally that there must be an assessment on such profits—that is, do they describe what the result of the assessment is to be, or are they descriptive merely of the kind of assessment the legislature had in mind?

D I think the latter is the true interpretation. Even on the company's construction there would have to be some modification of the words so as to make them mean that the amount of the balancing charge is to be included among the profits or gains of the trade for the purposes of assessment. I think that I do no violence to the language of s. 55 by reading the relevant words as "by means of an assessment purporting to be on the profits or gains of the trade." That avoids the incongruous result yielded by the rival interpretation, and does so, in my opinion, by a fair and reasonable construction of the language. This construction seems to be supported by the concluding words of s. 55 (3), "in addition to any other assessment falling to be made thereon", that is on the trading profits for the year. This indicates, I think, that there shall be a separate assessment in respect of the balancing charge whether there are any profits or gains of the trade or not.

Appeal allowed.

READ v. ASTORIA GARAGE (STREATHAM), LTD.

[CHANCERY DIVISION (Harman, J.), March 12, 13, 14, 19; Affirmed. C.A. [1952] 2 All E.R. 29]

Company—Director—Managing director—Removal—Notice required—Companies Act, 1929 (c. 23), Table "A", art. 68.

A private company, incorporated in 1932, adopted as its articles Table "A" of the Companies Act, 1929, art. 68 of which provides: "The directors may from time to time appoint one or more of their body to the office of managing director . . . for such term and at such remuneration . . . as they may think fit, and a director so appointed shall not, while holding that office, be subject to retirement by rotation, or taken into account in determining the rotation or retirement of directors; but his appointment shall be subject to determination ipso facto if he ceases from any cause to be a director, or if the company in general meeting resolve that his tenure of the office of managing director . . . be determined." In January, 1932, at the first meeting of the directors of the company it was resolved that the plaintiff "be and he is hereby appointed managing director of the company at a salary of £7 per week as from Monday, Feb. 1, 1932." On Mar. 15, 1949, the directors decided "to relieve Mr. Read [the plaintiff] of his position as managing director of the company and to give him two months' leave on full pay." On the expiration of the plaintiff's leave, the directors passed a further resolution that the plaintiff's "employment be terminated as and from May 13, 1949", and the secretary was instructed to send him one month's notice so determining his employment. In fact, however, the company paid the plaintiff his salary until, on Sept. 28, 1949, an extraordinary general meeting of the company was held at which a resolution approving the action of the directors in removing the plaintiff was passed. The plaintiff claimed damages for wrongful dismissal and breach of contract on the footing that he had not been given reasonable notice.

Held: on the true construction of art. 68, the plaintiff's appointment was immediately and automatically terminated on the passing of the resolution at the extraordinary general meeting of Sept. 28, 1949, and, while it might well be that it would have been a breach of contract for the company so to alter its articles as to give the directors the power to determine the plaintiff's appointment, it was not a breach of contract for the company to dismiss the plaintiff without notice, the company having, by art. 68, expressly retained such power in its own hands.

ACTION for a declaration that the plaintiff was the chairman of the defendant company, Astoria Garage (Streatham), Ltd., and that his employment as managing director of the company had not been validly terminated. Alternatively, the plaintiff claimed damages for wrongful dismissal or breach of contract.

The company was a private company, promoted by the plaintiff in 1932 to carry on a garage business which had theretofore been carried on by him. The initial share capital was £2,000, all of which was subscribed in cash, except the eight hundred shares held by the plaintiff which were allotted to him in consideration of the transfer of his business. Table "A" of the Companies Act, 1929, with some amendments, was adopted as the articles of the company which

A provided that the plaintiff was to be permanent chairman. At the first meeting of the company it was resolved that the plaintiff "be and he is hereby appointed managing director of the company at a salary of £7 per week as from Monday, Feb. 1, 1932." On Apr. 15, 1938, a resolution was passed at a directors' meeting that the plaintiff be no longer the chairman of the company and that the articles be altered accordingly. On May 24, 1938, at an extraordinary general meeting a

B resolution that the plaintiff be no longer chairman and that one, S., be appointed chairman was defeated. On June 30, 1938, a further extraordinary general meeting was held, and a special resolution was passed altering the articles and appointing D. chairman. HARMAN, J., held that as from June 30, 1938, the plaintiff was not entitled to act as chairman of the company. On Mar. 15, 1949, the directors resolved: "The directors after discussion, decided to relieve

C Mr. Read [the plaintiff] of his position as managing director of the company and to give him two months' leave on full pay." They then purported to appoint S. managing director as from Mar. 16, 1949. The plaintiff did not agree that he could be relieved of his position in that manner, but he was in bad health and agreed to take leave for two months. On May 11, 1949, when the plaintiff returned from leave, a further directors' meeting was held, and

D it was resolved that "Mr. Read's employment be terminated as and from May 13, 1949, and the secretary was instructed to send him one month's (sic) notice so determining his employment." In fact, the company paid him for four months thereafter. On Sept. 28, 1949, an extraordinary general meeting of the company was held and a resolution approving the action of the directors in removing the plaintiff was passed on a poll vote by the necessary majority.

E HARMAN, J., further held that the plaintiff's claim to be managing director failed. On the question of wrongful dismissal the relevant article, art. 68, is set out in the headnote.

H. J. Brown for the plaintiff.

Bradburn for the defendant.

F HARMAN, J. (having stated the facts and reached the conclusions stated above): There remains the question whether the plaintiff is entitled to damages for wrongful dismissal. He was dismissed by this resolution of the company out of hand. The plaintiff says that that was a breach of contract because a director who is appointed, as he was, in general terms and without limitation of time, is entitled to reasonable notice. In my judgment, it is right to say that as between

G the plaintiff and the board he was entitled to reasonable notice. I think that under art. 68 of Table "A", the board, although there is no reference to their having a power to revoke an appointment, must have the right to enter into an agreement with a director or appoint a managing director for a fixed term subject to six months' notice or whatever it may be, or to appoint him generally, and, if generally, then the ordinary rule will be applied that reasonable notice

H on either side is necessary to put an end to that relationship. Counsel for the plaintiff very cogently argued that, that being so, it was not open to the company in general meeting by a resolution to do that which the board could not do, viz., dismiss a managing director out of hand. The answer to that, I think, is not very easy. Article 68 provides that his appointment "shall be subject to determination ipso facto if he ceases from any cause to be a director". That, apparently, is literally any cause, e.g., if the company does not re-elect him, or if he becomes bankrupt. But the article goes on:

" . . . or if the company in general meeting resolve that his tenure of the office of managing director or manager be determined."

The company could validly exercise that power as between itself and the managing director. It does not necessarily follow that that would not be a course which would give him a right to damages, and that, I think, is shown, if it is necessary to show it, by the judgment of LINDLEY, M.R., in Allen v. Gold Reefs of West Africa, Ltd. (1).

It is difficult to find any direct authority for this matter. The nearest case, I think, is Nelson v. Nelson (James) & Sons, Ltd. (2) where the facts were quite different because, for one thing, there was a special article expressly empowering the board to revoke a managing director's appointment and not a Table "A" article, and for another thing (to quote the headnote)

"The board appointed the plaintiff to be managing director upon the terms of an agreement which provided that he should hold the office so long as he should remain a director of the company and retain his due qualification and efficiently perform the duties of the office."

The board subsequently revoked that appointment, relying on their express power to revoke. LORD READING, C.J., said ([1914] 2 K.B. 776) that one must read that power to revoke as subject to the contract which had been made, and the contract, he said, was for a term of years, and the power to revoke only gave the directors

"power to take away that which they have given provided that they have not bound themselves to give it for any period of time."

He said that that was an appointment for a period of time and could not by the exercise of a power of revocation be altered. SWINFEN EADY, L.J., however, does deal with Table "A". He says (ibid.):

"The articles may give a power to the directors to appoint one of their number to be managing director, but no power to revoke or cancel the appointment. The company may keep that power in its own hands to be exercised in general meeting."

That is the position under Table "A" in the Companies Act, 1908, which is the same for this purpose as the Act of 1929. He goes on (ibid.):

"With an article in that form it is manifest that the directors can only appoint a managing director subject to the right of the company in general meeting to resolve at any time that his tenure of the office of managing director is to be determined."

These observations are obiter, but, nevertheless, they are germane to the matter in question.

In Southern Foundries (1926), Ltd. v. Shirlaw (3) there was a division both in the House of Lords and in the Court of Appeal. The majority held that there was a breach of contract if a company which had appointed a managing director for ten years allowed its articles to be so altered that a power to remove was imported. I do not think, in view of the unfortunate differences of opinion which made themselves plain, that that case helps very much.

It seems to me that I ought to apply the observations of SWINFEN EADY, L.J., in the Nelson case (2). The article does, after all, say quite clearly that the appointment is "subject to determination ipso facto if the company resolve" that that be so. So, everybody who becomes a managing director of this company which has adopted Table "A" knows that he has certain rights, and that the board cannot alter them. It may be that the company cannot, by altering its articles, give them power to do that. That would seem to be so from the majority decision in the House of Lords in Southern Foundries (1926), Ltd. v. Shirlaw (3). But that does not, it seems to me, forbid, as being a breach of contract, the company itself (having power to dismiss) to exercise that power, because every contract which is entered into with the company must on the face of it be subject to that chance. In my judgment, therefore, the company was entitled to dismiss the director out of hand and not to give him any notice. That being so, he is not in a position to claim damages for wrongful dismissal.

ACTION for damages for assault and battery against the first defendant and for negligence and breach of duty against the second defendant.

The first defendant was born on May 16, 1927, and on or about Aug. 29, 1945, his brother applied for an "urgency order" for his reception as a private patient in a mental hospital. The application was supported by a medical certificate of a Dr. Macauley, and on Sept. 5, 1945, a justice of the peace for the county borough of Northampton authorised a mental hospital at Northampton to receive him as a patient. The order was supported by medical certificates of Dr. Macauley and Dr. Bull the contents of which were admitted in evidence. Dr. Macauley said that the reasons which made it expedient to place the defendant under care and treatment were:

"He is irresponsible, unfit to look after himself properly, violent towards his mother. She is frightened to have him in the house. There is nobody who has any influence over him."

It was said further that he deserted from the Army because he did not like it, that he was lacking in the normal attitude towards life, that he had heard voices speaking to him when nobody was present, and that he admitted to homosexual tendencies and to having no desire to be different. It subsequently transpired that the reception order was invalid because at the time of the application the brother was under twenty-one years of age and on Oct. 6, 1945, the defendant left the mental hospital. His mother, the second defendant, signed an authority to discharge him and an undertaking to be responsible for his proper care and treatment. On June 17, 1949, he took a room at a hotel at Brighton, of which the plaintiff was manager. On June 22 he violently attacked the plaintiff while he was in conversation with a Mr. Jackling, who contemplated taking a room at the hotel, striking him on the head with a blunt implement and turning on Mr. Jackling when he sought to come to the plaintiff's assistance. When Mr. Jackling picked up a chair the defendant ran away, pursued by the hall porter at whom he threw the implement. He was subsequently found by the police at Southampton and was handed over to the Brighton police. On a charge of criminal assault on the plaintiff at Lewes Assizes on July 14, 1949, on the evidence of two doctors he was found unfit to plead to the indictment and was directed to be detained to await His Majesty's pleasure. For the first defendant it was contended that he was not liable for damages because at the time of the commission of the assault and battery he did not know the nature and quality of the act or that what he was doing was wrong. The plaintiff's case against the second defendant was that she knew that the first defendant was of unsound mind and liable to have outbreaks of violence and to attack people without provocation and to be dangerous, that when she reserved the room at the hotel for the first defendant it was her duty to warn the plaintiff as the manager of the hotel accordingly and that she had been negligent in failing to do so.

STABLE, J.: The chief problem which this case raises can be compendiously, though not very accurately, formulated as: What degree of mental illness, if any, can constitute a defence to an action in tort, and in what circumstances? LORD ELDON, L.C. (Anon. (1)), said that whether a lunatic could be made a bankrupt was an open question. LINDLEY, L.J., when confronted with the same problem, left it open: Re Farnham (2). So far as I know, it has never been decided, but for the most part the bankruptcy cases fall under one or other of two heads, viz., (i) those where the lunatic has been so adjudged and his property has been put under the control of the court in lunacy and a conflict as to the administration of the assets has arisen between the court in lunacy and the court in bankruptcy, and (ii) cases which raised the question whether, e.g., a lunatic whose estate was being administered by the court could be said to have committed an act of bankruptcy by non-compliance with a bankruptcy notice in failing to pay a judgment debt inasmuch as the purse strings had been taken out of his hands and were in the control of the court. In the present case we are not considering the quasi-status of a lunatic, i.e., the status of a man who by due process of law has been certified as unfit to be at large and incapable of controlling his own affairs. We are dealing with the case of a man who at the material time was mentally ill.

[HIS LORDSHIP stated the facts and found as facts that the defendant was not in a condition of automatism or trance at the time of the attack on the plaintiff, but that his mind directed the blows he struck, and that at the material time he was a catatonic schizophrenic and a certifiable lunatic who knew the nature and quality of his act, but whose incapacity of reason arising from the disease of his mind was of so grave a character that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong. He continued:] Counsel for the defendant has contended that that concludes the case. He submits that the test of civil responsibility is the application of the rules in M'Naghten's Case (3) and that, since my finding as to his mental state would absolve him from responsibility if this were a criminal charge tried on indictment, applying the same yardstick, he is equally absolved from liability in a civil court. White v. White (4) has been cited as an authority

A binding me to hold that the M'Naghten rules are the only test, whether in a civil or a criminal court, where the responsibility of a mentally sick person is in question. In my view, that is not the law. I do not think that White v. White (4) supports that proposition, nor do I think that it ever presented itself to the minds of the lords justices when they were dealing with that case. It cannot be suggested that the M'Naghten rules are the appropriate test when the question is

B one of testamentary capacity. In determining whether a contract is binding on a person who was mentally sick at the time it was made, the consideration whether he had a capacity to recognise that what he was doing was wrong seems to me to be wholly inapt. The ethical propriety of making a particular contract hardly comes into the matter. White v. White (4) was a divorce case in which there was an allegation of cruelty, and the spouse against whom the allegation was

C made was of unsound mind. The lords justices were unanimous in coming to the conclusion that cruelty had been proved, but DENNING, L.J., expressed the view ([1949] 2 All E.R. 350-352) that, provided the series of acts relied on as amounting to cruelty were acts which would have been cruel if the person responsible had been sane and that they had had a deleterious effect on the other spouse's health, it was immaterial whether the person doing the acts was of

D sound or unsound mind. BUCKNILL, L.J. (ibid., 344-347), certainly did not indicate his assent to that view, and ASQUITH, L.J. (ibid., 347), dissented from it. Counsel for the defendant urged that certain passages in ASQUITH, L.J.'s judgment laid down the principle that in every case the M'Naghten rules must be applied. I do not accept that view.

I do not think I need discuss the question referred to in argument—whether

E the trend of our law is in the direction of culpability or compensation. Conflicting views on that matter have been expressed in various judgments: see White v. White (4), per DENNING, L.J. (ibid., 350-352), as contrasted with Read v. J. Lyons & Co., Ltd. (5) per LORD MACMILLAN ([1946] 2 All E.R. 476) and per LORD SIMONDS (ibid., 481-482). I think it is sufficient if I examine the essential facts which must be proved to establish the cause of action on which the plaintiff

F relies. Counsel for the plaintiff says in effect that where the action is an action of trespass in the highly technical sense, no averment either of negligence or intention is essential to support it. Counsel for the defendant, on the contrary, argues that, whatever the position may have been 150 or two hundred years ago, the whole trend of modern decisions is that in an action, whether it be founded on trespass or on case, negligence or intention must be averred. I cannot

G think that, if a person of unsound mind converts my property under a delusion that he is entitled to do it or that it was not property at all, that affords a defence. I can bring an action against him for the recovery of my property, or, if it has been converted and destroyed, for its value. Against that it may be said: "There all you are seeking is restitution, either the return of your property or the equivalent. In this case what is being asked for is damages, which is compensation and

H involves in a sense some punitive element". On the whole, I accept the view that an intention—i.e., a voluntary act, the mind prompting and directing the act which is relied on, as in this case, as the tortious act—must be averred and proved. For example, I think that, if a person in a condition of complete automatism inflicted grievous injury, that would not be actionable. In the same way, if a sleepwalker inadvertently, without intention or without carelessness, broke a valuable vase, that would not be actionable. I agree that there is much force in the contention that, in those cases where it has been held that an intention must be averred and proved, the act in itself was a legitimate piece of behaviour: e.g., in Stanley v. Powell (6), where a man shooting pheasants shot the beater, and Holmes v. Mather (7) where the defendant was being driven in his carriage along a highway when the horse bolted. Those cases may well be different from the present matter where the act complained of was a trespass, as direct an act of violence as possible. The injuries were not the indirect result of a legitimate activity gone wrong, but were the direct result of illegal behaviour, which was wrongful from the beginning and could not conceivably be anything else. The distinction may be succinctly stated as being between conduct tortious in its very essence and conduct innocent in itself, but becoming tortious by the addition of some ingredient such as intention, heedlessness, or malice. But though the argument is extremely attractive, I must hold that an intention to do the thing complained of must be alleged and proved.

The latest authority on this question is National Coal Board v. J. E. Evans & Co. (Cardiff), Ltd. (8). It may be said that in that case the Court of Appeal were dealing with an act that was perfectly innocent and legitimate in itself and only became actionable, if at all, because inadvertently it resulted in injury to the plaintiffs' property. It is possible that, if that court had been confronted, as I am, with an activity of a wholly different character, viz., a violent assault and battery on a harmless man, they would have held that a different principle applied and that such considerations as intention and conception of right and wrong were wholly immaterial, the act of trespass being all that was required to support the cause of action. The matter is by no means free from doubt, but I think I ought to apply that decision, which is in accordance with my own view of the law though it is not directly in point. It appears that DENNING, L.J., does not agree with that aspect of the law: see White v. White (4) ([1949] 2 All E.R. 351). It is a matter of controversy. There is no authority directly in point, but I venture to think the weight of the dicta on the subject and the trend of authority point to the conclusion I have reached.

The next matter to consider is whether, granted that the defendant knew the nature and quality of his act, it is a defence in this action that, owing to mental infirmity, he was incapable of knowing that his act was wrong. If the basis of liability be that it depends, not on the injury to the victim, but on the culpability of the wrongdoer, there is considerable force in the argument that it is, but I have come to the conclusion that knowledge of wrongdoing is an immaterial averment, and that, where there is the capacity to know the nature and quality of the act, that is sufficient although the mind directing the hand that did the wrong was diseased. I am fortified in that view by the decision in Asile v. Asile (9). That was a divorce case, in which cruelty was alleged, and HENN COLLINS, J., allowed the answer to be amended by inserting the plea that the respondent was of unsound mind and did not know the nature and quality of the act he was committing, but nothing was said about inserting in the amended pleading the other branch of the M'Naghten rules, that he did not know that what he was doing was wrong. In the result, HENN COLLINS, J., allowed the decree on the ground that cruelty during a lucid interval had been proved. He held that acts otherwise amounting to cruelty, if done by a person of unsound mind who did not know the nature and quality of what he was doing, did not constitute a matrimonial offence.

HIS LORDSHIP assessed the damages at £341 11s. 1d. special damages and £5,500 general damages and gave judgment for the plaintiff for those amounts. He held there was no evidence to support the action against the second defendant and gave judgment for her against the plaintiff.

ANOTHER.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Singleton, Birkett and Morris, L.J.J.), March 6, 7, 1952.]

Agriculture—Agricultural holding—Claim by landlord for compensation for breach of covenant—Jurisdiction of court to entertain—Notice to quit given before Mar. 1, 1948—Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948 (c. 63), s. 57 (3), s. 70 (1) (b), s. 99.

On Dec. 16, 1947, the landlord of an agricultural holding gave the tenants a valid notice to quit expiring at Michaelmas, 1949. On June 9, 1950, the tenants being still in possession, he issued a writ claiming possession and damages for breaches of covenant to repair. On the issue of damages for breach of covenant, the tenants contended that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the landlord's claim and that that matter must be referred to arbitration in accordance with s. 70 (1) (b) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948.

HELD: (i) the claim was not one for compensation under s. 57 (3) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and, accordingly, it was not a claim arising on or out of the termination of the tenancy within the meaning of s. 70 (1) (b) of the Act, so that the provisions of s. 70 (1) requiring a claim to be referred to arbitration did not apply.

(ii) the notice to quit being valid, the tenants were to be regarded as having quitted the holding after the commencement of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, in pursuance of a notice to quit given before Mar. 1, 1948, within the meaning of s. 99 of the Act, and, accordingly, the provisions of the Act relating to the rights of landlords, tenants and occupiers (which included the provisions of s. 70 relating to arbitration) did not apply.

Decision of BARRY, J. (ante, p. 97), affirmed.

FOR THE AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS ACT, 1948, s. 57 (3), s. 70 (1), and s. 99, see HALSBURY'S STATUTES, Second Edn., Vol. 28, pp. 72, 80 and 97.

Case referred to:

(1) Preston v. Norfolk County Council, [1947] 2 All E.R. 124; [1947] K.B. 775; [1947] L.J.R. 1301; 177 L.T. 390; 2nd Digest Supp.

APPEAL by the tenants from an order of BARRY, J., made on Dec. 12, 1951, and reported ante, p. 97.

The landlord claimed possession of an agricultural holding by virtue of a notice to quit, and damages for breaches of covenant to repair. The tenants contended that the notice to quit was bad, and that the court had no jurisdiction to entertain the claim for damages which must be referred to arbitration under s. 70 (1) of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948. BARRY, J., held that the notice to quit was good, and that, by virtue of s. 99 of the Act, the claim for damages was not one which had to be referred to arbitration under the Act. The tenants appealed on the issue whether the claim for damages had to be referred to arbitration.

Laskey for the landlord.

SINGLETON, L.J.: The plaintiff (the landlord) in this action, Mr. Charles Gulliver, is the owner of Great Worsham Farm, Bexhill-on-Sea, and the defendants (the tenants) are administrators of the estate of Ethel May Catt, deceased, who was tenant of the farm under an agreement dated Oct. 15, 1947. It was an agricultural holding in respect of which the rent was £200 a year. On Dec. 16, 1947, notice to quit the farm was given by the landlord, and that notice, according to its tenor, expired at Michaelmas, 1949. On Mar. 1, 1948, Part III of the Agriculture Act, 1947, came into force. For all practical purposes the provisions of that Act are the same as the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, which came into force on July 30, 1948. On June 9, 1950, the writ in this action was issued, the tenants being still in possession at that date. Indeed, they remained in possession until two days ago. BARRY, J., decided that the notice to quit was good. Before this court the question whether or not the notice to quit was good was not contested. The only question argued was whether or not the landlord was entitled to bring an action in respect of his claim for damages for breaches of covenant. The tenants contended that under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and the earlier Acts relating to this subject that was not a matter in respect of which the landlord could sue in the courts.

Section 70 (1) of the Act of 1948 is in these terms:

"Without prejudice to any other provision of this Act, any claim of whatever nature by the tenant or landlord of an agricultural holding against his landlord or tenant, being a claim which arises—(a) under this Act or any custom or agreement; and (b) on or out of the termination of the tenancy of the holding or part thereof, shall, subject to the provisions of this section, be determined by arbitration under this Act."

Counsel for the tenants submitted that the claim of the landlord came under that sub-section, that it was a claim for damages under an agreement, and that it arose on the termination of the tenancy. He did not claim that it arose out of the termination of the tenancy. His claim that it arose on the termination of the tenancy was based on his submission on s. 57 of the Act which provides:

"(1) The landlord of an agricultural holding shall be entitled to recover from a tenant of the holding, on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy, compensation in respect of the dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, any part of the holding or anything in or on the holding caused by non-fulfilment by the tenant of his responsibilities to farm in accordance with the rules of good husbandry. (2) The amount of the compensation payable under the foregoing sub-section shall be the cost, as at the date of the tenant's quitting the holding, of making good the dilapidation, deterioration or damage."

Counsel for the tenants places reliance on s. 57 (3) which provides:

"Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the landlord may, in lieu of claiming compensation under sub-s. (1) of this section, claim compensation in respect of matters specified therein under and in accordance with a written contract of tenancy, so however that—(a) compensation shall be so claimed only on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy; and (b) compensation shall not be claimed in respect of any one holding both under such a contract and under the said sub-s. (1); and for the purposes of para. (b) of this sub-section any claim under s. 7 (1) of this Act shall be disregarded."

It is to be observed that throughout s. 57 the words "quitting the holding" appear.

Counsel for the tenants submits that, if a tenancy agreement contains covenants such as those sued on in this case and if there be breaches of those covenants which give rise to dilapidation, deterioration, or damage, it is open to the landlord, instead of claiming under those covenants, to claim compensation under the provisions of s. 57 (3). I draw attention to the words in s. 57 (3) "the landlord may, in lieu of claiming compensation under sub-s. (1) . . ." Prima facie, if a tenancy agreement contains covenants of the kind I have mentioned and there is breach of them with dilapidation, deterioration, or damage resulting the landlord might have a claim under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, and also a claim for damages for breach of covenant. Counsel for the tenants submits that they are both brought into one by s. 57 (3), and that the claims which are made in this case ought to be regarded as within s. 57 (3), and, consequently, to be dealt with by arbitration under the Act. Counsel for the landlord asks the court to look at the words "the landlord may, in lieu of claiming compensation under sub-s. (1) . . . claim . . . in respect of" the breaches so far as the breaches also are matters under sub-s. (1). The landlord is given an option, he submits, and, if he exercises that option so as to claim under s. 57 (1), he can only claim compensation on the tenant quitting the holding, but there is nothing in s. 57 to show that the landlord must take that course, particularly if the claim arises in the middle of the tenancy. Counsel added that, if it is desired to show that the rights of any person to resort to the Queen's courts are taken away, it must be shown by clear language, from which he argued that the option given to the landlord by s. 57 (3) does not have that effect. Counsel for the tenants agreed that, unless he could bring this claim, within s. 57 (3), s. 70 would not apply.

The covenants numbered 3, 4 and 5 in the tenancy agreement are:

"3. During the said term to keep in proper repair as farm road so much of the road adjoining the said farm as the outgoing tenant has been liable to repair. 4. To keep and leave the house, farm buildings and cottages and all other parts of the said farm and premises in a state of good tenantable repair on being found the necessary materials by the landlord within a distance of five miles, but she shall not be called upon to leave the house, cottages and buildings in a better state than at entry, as evidenced by the record to be attached hereto. 5. To keep the hedges properly made and the ditches and watercourses properly cleaned and scoured, the landlord finding the necessary stakes and wires."

Of the breaches of those covenants alleged in the statement of claim and the particulars a considerable number of the items relate to the house and more to the land, hedges and the like. The claim is made by the landlord for breaches of covenant in the tenancy agreement, and it may well be that, if such a claim came forward when the tenants quitted the holding, the landlord could, if he liked, have treated it in the way envisaged as possible by s. 57 (3), but the landlord has said that he did not want to do so. Counsel for the landlord pointed out that some part of the items might be within sub-s. (1) and so included, but not all. The landlord's case is that he is claiming under an agreement of which there have been breaches.

Counsel for the tenants submitted that under s. 57 (3) this claim arose on the termination of the tenancy, and, therefore, was within s. 70 (1) (b). I am not satisfied that it did. Section 70 (1) (b) deals with a claim arising on or out of the termination of the tenancy of the holding or part thereof, and s. 57 throughout is dealing with a position which arises on the tenant quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy—a different proposition. The whole of s. 57, indeed, presupposes the tenant quitting the holding. At the time that the answer of the tenants in the present case was set up they had not quitted the holding. They were still on the holding, and the landlord could not get compensation under s. 57 until they quitted it. Is it open to the tenants to say: "We are not going. We are staying here as long as we like. We are not going to pay you the damages which you claim, because the claim ought to be regarded as compensation claimed under s. 57, and we are not going to pay you compensation under s. 57, because we have not quitted the holding"? It does not sound to me to make sense. I do not think that s. 57 (3) applies to bring the tenants within s. 70 of the Act.

BARRY, J., did not express any final view on that part of the case. He dealt with it under s. 99 of the Act. That is a long section, and the submission made on behalf of the landlord is that, even if it could be said that his claim in this case fell under s. 70 of the Act, it is taken out of it again by s. 99 which provides:

"In a case where the tenant of an agricultural holding has quitted the holding before the commencement of this Act, or quits it after the commencement of this Act in consequence of a notice to quit given (whether by him or his landlord) before Mar. 1, 1948 . . . the provisions of this Act, so far as relating to the rights of landlords, tenants and occupiers to compensation . . . shall not apply, and in lieu thereof the enactments specified in sched. VIII to this Act, so far as relating to the matters aforesaid, shall continue to apply and shall accordingly be excepted from the operation of the last foregoing section."

It is not necessary that I should enumerate the enactments specified in sched. VIII to the Act, for counsel for the tenant agrees that, if s. 99 applies to this case, he is out of court and is thrown back on the provisions of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1923. I do not mention the Agriculture Act, 1947, because for this purpose it was the same as the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948.

Counsel for the tenants submitted that s. 99 could not apply because of the words "has quitted the holding", or "quits it after the commencement of this Act in consequence of a notice to quit given before Mar. 1, 1948." He said that could not apply, because (a) his clients had not quitted before the commencement of the Act; and (b) they had not quitted on the date of the hearing. As I have already said, the quitting of the holding by the tenant in s. 57 is something which must occur before the landlord can get his compensation, but when one finds this submission made by counsel for the tenants one is forced to ask oneself what is the position of tenants who say: "I cannot have that section used against me, because I had not quitted on the day of trial. True, I ought to have done. True, I got a notice, and the judge has held that to be a good notice. I ought to have been out eighteen months ago, but here I still am." That, to my mind, is not a very sound argument. It is blowing hot and blowing cold, or, to put it another way, seeking to take advantage of their own (I will not say wrong) failure to act on a good notice. That submission was really not pressed, but, if I may go further into the matter, it is agreed by everyone that on the authorities, if a tenant is given a notice to quit and that is subsequently held by the court to be a good notice and on the order of the court the tenant goes out, the tenant goes out in consequence of the notice to quit. The tenants have now gone out, and they have gone out in consequence of a notice to quit. The notice to quit was given on Dec. 16, 1947—that is, before Mar. 1, 1948, the date when Part III of the Act of 1947 came into operation. Thereupon it is said that the provisions of this Act, so far as relate to the rights of the landlord to compensation, shall not apply. Counsel for the tenants submitted that those words "the rights of the landlords, tenants and occupiers to compensation" did not cover this case. I do not know why. If reference is made to the section on which counsel for the tenants places reliance, s. 57 of the Act of 1948, that section gives a right to the landlord, on the tenant's quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy, to compensation in respect of dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, any part of the holding. The words in s. 57 (3) on which counsel for the tenants relies as bringing him under s. 70, are:

"Notwithstanding anything in this Act, the landlord may, in lieu of claiming compensation under sub-s. (1) . . . claim compensation in respect of matters specified therein under and in accordance with a written contract of tenancy . . ."

If, then, there be in regard to matters included in the covenant which are within s. 57 (1) breaches giving the landlord a right to recover compensation on the tenant quitting the holding on the termination of tenancy by reason of s. 57 (3), they appear to me to be within s. 99, while, if there are other matters entirely outside any right to compensation, no question under the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, arises. There may be some items not within s. 57 (1) at all. Those would not be matters for compensation under s. 57 (3), but, if there were claims of the nature covered by s. 57 (1) which the landlord could, if he liked, cause to be dealt with under s. 57 (3), those matters, I should say, come within the words of s. 99:

“ . . . the provisions of this Act, so far as relating to the rights of landlords, tenants and occupiers to compensation . . . shall not apply . . . ”

A That was the view of BARRY, J., and it is the view I take. Even if I should be wrong in what I have said with regard to s. 57, I think that s. 99 is wide enough to take this case out of the provisions of the Act, including s. 57. For these reasons, I think that this appeal ought to be dismissed.

B BIRKETT, L.J.: I am of the same opinion. The question to be determined by the court may be put in this way: Has access to the Queen's courts been taken away from the landlord in the circumstances of this case? I observe that in the preface to JACKSON'S AGRICULTURAL HOLDINGS AND TENANT RIGHT VALUATION, 10th ed., there are the following words:

“ It is also to be noted that access to the King's courts has, with a few exceptions, been taken away from both landlord and tenant of an agricultural holding.”

C On p. 178 he deals with s. 57, and at the bottom of that page he says:

“ . . . but now by s. 70 any claim of whatever nature which arises on or out of the termination of a tenancy must be determined by arbitration under the Act.”

Finally, at p. 193, he says with regard to s. 70:

D “ These opening words must be borne in mind in determining the meaning and effect of this section which only deals with claims between landlord and tenant on the termination of the tenancy. During the currency of the tenancy the landlord and tenant may still have freedom to have their differences determined in an action in a court of law unless the Act directs that the difference shall be settled by arbitration.”

E As I understand the argument of counsel for the tenants, he admitted that it was essential for him, if he were to succeed, to show that this claim arose on or out of the termination of the tenancy. He, therefore, relied on s. 57 (3) of the Act of 1948, or the appropriate section of the Act of 1947, to show that the claim in lieu of compensation mentioned in s. 57 (1) was by that sub-section postponed until the termination of the tenancy, and, that being so, he could
F invoke s. 70 (1) and say that the claim arose on or out of the termination of the tenancy. SINGLETON, L.J., has dealt with that, and BARRY, J., who stated the matter plainly in the court below, said:

“ I am relieved from the duty of dealing with it, because I think there is another point which makes ss. 57 and 70 quite inapplicable to the present case, and that is s. 99.”

G So the real point there is whether this claim can properly come within the word “ rights ” in the expression “ rights of landlords, tenants and occupiers to compensation ” in s. 99. Counsel for the landlord said that under s. 57 (3), they were rights under the Act, and I agree with the learned judge. In his judgment he set out the argument which counsel for the tenants summarised
H for us in this court this morning (ante, 99):

“ The tenants' arguments can be quite shortly stated. Section 57 (1) of the Act of 1948, which, in matters material to this case, is similar in terms to s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1947, provides that a claim by a landlord for compensation under and in accordance with a written contract of tenancy in respect of the dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, the holding may only be made on the tenant quitting the holding on the termination of the tenancy. The tenants say that the present claim is a claim for compensation or damages in respect of the dilapidation or deterioration of, or damage to, the holding, and thus falls within the provisions of one or other of those sections. The claim cannot, therefore, be made until the tenant quits the holding—i.e., until the termination of the tenancy—and, for this reason says counsel, it becomes a claim which arises on or out of the termination of the tenancy.”

When the learned judge deals with s. 99 he says (ante, 100):

“The present claim was brought after the notice to quit had expired, but the operative word in the Acts is not ‘bring’, but ‘arise’, and I am satisfied that this claim is not one which arises on or out of the termination of the tenancy. Indeed, as I understand it, counsel for the tenants did not seek to establish that it was, except by invoking the aid of the express words of s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1947, or s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1948, neither of which, to my mind, is applicable to the present claim. Can the tenants obtain assistance from any of the other sections of the Acts of 1947 or 1948 on which counsel relied? I do not think they can.”

Then the learned judge goes on to consider s. 70, and he says (ante, 101):

“Section 70 (1) of the Act of 1948 is, I think, a provision ‘relating to the rights of landlords, tenants and occupiers to compensation’ [and] ‘the payment and recovery of compensation’ within the meaning of s. 99; that is a section relating to the settlement of claims and, I think, relates to the ‘recovery of compensation’. If I am right in this view, the Act of 1948 can be wholly disregarded and one must turn to the Act of 1947.”

The learned judge discusses that matter and continues in this way (ibid.):

“I have already indicated that without the aid of s. 29 (1) of the Act of 1947, or s. 57 (1) of the Act of 1948, the landlord’s present claim cannot be said to fall within this category. Thus, in my judgment, the landlord is entitled to pursue his claim for damages for breach of covenant in the ordinary courts”.

I think, with great respect to the argument of counsel for the tenants here today, that the finding of the learned judge about that matter and his construction of the section were right. I, too, agree that, having regard to the wording of s. 99, this appeal fails and should be dismissed.

MORRIS, L.J.: I also agree. On a determination of the issues which were raised before him the learned judge by his order directed that the tenants should give up possession. Obedience to the order of the court would bring about the result that the tenant would have quitted after the commencement of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, within the words of s. 99 of that Act. Following the decision of this court in Preston v. Norfolk County Council (1), the tenant would have quitted in consequence of a notice to quit. That notice to quit was admittedly given before Mar. 1, 1948. The opening words of s. 99 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948, would, therefore, be satisfied, namely:

“In a case where the tenant of an agricultural holding has quitted the holding before the commencement of this Act, or quits it after the commencement of this Act in consequence of a notice to quit given . . . before Mar. 1, 1948 . . .”

The result, therefore, once those opening words are satisfied, is that certain provisions of the Act, including, among others, those relating to the rights to compensation of landlords, tenants, and occupiers, are not to apply.

In my judgment, s. 57 of the Act of 1948 is one of the sections covered by those words, and the result of that is that there is an exclusion of s. 57 and s. 70 cannot be relied on by counsel for the tenants, for he relies on the applicability of s. 57 (3) to bring s. 70 into operation in this case. When the provisions of s. 99 have effect, the matter is to be dealt with on the basis of the enactments specified in sched. VIII. On that basis counsel for the tenants does not submit that his contention can prevail. The learned judge was entitled, in my judgment, when he ordered possession, to deal with the remaining claims in the action, including the claim for damages, on the footing that his order for possession was correct and would be obeyed. He was entitled to say that, by his adjudication, he made s. 99 applicable. Para. 9 of the defence in the action reads:

“Further, or in the further alternative, the tenants will rely on s. 70 of the Agricultural Holdings Act, 1948.”

When dealing with that matter, the learned judge was entitled to do so on the basis of the decision at which he was arriving, which decision brought into operation s. 99 of the Act, with the result that the provisions of s. 70 would not avail the tenants. I do not propose to say anything further with regard to s. 57 beyond saying that I am in agreement with the way in which the matter has been dealt with by SINGLETON and BIRKETT, L.JJ. I am not satisfied that the claims that were put forward in this action were claims that could be described as being in lieu of claims for compensation under s. 57 (1). If they could not be so described, they were not within s. 57 (3).

Appeal dismissed.

NORRIS v. SYNDI MANUFACTURING CO., LTD.

[COURT OF APPEAL (Somervell, Denning and Romer, L.JJ.), March 6, 7, 21, 1952.]

Factory—Dangerous machinery—Safety guard not kept in position by workman—“Provision” of guard—Workman not instructed to use guard—Factories Act, 1937 (c. 67), s. 16, s. 119 (1).

The plaintiff, a tool setter employed by the defendants in their factory, having, while making adjustments, removed from a power press the guard which had been fitted by the defendants, failed to replace the guard when testing the press in motion and suffered injury. When first instructed on how to test the press by the defendants, the plaintiff had not been told to keep the guard in position and the defendants were aware that he carried out tests with the guard not in position.

HELD: in having had a guard fitted to the press the defendants had “provided” a safety appliance within the meaning of s. 119 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, although they might not have intended the plaintiff to use it; under s. 119 (1) the plaintiff was under a duty to use the guard, and under s. 16 of the Act he was under a duty to keep it in position while the parts required to be safeguarded were in motion; and, therefore, he was in breach of his statutory duties under those sections.

APPEAL by the plaintiff from an order of DEVLIN, J., dated Dec. 14, 1951.

The plaintiff, who was at all material times employed in the defendants' factory as a tool setter, was injured while testing a power press from which he had removed the guard. In an action by him against the defendants in which he claimed damages for breach of their duty under the Factories Act, 1937, to fence and keep fenced the press and also of their duty at common law to provide a safe system of work, DEVLIN, J., held that the defendants were liable for a breach of their duty under s. 14 (1) and s. 16 of the Act and of their common law duty. He held that the plaintiff had not committed a breach of s. 119 (1) of the Act, and was not guilty of contributory negligence, and awarded him £1,500 damages. On appeal, the defendants, while not disputing their liability, contended that the plaintiff was guilty of a breach of s. 119 (1), and of contributory negligence.

Cur. adv. vult.

Mar. 21. The following judgments were read.

SOMERVELL, L.J.: This is an action for damages for personal injuries based on an alleged breach by the defendants, the plaintiff's employers, of s. 14 (1) or s. 16 of the Factories Act, 1937, and of their common law duty. The defendants denied liability, and, alternatively, alleged that the plaintiff was guilty of a breach of s. 119 (1) of the Act and of contributory negligence. Before the learned judge it became clear, subject to a defence of "delegation" which failed, that the defendants were liable under the Act. The learned judge also regarded them as having failed to provide a safe system of work. The learned judge found that the plaintiff had not committed a breach of s. 119 (1) and was not guilty of contributory negligence. He assessed the damages at £1,500. The defendants appeal and take three points. Counsel on their behalf submits (i) the damages are excessive, (ii) the plaintiff committed a breach of s. 119, (iii) the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence. I will consider (ii) and (iii) first.

The plaintiff worked for the defendants as a tool setter. The defendants had a number of power presses and it was at one of these that the accident happened. In its normal operation metal strips are fed successively by the operator into the press. Pressure on a foot pedal causes the press to descend by electrical power, stamping the strip of metal into the required shape. It is not disputed that the machine has to be securely fenced under s. 14 (1) of the Act, and the fencing maintained and kept in position under s. 16, subject to the exception under the latter section that it may be removed for adjustment. The press had a proper guard or fencing. The plaintiff's work was to adjust and set the machine when this was required. To do this, admittedly, the fencing had to be removed. To test whether the setting had been properly done it was necessary to take one or more sample pressings. It was when engaged on taking such a sample pressing, the fencing or guard not having been replaced, that by some inadvertence the plaintiff pressed the pedal when his hand was within the area of the press and he had to have the top joints of three fingers on his right hand amputated. The replacing and removal of the fencing took some time, about five minutes. As it is sometimes necessary to take a dozen samples this would add an hour to the operation of setting the tools, though it was said that some adjustments could be done, though obviously less conveniently, through the bars of the fencing. It is not disputed that under the Act the fencing should have been in position when the plaintiff was taking samples. The relevant words of s. 119 (1) are as follows:

A " . . . where any means or appliance for securing . . . safety is provided for the use of [a person employed in a factory] under this Act, he shall use the means or appliance."

B The plaintiff entered the defendants' employment in 1946. He then had no previous experience of power presses. He was shown how to set and test the tools by two of the directors. Neither of them replaced the guard while taking samples. He was told to make sure the guard was secure before the ordinary operator used the press. He must frequently have been seen by one of the directors taking samples with the fencing not in position. He was never told expressly not to replace it. I will read the paragraph of the learned judge's judgment in which he construed and applied s. 119 (1):

C "In my judgment, an article is not 'provided' within the meaning of the Acts merely by supplying it and making it available. When the term is considered in the light of the policy of the Acts, I think that the article must be provided in a manner which makes it clear to the workman that he is expected to use it. That will not always involve an express oral direction. The purpose for which an article is supplied may often be too obvious for words. It is not so in this case. When the plaintiff was initiated into the use of the guard he was told to replace it after testing, and before operation was begun. That would convey to him (and the subsequent attitude of the defendants would amply confirm it) that the guard was intended for use in operation only, and that he was not expected to use it for testing. In these circumstances I do not think that the plaintiff broke s. 119 (1) because he did not use the guard for a purpose other than that for which it was provided."

E If the construction is right, I would agree with the conclusion. Counsel for the defendants submits it is wrong, and I have with respect come to that conclusion. The plaintiff here, of course, knew all about the appliance. He would have just removed it. It was at hand and available.

F I will deal with the authorities. In Murray v. Schwachman, Ltd. (1), although there was a fencing or guard on the premises, the plaintiff had been forbidden to use it. It was held that the result was the same as if it had never been provided at all. In Finch v. Telegraph Construction & Maintenance Co., Ltd. (2) the learned judge who tried the present case had to decide whether goggles had been provided under s. 49 of the Act. He accepted evidence that there were goggles in the foreman's office, but he found that the plaintiff did not know where they were. G He held, therefore, that they had not been provided. Neither of these cases, in my opinion, assist the plaintiff here. We were, however, referred to a dictum of DU PARCQ, L.J., in Gibby v. East Grinstead Gas & Water Co. (3), agreed to by the other members of the court, which, undoubtedly, on the face of it supports the learned judge's construction. The deceased had met his death by falling from an unfenced gantry at night. The claim was based on breach of statutory H duty and negligence. The defendants pleaded that the deceased was guilty of a breach of s. 119 (1) and of contributory negligence. The learned judge had found that there was no breach of statutory duty or negligence on the part of the defendants, and that the deceased had been guilty of contributory negligence as well as a breach of s. 119 (1). In the appeal the first judgments were delivered by SCOTT, L.J., and GODDARD, L.J. They dismissed the appeal on the ground that the plaintiff was guilty of contributory negligence, making no reference to s. 119. Assuming, therefore, and on this point the defendants were not called on to argue, that the defendants had been guilty of a breach of statutory duty or negligence, the plaintiff's contributory negligence was at that date an answer to the whole claim. DU PARCQ, L.J., dismissed the appeal on the same ground, but at the beginning of his judgment he dealt with the alleged breach of s. 119. This was because the plaintiff had not used a hurricane lamp. DU PARCQ, L.J., said he was "strongly inclined to disagree" with the judge on that point. He said this ([1944] 1 All E.R. 363):

"I doubt very much whether the deceased, if he had lived, could have been convicted, on the known facts, of an offence under that section. It is not at all clear that the hurricane lamp of which we have heard so much was, within the meaning of that section, provided for the use of this workman, among others, under the Factories Act; and the further difficulty arises that he was not ordered to use it, or ordered to use it at any particular time. It was left to his discretion whether to use it or not."

The learned lord justice went on to express his doubts whether the plaintiff had committed any offence. He then considered contributory negligence, and that is clearly the ratio of his decision. The other members of the court expressed their agreement with what he had said with regard to s. 119 (1). One has to consider the words used in the light of the facts. It seems clear that hurricane lamps were available for this or other purposes. Some of the men who had to go on this gantry at night used their own torches. It may well be that, if one is dealing with an appliance of general use like a lamp, it is not "provided for use" under the Act for any particular operation unless its use is by instructions related to that operation. On this view the words used would have no necessary application to the facts here where the guard was part of the machine being used. If they were intended to be of general application, I find them difficult to reconcile with the words of the Act.

We are dealing here with a case in which the plaintiff knew all about the appliance. He had just removed it and it was at hand and available. Was an order by the defendants to use the guard for the process on which the plaintiff was engaged a condition precedent to liability as suggested? The duty of providing something and the duty of ordering it, if provided, to be used are two different things. If Parliament had intended the giving of an order to be a condition precedent to an offence it would, I think, have said so. I think the words of s. 119 (1) impose an absolute duty once it is established that the appliance was there and available. The plaintiff wanted to save time for his employers. The facts that the directors demonstrated his work to him without the guard and acquiesced in his not using it would be very relevant in considering whether it was a proper case for a prosecution, or whether, if proceedings were brought, any penalty should be imposed. They are also relevant to the question which we have to decide, namely, to what extent are the defendants entitled to say that the plaintiff should bear part of the damages. I cannot, however, find anything in the words of s. 119 (1) which enables it to be said that in the circumstances of this case no offence was committed under that sub-section.

Counsel for the plaintiff argued that an appliance could not be said to be provided for the plaintiff's use when it was indicated to him that he need not use it. I have come to the conclusion that the words "for the use of any such person", followed, as they are, by the words "under this Act" are simply to identify the category of persons within the scope of the section. The guard was "provided" in the ordinary sense of the word and under the Act it was the plaintiff's duty to use it. [HIS LORDSHIP held that the plaintiff had not been guilty of contributory negligence, and that the award of £1,500 damages was not excessive, but that that figure should be reduced to £1,200 by reason of the plaintiff's breach of s. 119 (1), and to that extent the appeal should be allowed.]

DENNING, L.J.: This power press was a dangerous machine which had to be securely fenced. It was provided with a perfectly proper guard, but, in order to comply with the Act, it was absolutely essential that the guard should be kept in position while the press was in motion: see s. 16 and Nash v. High Duty Alloys, Ltd. (4). The question in this case is: Whose duty was it to see that the guard was kept in position? Undoubtedly, it was the duty of the occupiers of the factory, but was it not also the duty of the man who was working the machine? The answer to this question is, I think, that the statute is quite imperative. It requires the guard to be kept in position while the press is in motion: see s. 16. Ignorance of the statute is no excuse either for the occupiers or for the workman. If a guard is provided under the Act for the use of the workman, then he becomes under a statutory duty to use it. It is no defence for him to say that his employers did not insist on his using it. That goes to mitigation, not to exculpation. The learned judge seems to have thought that under s. 119 (1) a means or appliance was not "provided for the use of" the men unless the occupiers intended them to use it. I do not think that is correct. The true interpretation of the second part of s. 119 (1) is, I think, this: The occupier must provide the means or appliance required by the Act. Once he has provided a proper means or appliance in good condition and ready to hand in a proper place, then the workman comes under a duty to use it. This duty on the workman is imposed by the Act, not by the employer. The important thing is the intention of the Act, not the intention of the employer. If the Act intends the man to use it, then use it he must, no matter what the employer thinks about it, nor even what he says or does, so long as he does not actually forbid the man to use it. Acquiescence by an employer may mitigate the man's offence, but cannot absolve him of his duty.

We were reminded in this case that the Factories Act, 1937, creates criminal offences and that any ambiguity should be resolved in favour of the accused. I find it more helpful, however, to remember that the Act is intended to prevent accidents to workmen, and I think it should be construed so as to further that end: see what LORD PORTER said ([1951] 1 All E.R. 1107) in Harrison v. National Coal Board (5) which I quoted in McCarthy v. Coldair, Ltd. (6). It would, I think, be unfortunate if little or no responsibility were to be placed on the workmen themselves. Once a proper guard is provided, then the men are just as responsible as the occupier for seeing that it is used. All the various regulations under the Act proceed on this basis; see, for instance, Wood-working Machinery Regulations, 1922 and the Horizontal Milling Machines Regulations, 1928. It is also, I think, the basis of s. 119 (1) of the Act itself. The words and deeds of the employer may have, of course, a great bearing on the relative responsibilities. If the employer encourages the men not to use the guard that aggravates his responsibility and lessens that of the men, but it cannot take away their responsibility altogether: Clifford v. Charles H. Challen, Ltd. (7). What is the relative responsibility in the present case? The employers are mainly responsible because they set the man a bad example and acquiesced in his failure to use the guard, but the man himself was a skilled man who knew as much about the machine as his employers did, and he admitted that they never told him not to use the guard. They left him to take his own course for his own safety. He clearly failed to fulfil s. 119 (1), and I agree that the damages should be reduced by one-fifth on that account.

ROMER, L.J.: The only point on which I find myself at variance with the judgment of the learned judge is with regard to the meaning and effect of s. 119 (1) of the Factories Act, 1937, and I propose to confine my observations to that question. [His LORDSHIP read the relevant part of the sub-section and continued:] The learned judge held that, although a guard was, in fact, fitted to the press which the plaintiff was using for testing purposes at the time of the accident, it cannot be regarded as having been "provided" within the meaning of the sub-section, and, accordingly, the plaintiff, in not making use of it, was not in breach of the statutory obligation which the sub-section imposes. DEVLIN, J., said with regard to this:

"In my judgment, an article is not 'provided' within the meaning of the Acts merely by supplying it and making it available. When the term is considered in the light of the policy of the Acts, I think that the article must be provided in a manner which makes it clear to the workman that he is expected to use it. That will not always involve an express oral direction. The purpose for which an article is supplied may often be too obvious for words."

The learned judge then went on to say that that was not so in this case on the ground that the plaintiff was impliedly told by his employers that the guard was intended for use in operation only and that he was not expected to use it for testing. If the learned judge had found (which he did not find) that the employers told the plaintiff that he was not to use the guard during the process of testing, then Murray v. Schwachman, Ltd. (1) is authority for the proposition that the guard was not, quoad that process, "provided", on the obvious ground that a thing cannot be regarded as provided for use if a prohibition is placed on its user. That was not, however, the case here, and the argument which was advanced before us (and which is, I think, supported by the language of the learned judge which I have quoted) is that an employer does not "provide" a safety device within the meaning of s. 119 (1) unless he tells the workmen concerned that they have got to use it. I am unable to find any sufficient warrant for that view. The primary meaning of the word "provide" is to "furnish" or "supply", and, accordingly, on the plain, ordinary interpretation of s. 119 (1), a workman's statutory obligation is to use safety devices which are furnished or supplied for his use by his employers. I am aware that the section, being a penal section, has to be construed strictly, but I cannot see any reason why that should involve reading into it words that are not there, particularly when the section makes perfectly good sense without them. I respectfully adopt the words of LORD MACMILLAN in London & North Eastern Ry. Co. v. Berriman (8), where he said ([1946] 1 All E.R. 260):

"Where penalties for infringement are imposed it is not legitimate to stretch the language of a rule, however beneficent its intention, beyond the fair and ordinary meaning of its language."

Taking, then, s. 119 by itself, I can find no legitimate reason for attributing to sub-s. (1), through the medium of the word "provided", the same effect as it would have had if words such as "if he has been ordered to use them" had been added at the end. It is for Parliament, if it thinks proper to do so, and not for the courts, to add to a statutory obligation a qualification which is not there.

So much for s. 119 (1) when taken by itself. If, however, one looks to s. 14 and s. 16 of the Act (which are complementary to s. 119 and impose obligations on the employers), there is still further reason for rejecting the suggested implication. By the proviso to s. 14 (1) it is enacted that the requirements of the sub-section "shall be deemed to have been complied with if a device is provided which automatically prevents the operator from coming into contact with that part."

Section 16 refers to

"All fencing or other safeguards provided in pursuance of the foregoing provisions of this Part of this Act . . ."

Those provisions include, inter alia, sub-ss. (2) and (4) of s. 13, which compel employers to "provide" the devices and mechanical appliances therein mentioned. The word "provide" must, on ordinary principles of construction, surely have the same meaning in s. 119 (1) as in s. 13 (2) and (4) and s. 14 (1) of the Act, and it would follow that, if a safety device is not "provided" within s. 119 (1) unless its physical provision is accompanied by an order to use it then, in the absence of such an order, employers who have done all that they are expressly told to do have yet not performed their statutory obligations under s. 13 and s. 14 in full and can be proceeded against accordingly. I cannot accept a construction of s. 119 (1) which, while qualifying the obligations of the workmen, might fairly be regarded as adding pro tanto, and merely by implication, to the statutory obligations of the employers. It is, I think, clear that the word "provided" is used in s. 13, s. 14 and s. 16 in its ordinary, natural, sense and is similarly so used in s. 119 (1).

I am conscious of the fact that some of the language of DU PARCQ, L.J., in Gibby v. East Grinstead Gas & Water Co. (3) is not altogether in conformity with the views above expressed. His observations, however, were not necessary for the decision of the case which was before the court and which was determined on quite different grounds. Moreover, the lord justice only referred to the fact that the workmen had not been ordered to use the hurricane lamps which were there in question as a "difficulty" in the way of a conviction under s. 119 (1) from which I gather that he was not expressing a concluded view that a prosecution would necessarily fail. It may well be that, if a complicated safeguard is provided for use in connection with a process or machinery of an intricate character and the workman is not instructed as to the purpose of the safeguard or how to use it, he could not be convicted of a breach of the relevant obligations under s. 119 (1). Indeed, in such circumstances, it is unlikely that he would be prosecuted at all. Assuming, however, that to be so, it by no means follows that a workman who has been so instructed can successfully defend himself by saying that he had not been ordered to use the safeguard, and, for the reasons which I have endeavoured to express, such a defence would, in my judgment, be of no avail.

I would add that I quite agree with what my brethren have said to the effect that safeguards which employers are under a duty to provide must be placed ready to the workman's hand. That view is in no way attributing a strained or unnatural meaning to the word "provide", for it cannot fairly be said that a safeguard is being provided for the use of workmen unless it is made readily and obviously available. A butcher does not "provide" or "supply" his customer with meat if he leaves it at the roadside a mile away from the customer's house. On the other matters that were argued before us there is nothing that I wish to add to what my Lord has said, and I agree that the damages which were awarded to the plaintiff should be reduced by twenty per cent. owing to the breach of his statutory obligation.

Appeal allowed.

GIBBS v. GIBBS.

[PROBATE, DIVORCE AND ADMIRALTY DIVISION (Havers, J.), March 5, 6, 10, 1952.]

Legal Aid—Costs—Taxation—Principles to be applied—Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949 (c. 51), sched. III, para. 4 (1)—R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29).

On June 22, 1951, the petitioner, who had obtained a certificate under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, entitling him to legal aid, was granted a decree nisi. The decree contained a direction that the costs of the petitioner be taxed as between solicitor and client in accordance with the provisions of sched. III of that Act. A bill of costs was lodged for taxation with the registrar who disallowed certain items. By the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, sched. III, para. 4 (1): “. . . costs shall be taxed for the purposes of this schedule according to the ordinary rules applicable on a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are to be paid out of a common fund in which the client and others are interested”. Objections to the taxation were carried in and on a summons to show cause why the registrar's decision should not be reversed, HELD: in carrying out a taxation under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the taxing master should adopt as his normal standard the direction in R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), but at the same time he should make more generous allowances than he would in a taxation as between party and party; in making more generous allowances the taxing master was permitted, not only to allow items which could be properly included on a party and party taxation at a higher figure than that at which they would be allowed on a party and party taxation, but also to allow additional items which would not be allowed on a taxation as between party and party.

Observations with regard to items in the bill carried in.

A SUMMONS by the petitioner in a divorce suit to show cause why the decision of the registrar on the objections to his taxation of the petitioner's bill of costs should not be reversed. The petitioner was an "assisted person" receiving legal aid under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949.

Seuffert for the petitioner.

Colin Duncan for the Queen's Proctor.

Cur. adv. vult.

B Mar. 10. HAVERS, J.: This is a summons by the petitioning husband in a suit for divorce to show cause why the decision of Mr. Registrar LONG on the objections to his taxation of the petitioner's bill of costs should not be reversed. Though the summons was in the name of the petitioner, he, being an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, was not financially interested in the result. The persons really interested were the solicitors who had acted for him under the provisions of the Act. I adjourned this summons into open court because it seemed to me to raise questions of general interest to solicitors who act for assisted persons under the provisions of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. As there was nobody concerned to put before me any argument on the other side, I thought it right to direct that the papers in the suit be sent to the Queen's Proctor so that I might have the benefit of any argument which counsel D on his behalf thought right to present to the court.

The petition was heard on June 22, 1951, and a decree nisi was then granted to the petitioner, the court exercising its discretion in his favour. The decree nisi contained a direction that the costs of the petitioner be taxed as between solicitor and client in accordance with the provisions of sched. III to the Act of 1949. In due course the solicitors for the petitioner lodged a bill of costs for E taxation with Mr. Registrar LONG. The learned registrar taxed off £6 5s. 8d. from the total costs as mentioned in the bill of £35 17s. 10d. The total bill as taxed, including disbursements, was £63 13s. 9d.

Section 1 of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, provides:

F " (5) Legal aid shall consist of representation, on the terms provided for by this Part of this Act, by a solicitor and so far as necessary by counsel (including all such assistance as is usually given by solicitor or counsel in the steps preliminary or incidental to any proceedings or in arriving at or giving effect to a compromise to avoid or bring to an end any proceedings) . . . (7) Save as expressly provided by this Part of this Act or by regulations made thereunder,—(a) the fact that the services of counsel or a solicitor are given by way of legal aid shall not affect the relationship between or rights G of counsel, solicitor and client or any privilege arising out of such relationship; and (b) the rights conferred by this Part of this Act on a person receiving legal aid shall not affect the rights or liabilities of other parties to the proceedings or the principles on which the discretion of any court or tribunal is normally exercised."

H Section 2 deals with the financial conditions of legal aid, and sub-s. (2) provides:

"Where a person receives legal aid in connection with any proceedings—(a) the expenses incurred in connection with the proceedings, so far as they would ordinarily be paid in the first instance by or on behalf of the solicitor acting for him, shall be so paid except in the case of those paid direct from the legal aid fund as provided by this Part of this Act; (b) his solicitor and counsel shall not take any payment in respect of the legal aid except such payment as is directed by this Part of this Act to be made out of the legal aid fund."

That is an important provision because, if any costs are incurred which are not allowed on taxation, the solicitor cannot recover them from any source. The sub-section continues:

"(c) he [the assisted person] may be required to make a contribution to the legal aid fund in respect of the sums payable thereout on his account; (d) any sums recovered by virtue of an order or agreement for costs made in his favour with respect to the proceedings shall be paid to the legal aid fund; (e) his liability by virtue of an order for costs made against him with respect to the proceedings shall not exceed the amount (if any) which is a reasonable one for him to pay having regard to all the circumstances, including the means of all the parties and their conduct in connection with the dispute."

Section 3 provides that the assisted person may be called on to make contributions to the fund. Section 4 deals with the assessment of disposable capital and income and of maximum contribution. Section 6 deals with solicitors and counsel who act for assisted persons under the provisions of the Act, and s. 6 (1) provides:

"Panels of solicitors and barristers willing to act for persons receiving legal aid shall be prepared and maintained, and there may be separate panels for different purposes, for different courts and for different districts."

Sub-section (2) says that solicitors or barristers may have their names on the appropriate panel. Sub-sections (4), (5) and (6) provide:

"(4) Where a person is entitled to receive legal aid, the solicitor to act for him and, if the case requires counsel, his counsel shall be selected from the appropriate panel, and he shall be entitled to make the selection himself . . . [subject to certain provisos]. (5) Subject to this Part of this Act, a solicitor who has acted for a person receiving legal aid shall be paid for so acting out of the legal aid fund, and any fees paid to counsel for so acting shall also be paid out of that fund. (6) The sums payable under the last foregoing sub-section to a solicitor or counsel shall not exceed those allowed under sched. III to this Act."

That, again, is an important provision for the purposes of the case with which I am now dealing. Schedule III to the Act deals with remuneration of persons giving legal aid under Part I. By para. 1 (1):

"The sums allowed to counsel in connection with proceedings in the House of Lords or the Supreme Court shall be eighty-five per cent. of the amount allowed on taxation of the costs: Provided that this sub-paragraph shall not apply in relation to proceedings in the High Court in a matrimonial cause, where the solicitor is one employed for a salary to act in connection with matrimonial causes."

That proviso has no application to this case. Paragraph 2 (1) provides:

"The sums allowed to a solicitor in connection with proceedings in the House of Lords or the Supreme Court shall be the full amount allowed on taxation of the costs on account of disbursements and eighty-five per cent. of the amount so allowed on account of profit costs: Provided that so much of this sub-paragraph as relates to profit costs shall not apply to a solicitor employed for a salary to act in connection with matrimonial causes".

The relevant paragraph for the purposes of the question which I have to determine is para. 4 (1):

"Subject to the last foregoing paragraph [that is, para. 3, which has no application to the facts of this case] costs shall be taxed for the purposes of this schedule according to the ordinary rules applicable on a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are to be paid out of a common fund in which the client and others are interested: Provided that no question shall be raised as to the propriety of any act for which prior approval was obtained as required by regulations."

The only other matter to which I need refer is reg. 18 (3) of the Legal Aid (General) Regulations, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1359), which were made pursuant to a power contained in the Act, which is in these terms:

A "Any order for the payment of the costs of any proceedings to which an assisted person is a party shall include a direction that his costs are (in addition to any other direction as to taxation contained in the order) to be taxed as between solicitor and client in accordance with the provisions of sched. III to the Act."

B As I have already said, the decree which the petitioner obtained in this court did contain such a direction.

Counsel for the Queen's Proctor submitted to me that in para. 4 (1) of sched. III to the Act of 1949 stress should be laid on the words "according to the ordinary rules applicable on a taxation as between solicitor and client". He submitted that, in view of those words, when the taxing master was called on to tax a bill his mind should not be coloured by the fact that the litigant was an assisted person or by the fact that the fund out of which the costs were to be paid substantially consisted of moneys provided by Parliament. I accept that argument, and I think that these words are important. I ought to refer also to r. 66 of the Matrimonial Causes Rules, 1950 (S.I., 1950, No. 1940), which provides:

D "(1) Every bill of costs shall be referred to a registrar for taxation and may be taxed by him or such other taxing officer as the President may appoint . . . (3) In any cause or matter to which these rules apply the costs allowed to solicitors and the taxation of such costs shall, except where these rules otherwise provide, be in accordance with the provisions of Ord. 65 of the Rules of the Supreme Court so far as the same are applicable."

E The rules have not otherwise provided, so that the costs allowed to solicitors and the taxation of such costs are to be in accordance with the provisions of R.S.C., Ord. 65, in matrimonial suits. Counsel for the Queen's Proctor submitted, therefore, that on a taxation of a bill of costs under the provisions of sched. III to the Act of 1949 the governing regulation was R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), which is in these terms:

F "On every taxation the taxing master shall allow all such costs, charges and expenses, as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for the defending the rights of any party, but save as against the party who incurred the same no costs shall be allowed which appear to the taxing master to have been incurred or increased through over-caution, negligence or mistake or by payment of special fees to counsel or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses."

G Though the question which I have to determine lies within a very short compass, counsel for the Queen's Proctor was good enough to provide me with the historical background relating to orders for costs generally and to the different classifications which have grown up on taxations as between solicitor and client. H Before 1873 the common law courts had no power to award anything except party and party costs. Counsel referred me to the ANNUAL PRACTICE, 1951, p. 1498n.

"Solicitor and Clients Costs. The High Court of Justice has, as the Court of Chancery formerly had, a general and discretionary power in matters of equitable jurisdiction to give to a successful party costs as between solicitor and client; but quære, whether the power exists in matters of common law jurisdiction."

The case there cited was Andrews v. Barnes (1), which shows the origin of the jurisdiction to award costs as between solicitor and client. The headnote reads:

"The Court of Chancery formerly had, and the High Court of Justice now has in matters of equitable jurisdiction, a general discretionary power to give costs as between solicitor and client. Whether the High Court has the same power in matters of common law jurisdiction, quære."

FRY, L.J., who delivered the judgment of the Court of Appeal, examined the old jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor, and said (39 Ch.D. 138):

"The jurisdiction of the Lord Chancellor in costs was essentially different from that at common law. 'The giving of costs in equity,' said LORD HARDWICKE in Jones v. Coxeter (2) 'is entirely discretionary, and is not at all conformable to the rule at law.' 'Courts of equity,' said the same great judge in another case, 'have in all cases done it' (i.e., dealt with costs) 'not from any authority' (i.e., as we understand, from any statutory or delegated authority)—'but from conscience and arbitrio boni viri, as to the satisfaction on one side or other on account of vexation': Burford Corpn. v. Lenthall (3) (2 Atk. 551)."

Then he makes an examination of the older general orders of the court and shows the various phrases which have been used in reference to costs. He said (ibid., 140):

"The general jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery in this respect is stated with great clearness by the lords justices in the case of Mordue v. Palmer (4). In the course of a Chancery suit a reference was made to arbitration, which ordered that the costs should be in the discretion of the arbitrator. He awarded them as between solicitor and client, and the Court of Appeal held that as the reference was in Chancery the arbitrator had power so to do. 'The common law courts,' said MELLISH, L.J. (6 Ch. App. 32), 'have no power to give costs between solicitor and client, and therefore, when there is a reference, the arbitrator cannot give any other than costs between party and party. But it is otherwise with courts of equity; and I therefore think that, when a reference as to costs is made by a court of equity, the court gives the arbitrator jurisdiction to award costs as between solicitor and client if he shall think fit'."

The practice in this Division has been to award costs as between party and party only. I was referred to Allen v. Allen and D'Arcy (5) which showed that there was some difference between a taxation between party and party in this Division in a matrimonial suit and that of a taxation between party and party in a common law cause. The headnote is:

"Costs of wife in a matrimonial suit are taxed as between party and party, but not in all respects on the same principles as a taxation at common law between party and party. Thus, though certain issues may have been found against the wife, whose costs are being taxed, the expenses incurred by them will be allowed unless the registrar should think that they were wantonly and vexatiously raised. Expense of witnesses to prove the circumstances of a plea not in issue, if such circumstances have a bearing on other parts of the case in issue, may be allowed; and a reasonable amount of expense incurred in investigating and acquiring information as to the circumstances of the case should be allowed."

The Judge Ordinary (SIR CRESSWELL CRESSWELL) said (2 Sw. & Tr. 110):

"This taxation must certainly be reviewed. The question of the principle on which costs are to be taxed in matrimonial suits has not yet been settled, but I apprehend that I must adopt, as far as I can, the principles on which the Ecclesiastical Courts proceeded. I am informed that the principle of taxation in those courts was as between party and party; but that term had a very different construction from that put upon it in common law courts, because there they only allow the costs of such issues as are found for the persons who are to receive costs. I think that the only limit which can with propriety be put upon the allowance of the costs of the different issues raised in this court is this: where the taxing officer is satisfied that an issue has been vexatiously and improperly put on the record, so as to occasion a wanton and unnecessary increase in the amount of costs, he is not to allow the costs of that issue."

A

It was pointed out that, notwithstanding that, a solicitor who appeared for a wife in a matrimonial suit and was awarded party and party costs might nevertheless be entitled at common law to recover extra costs incurred beyond those which were allowed on a party and party taxation. The authority for that proposition is Ottaway v. Hamilton (6). It is enough for me to read the headnote, which is in these terms:

"A solicitor employed by a wife to take proceedings against her husband to obtain a divorce on the ground of cruelty and adultery, may sue the husband for 'extra costs,' i.e., costs reasonably incurred by him beyond the costs taxed and allowed as between party and party. His common law right to sue the husband as for 'necessaries' supplied to the wife, is not to be limited to the statutable rights and remedies for costs given to the wife under the Divorce Acts."

C

I need not trouble with whatever the position was in the early days because the governing rule which applies to every taxation today is R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29). That rule has been the subject of judicial consideration and interpretation in the courts, and I was referred to a number of authorities in which this took place. One of them was McIver & Co., Ltd. v. Tate Steamers, Ltd. (7) in the Court of Appeal which was heard soon after the new rule, which was introduced in 1902 and is now R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), came into operation. The headnote is:

D

"Rule 10 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, January, 1902, applies to taxation of costs both as between party and party and as between solicitor and client. In an action upon a charterparty a witness, whose evidence was essential to the plaintiffs' case, was examined in London before the trial of the action. The plaintiffs' solicitor from Liverpool attended at the examination for the purpose of instructing counsel. The plaintiffs having succeeded in the action, upon the taxation of costs between party and party, the taxing master allowed in respect of the solicitor's attendance as aforesaid an amount exceeding two guineas, the maximum allowance for such an attendance specified in Appendix N to Ord. 65, No. 147. HELD, that the taxing master had power to make the allowance which he made in the exercise of the discretion given to him by r. 10 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, January, 1902."

G MATHEW, L.J., says ([1902] 2 K.B. 187):

"But it is argued that under the rules the master had no discretion to allow these costs. According to the practice as to taxation of costs between party and party prior to the rules of January, 1902, the scale given in Appendix N was no doubt binding on the master, and this allowance could not have been made. But, on consideration of the objections to this rule, it was thought desirable to modify it to some extent, and accordingly the new r. 10 of the Rules of the Supreme Court, January, 1902, was made, by which it is provided that 'regulation 29 of Ord. 65, r. 27, is hereby annulled and the following regulation is substituted therefor'."

H

He sets out the new rule, and continues (ibid., 188):

"We are asked to construe this rule as meaning that the taxing master shall allow no costs, charges or expenses beyond those provided for by the scale given in Appendix N. The new regulation was framed with full knowledge of the terms of the old regulations and of the scale, and it cannot, I think, be doubted that it ought to be construed according to its terms, namely, as giving the master on 'every taxation' discretion to allow such costs, charges, and expenses as appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party, subject to the exceptions mentioned in the latter part of the rule. In this case there appears to be no reason for suggesting that the allowance made was not perfectly reasonable, and it comes within the plain terms of the rule. For these reasons I think the appeal must be dismissed."

The other case to which I was referred was Re Ermen (8). That really followed the decision of the Court of Appeal to which I have just referred. The headnote to that case is:

"Under r. 8 of Ord. 65, and r. 10 of January, 1902 (which is the new sub-r. 29 of r. 27 of the same order), the discretion of the taxing officer is no longer limited to the maximum fee prescribed by Appendix N; but under these regulations he has now on every taxation a two-fold discretion—first, in ordinary cases, the discretion conferred on him by Appendix N, and, in addition to that, a general discretion in special cases to allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice, or for defending the rights of any party. The Practice Notes of the Masters of Hilary Sittings, 1902—known as the 'Blue Book'—though framed and issued by them under the power conferred on them by sub-r. 37 of r. 27 of Ord. 65, have no statutory authority, and do not abrogate or fetter the discretion given them by the Rules of the Supreme Court. They merely define the practice which, as a general rule, should be followed by the masters on taxations."

In his judgment FARWELL, J., says ([1903] 2 Ch. 160):

"In this case the learned registrar, after consulting the taxing masters in London, was of opinion that he had no discretion to allow more than the maximum of £1 ls. prescribed by Appendix N, No. 65, or by the Blue Book; although, if he had had such a discretion, he considered that the fee of £5 5s. claimed was proper and reasonable, and ought to be allowed. In my opinion, on the construction of the rules, apart from any question of authority, the learned registrar and the taxing masters have not taken the right view. Now Ord. 65, r. 8, is a rule of old standing, and contains negative words: 'In causes and matters commenced after these rules come into operation, solicitors shall be entitled to charge and be allowed the fees set forth in the column headed "Lower Scale" in Appendix N in all causes and matters, and no higher fees shall be allowed in any case, except such as are by this order otherwise provided for.' Turning on to find what are 'otherwise provided for,' I find a fasciculus of sub-clauses headed 'Special allowances and general regulations,' fifty-eight in number, contained in r. 27. One of those sub-rules is No. 29. In the old rules which were in force before January, 1902, sub-r. 29 was expressed in the negative. There was, first, r. 8, with the negative words: 'No higher fees shall be allowed in any case except such as are by this order otherwise provided for'; and then the old sub-r. 29, which said: 'As to costs to be paid or borne by another party, no costs are to be allowed which do not appear to the taxing officer to have been necessary or proper,' and so on. But in January of last year it was thought fit to alter that sub-rule and to put it into an affirmative form. I think it is fair to infer that when eminent persons like the Rule Committee alter the phraseology of a rule they intend to alter the substance also. When you are dealing with a set of sub-rules under the head 'Special allowances and general regulations,' which involve or may involve an exception to the negative words in r. 8, 'No higher fees shall be allowed, etc.,' and you find only a negative sub-rule that such and such a thing shall not be allowed, it is impossible to hold (and in fact the contrary was held) that under those regulations the maximum limit fixed in Appendix N can be exceeded. But when those negative words in the sub-rule are altered into the affirmative, and become an express power or direction that 'on every taxation the taxing master shall allow all such costs, charges and expenses, as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice,' and so on, then, having regard to the collocation in which you find them, it appears to me that the Rule Committee did intend to give the general discretion which the words import."

Then he says he considers he is bound by the decision of the Court of Appeal in McIver & Co., Ltd. v. Tate Steamers, Ltd. (7).

Counsel for the Queen's Proctor put before me a classification of the various methods of taxation of costs. His classification consisted of six different classes. His first class was a taxation as between solicitor and own client, that is to say, where the costs are payable by a client to his solicitor. His second class was a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are payable out of a fund wholly owned by the party. His third class was a taxation as between solicitor and client under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11). His fourth class was a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are payable out of a common fund. His fifth class was a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are payable out of a fund in which the party has no interest. I think he ought to add, to complete that, "or where the costs are payable by one party to another". The sixth class was a taxation of costs as between party and party.

Dealing first with his first class, that is to say taxation between solicitor and own client, counsel called my attention to an unreported case which appears in LORD ATKIN'S ENCYCLOPAEDIA OF COURT FORMS AND PRECEDENTS IN CIVIL PROCEEDINGS, vol. 7, p. 215, note (z), and from which it appears that some judges, at any rate, disapprove of the phrase "solicitor and own client". The note is in these terms:

"The expression 'solicitor and own client' has been disapproved by judges. It is more accurate to direct taxation on the footing of an indemnity."

The case cited is Price v. Midland, etc., Cleaning Co., Ltd. (9). With regard to counsel's second class of taxation as between solicitor and client—where the costs are payable out of a fund wholly owned by the party—he said, and I think rightly, that there is no practical difference between classes one and two. He referred to the passage in SETON'S JUDGMENTS AND ORDERS, 7th ed., vol. 1, at p. 244. The note is:

"When costs are directed to be taxed as between solicitor and client, it does not necessarily mean that all costs which the solicitor is entitled to against his client are to be allowed, but the allowance will vary according to the circumstances of the case; regard being had to the position of the parties, and the fund out of which the costs are to be paid; and a distinction is made: first, where such costs are payable out of a fund belonging to other parties; secondly, where such costs are payable out of a common fund, in which the party has only a limited interest; and, thirdly, where such costs are payable out of a fund belonging exclusively to the party himself."

There is a passage in very similar terms in DANIELL'S CHANCERY PRACTICE, 8th ed., vol. 2, at p. 1078. Both these classes are really taxation on an indemnity basis and neither has any application to this case.

Counsel's third class was taxation as between solicitor and client under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11), which is in these terms:

"The costs of the plaintiff or if more than one of all the plaintiffs in any such cause or matter or incident to the claims therein or consequent thereon shall be taxed by the taxing master, or, if such cause or matter is proceeding in a district registry by the district registrar, as between party and party and as between solicitor and client, and the taxing master or district registrar shall certify the respective amounts of the party and party and solicitor and client costs, and the difference (if any) and the proportion of such difference (if any) payable respectively by any adult party to the cause or matter and by or out of the moneys of any party who is an infant or person of unsound mind, and no costs other than those so certified shall be payable to the solicitor for any plaintiff in the cause or matter."

I was referred to the decision of DENNING, J., in Goodwin v. Storrar (10). The headnote to that case reads:

"The words 'costs as between solicitor and client' in R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11), which provides for the taxation of the costs of the plaintiff in any cause or matter, mean the costs which a client ought properly to pay to his own solicitor. Where therefore a consent order was made in favour of the plaintiffs in an action brought by personal representatives under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and the Fatal Accidents Act, and a provision was included that the defendant should pay to the plaintiffs' solicitors the costs of the action as between solicitor and client to be taxed:—HELD, that the plaintiffs' solicitors were entitled to be paid such costs as were found by the taxing master to be properly payable to them by their own clients. Giles v. Randall (11) considered and distinguished."

That was a case in which infants were concerned, and, therefore, the rule applied. DENNING, J., gave the following judgment in open court ([1947] 1 All E.R. 204):

"The words 'taxation as between solicitor and client' have two meanings. One meaning, which I will refer to as meaning (A), is an inquiry as to the costs which a client ought properly to pay to his own solicitor, as distinct from 'taxation as between party and party,' which is an inquiry as to the costs which he should recover from the opposite side. The distinction is based on common sense, for if a client authorises his solicitor to incur an unusual or unnecessary expense, it is only right that the client should reimburse his own solicitor for it, but it does not follow that he should be able to recover it from the opposite side. The other meaning of 'taxation as between solicitor and client,' which I will refer to as meaning (B), is an inquiry as to the costs to be paid to the solicitor out of a common fund in which the client and others are interested, and is substantially a taxation as between party and party, but on a more generous scale. When meaning (B) is used, a different form of words is needed to describe an inquiry as to the costs which a client ought properly to pay his own solicitor, and that is then described as a 'taxation as between solicitor and own client' . . . In my opinion, in R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11), the words are used in meaning (A). The rule is designed to protect widows and children in accident cases by disentitling solicitors from deducting from the compensation a lump sum for their costs and by subjecting their claim for costs to taxation, i.e., to an inquiry in every case as to the costs properly payable to them. If meaning (A) is given, that result is achieved, but if meaning (B) is given, the effect of the sub-rule, especially the concluding words thereof, would mean that the solicitor would be deprived of costs properly payable to him. In the present case, for instance, the solicitors would have to pay the fee of £11 for the second leading counsel out of their own pockets, although the expenditure had been authorised by the plaintiffs and proved, in fact, greatly to the benefit of the estate and the children. I reject an interpretation of the sub-rule which leads to such a result. If I am right in thinking that in the sub-rule

A the words are used in meaning (A), it shows that it is a valid meaning to be attached to them in any legal document, and this enables me to distinguish Giles v. Randall (11). The court in that case recognised that meaning (A) was the ordinary meaning, but felt compelled to give the words the meaning (B) because that was the technical meaning, and where words in a legal document have a technical meaning, it is the technical meaning that should be received. Now that a rule of the Supreme Court has been made, in which are used the words in meaning (A), it follows that meaning (A) at the present day is, not only the ordinary meaning, but also a valid technical meaning, and that there is no reason why in construing a legal document that meaning should not ordinarily be given. In the order as to costs in this case, therefore, there is no reason why I should not adopt meaning (A), when that appears to be the meaning intended by the parties, as I think it is. In view of this development it may be that Giles v. Randall (11) would be decided differently at the present day. At the instance of the parties and with their consent, I have seen the senior taxing master and he tells me that the practice in cases under R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14, is to tax according to meaning (A), i.e., to ascertain the costs properly payable by the client to the solicitor. In Giles v. Randall (11), it is to be noticed that the Court of Appeal were much influenced by the practice of the taxing office. I would hesitate long before I disturbed the present practice. I decline to do so. I hold that the taxation of this bill by the senior taxing master of this court was on the correct principles and I do not interfere with it."

D is acting for an assisted person under the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, is very analogous to that of a solicitor who is acting for a widow and infant in a case to which R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11), applies. He invited me, therefore, to put on the words in sched. III to the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, an interpretation similar to that which DENNING, J., put on the words in R.S.C., Ord. 22, r. 14 (11). I am unable to accept that argument for two reasons. First, the order in question has no application to the facts of the present case, and, secondly, the order uses the words "as between solicitor and client", whereas in sched. III to the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, the words are different. They are: "according to the ordinary rules applicable on a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are to be paid out of a common fund in which the client and others are interested". The case, however, is of assistance to me because DENNING, J., deals with the position where there is a taxation out of a common fund in which the client and others are interested, which is the precise method of taxation referred to in the Act of 1949. The interpretation put by DENNING, J., on those words is that it is substantially a taxation as between party and party, but on a more generous scale.

G I pass by for the moment counsel for the Queen's Proctor's fourth class, because that is the one which applies to the facts of this case and I shall have to refer to it hereafter. His fifth class was a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are payable out of a fund in which the party has no interest, with my suggested addition of the words "or where the costs are payable by one party to another". Under his fifth class my attention was called to Giles v. Randall (11). This decision of the Court of Appeal is the leading authority on R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29). The headnote sets out the terms of sub-r. (29) and then goes on to say:

"An action was settled upon the terms that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff against the defendant for a sum of money 'with costs as between solicitor and client to be taxed (if necessary).' The judgment was accordingly drawn up to that effect. The taxing master taxed the costs upon the footing that the second part of sub-r. 29 applied, and he disallowed or reduced in amount a large number of items, stating in effect that a taxation of costs as between solicitor and client, where the costs were to be paid by one party to another party, was stricter than a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs were to be paid by the client to his solicitor and gave little more than a taxation as between party and party:—HELD, that the second part of sub-r. 29, from the words 'but save as against the party who incurred the same,' applied to all taxations except a taxation as between a solicitor and his own client, and that, having regard to the above distinction in taxations as between solicitor and client, the taxing master had taxed the costs on the proper principle."

BUCKLEY, L.J., said this ([1915] 1 K.B. 295):

"There are three modes of taxation as between solicitor and client. The first is where a client is taxing his own solicitor's bill of costs, commonly called taxation as between solicitor and own client. The second is where the costs are to be paid out of a common fund in which the client and others are interested. This case does not come within either of those two classes. The third is where the costs are payable by one party to another or out of a fund in which the party entitled to the costs has no interest. The present case falls within this last mentioned class. The plaintiff was to have her costs as between solicitor and client to be paid by the defendant. A practice has grown up, which I must say I regret, of differentiating between taxation of costs as between solicitor and client and as between solicitor and own client. In the former case the taxation is substantially a party and party taxation on a more generous scale."

I call attention to those words. BUCKLEY, L.J., continued:

"In the latter case there is an ascertainment and allowance of the charges properly payable by the client to his solicitor. That distinction is too firmly established for this court to interfere with it, though it may be a matter proper to be considered by the Rule Committee. I have no doubt that litigants who stipulate for and by agreement are to receive costs as between solicitor and client often intend to get an indemnity in respect of costs. The taxing master has taxed the costs upon the footing that the latter part of r. 27 (29) of Ord. 65 applies. The history of that sub-rule is this. As the sub-rule stood before the alteration in 1902 it was negative in form and was confined to costs as between party and party. It ran thus: 'As to costs to be paid or borne by another party, no costs are to be allowed which do not appear to the taxing officer to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or defending the rights of the party, or which appear to the taxing officer to have been incurred through over-caution, negligence, or mistake, or merely at the desire of the party.' In January, 1902, this sub-rule was so altered as that the first part was reproduced in an affirmative instead of a negative form and was made to extend to every taxation. It now runs thus: 'On every taxation the taxing master shall allow all such costs, charges, and expenses as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice or for defending the rights of any party.' So far the new sub-rule was silent as to the costs dealt with in the latter part of the old sub-rule, namely, costs incurred through over-caution, etc. Those costs are remitted to the latter part of the new sub-rule, which runs thus: 'But save as against the party who incurred the same no costs shall be allowed which appear to the taxing master to have been incurred or increased through over-caution, negligence, or mistake, or by payment of special fees to counsel or special charges or expenses to witnesses or other persons, or by other unusual expenses.' Here I find picked up and reproduced in negative words the latter part of the old sub-rule. The meaning is this. The earlier part of the new sub-rule says that the taxing master shall allow a certain class of costs. The latter part says that, except in one particular case, certain costs which were formerly to be disallowed are still to be disallowed. The excepted case is that of taxation of costs as between a solicitor and his own client. This part of the sub-rule in effect provides that as between solicitor and own client those costs may be allowed, but that in all other cases they shall not. The other cases include taxation as between solicitor and client as distinguished from taxation as between solicitor and own client. Accordingly upon such a taxation as this the costs described in the latter part of sub-r. 29 are not to be allowed. The taxing master in this case has proceeded upon that footing. He says that 'the taxation in the case of No. 3, which is the one that applies to this action, is the strictest and in effect gives little more than a taxation as between party and party, except that any necessary letters to and attendances on the client are allowed'. That is not very well expressed. 'Necessary letters to and attendances on the client' are allowed as between party and party; the letters and attendances there referred to must be letters and attendances beyond those that would be allowed as between party and party. The taxing master has taxed this bill of costs on the footing that the latter part of sub-r. 29 applies. For the reasons I have given I think that he was right. Except upon a taxation as between solicitor and own client such costs as there mentioned are not to be allowed. That is the only question of principle argued before us. This court does not interfere on questions of quantum."

PICKFORD, L.J., delivered judgment to the same effect.

The first thing to be observed is that BUCKLEY, L.J., there set out that there were three modes of taxation as between solicitor and client, and he described each of those modes. He obviously recognises and approves those three modes of taxation. I have no doubt that when the draftsman of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, drafted para. 4 of sched. III, he must have been well aware of these three modes of taxation, and that they were recognised by the courts and had been approved by the Court of Appeal in Giles v. Randall (11). Now, that case decided that on a taxation as between solicitor and client R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), applied to every taxation, and, except in one case, the latter part of the sub-rule also applied, the exception being in a case where the taxation was between solicitor and own client. But it is to be observed that BUCKLEY, L.J., referred to the observations of the taxing master dealing with necessary letters to and attendance on the client. He did indicate that on a taxation as between solicitor and client there may be other items allowable which would not be allowable on a taxation as between party and party. The other matter of importance from the point of view of the question which I have to determine is contained in the words of BUCKLEY, L.J., where he regrets the practice of differentiation between taxation as between solicitor and client and taxation as between solicitor and own client, and he then goes on to say (ibid., 295):

"In the former case the taxation is substantially a party and party taxation on a more generous scale."

There, he uses the same language as that used by DENNING, J., in Goodwin v. Storrar (10).

I was also referred to Frankenburg v. Famous Lasky Film Service, Ltd. (12).

The material passage which was cited to me was a passage from the judgment of LORD HANWORTH, M.R. ([1931] 1 Ch. 436):

"It appears to me that that case [Pêcheries Ostendaises (Soc. Anon.) v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Co. (13)] is abundant authority for allowing, as the registrar has allowed, these costs before action. It is to be observed that in the Pêcheries Ostendaises case (13) the plaintiff's bill of costs which were to be paid was taxed on the basis of party and party, and that in the present case the costs are to be taxed on the basis of solicitor and client, but the difference between party and party and solicitor and client costs is undoubtedly this, that the solicitor and client costs are intended to embrace a more generous allowance for the actual costs which have been incurred by the plaintiff. It appears to us, therefore, that these costs incurred before action are costs which may be fairly attributable to the conduct of the defendants and thus within the costs which it was contemplated would have to be paid by the defendants."

The sixth class to which counsel for the Queen's Proctor referred was a taxation as between party and party, and he referred me to one case, Pêcheries Ostendaises (Soc. Anon.) v. Merchants' Marine Insurance Co. (13). ATKIN, L.J., says ([1928] 1 K.B. 762):

"The other matter that arises is as to the costs incurred before the action was commenced. That has nothing to do with the stay of proceedings, but it is a pure question whether or not the costs incurred before the writ was issued are costs which the plaintiffs can recover under an order for the costs of the action. Upon that question it appears to me to be very important to bear in mind that the taxing masters have got to apply the words of Ord. 65, r. 27 (29). That rule is the guiding rule in the taxation of costs. It is intended to sum up generally the principles upon which costs are awarded; and I cannot help thinking that if that rule were really rigorously applied by everybody—and by 'rigorously applied' I mean applied in all cases and giving full effect to the width of its language—there would be many fewer complaints by successful litigants than there are at the present moment. It is a rule which is intended to give to the successful litigant a full indemnity for all costs reasonably incurred by him in relation to the action. It says in terms that the taxing master is to allow 'all such costs, charges and expenses, as shall appear to him to have been necessary or proper for the attainment of justice.' That is the whole principle that the taxing master has got to apply."

I come now to class four in counsel's classification which is a taxation as between solicitor and client where costs are payable out of a common fund, which is the basis provided in para. 4 (1) of sched. III to the Act of 1949. I was referred to two cases dealing with this classification. The first was Re Joint Stock Trust & Finance Corp., Ltd. (14). The object of citing this report was to show that there was authority for the proposition that on a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs were payable out of a common fund, the taxing master could properly allow items which would not be allowable on a taxation as between party and party. The headnote to that case reads as follows:

"Costs—Taxation—Solicitor and client—Costs payable out of common fund—Transcript of shorthand writer's notes of misfeasance proceedings—Costs incurred through over-caution . . . or other unusual expenses—Ord. 65, r. 27 (29). Summons to review taken out by the applicant in certain misfeasance proceedings in which judgment was given by EADY, J., on Feb. 1, 1912. At that time the judgment was irrecoverable, but in the year 1921 after leave had been given to proceed on the judgment, and a subsequent summons issued to compromise, a sum of £25,000 became divisible amongst the debenture holders of the Selected Gold Mines of Australia Limited. Party and party costs of the compromise were taxed and paid. In these costs a transcript of the whole of the misfeasance proceedings was included, but disallowed. Subsequently the applicant, who was also the applicant on the misfeasance and the compromise summons, brought in a solicitor and client bill of costs payable out of the fund as directed by the order sanctioning the compromise. The taxing master disallowed these costs on the ground that the same were incurred through over-caution. HELD, that in the circumstances the transcript was necessary and the costs thereof should be allowed."

EVE, J., in his judgment said (137 L.T. 631):

A "I think the objection ought to be allowed. It is no reflection on the taxing master that he should have construed the language of P. O. LAWRENCE, J., as he has done. He regards the matter as concluded by what the learned judge said. I do not think it is. The applicant incurred these costs for the benefit of a body of debenture holders of whom she was one, and I regard the learned judge's statement as a reservation in her favour. Undoubtedly there were grounds for treating the matter as concluded, but, on the other hand, the language of the learned judge implies some reservation, and the only point to which it could relate was the point whether as between solicitor and client this item, disallowed as between party and party, could be allowed. These transcripts were made for the benefit of all the parties concerned in obtaining payment of the fund now in court, and, in my opinion, were useful, if not absolutely necessary to that end. I think, therefore, the item—not a very serious one in amount—ought to be allowed in the applicant's costs."

C The other authority to which I was referred was the recent decision of ROXBURGH, J., in Reed v. Gray (15), which is of great assistance to me in deciding the question which I have to decide. The headnote is:

D "A solicitor brought an action for specific performance of a contract to sell to him certain land. By his defence the defendant alleged that the sale was not genuine, but was the outcome of an unlawful conspiracy to defraud and deprive him of the real value of the premises. The case came to trial, but the defence collapsed, and the court ordered that the costs of the plaintiff be referred to the taxing master to tax as between solicitor and client. HELD: under the order for taxation it was the duty of the taxing master (as on a taxation as between party and party) to adopt as his norm or standard the directions in R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), but at the same time to make more generous allowances than he would in a taxation as between party and party; there was no basis for the view that, under the order made, the taxing master should tax the costs as between party and party, allowing on a more generous scale only the costs of certain letters and attendances; but the order could not be construed as an order for taxation as between solicitor and own client."

E The learned judge, after dealing with the facts of the case, said this ([1952] F 1 All E.R. 242):

G "The case came to trial, was part heard, and then the defence collapsed. Having regard to all the circumstances, I thought that, in the exercise of the discretion which I considered myself to have on the authority of Andrews v. Barnes (1), I ought to award the plaintiff costs as between solicitor and client, and, accordingly, I made, on Nov. 16, 1950, an order that it be referred to the taxing master to tax as between solicitor and client the costs of the plaintiff of this action other than certain costs. What is the true construction of that order? On this point Giles v. Randall (11) is the leading case and R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), is the relevant sub-rule . . . In Giles v. Randall (11) the plaintiff brought an action against the defendant to recover damages for breach of promise of marriage. When the case was in the day's list for hearing terms were agreed and indorsed on counsel's briefs 'that judgment should be entered for the plaintiff for £500 with costs as between solicitor and client to be taxed (if necessary),' and, accordingly, the judgment as drawn up stated that 'it is adjudged that the plaintiff recover against the defendant £500 and her costs as between solicitor and client to be taxed (if necessary).' The plaintiff's bill of costs was taxed, and the taxing master disallowed or reduced in amount a large number of items therein, such as charges for instructions for briefs and counsel's fees. The plaintiff carried in objections to the disallowances before the taxing master, which, so far as material, were as follows: 'The plaintiff objects generally to the taxation and to the disallowance of the items hereinafter mentioned on the grounds: (1) Such taxation was conducted upon the basis of a party and party taxation. (2) It ought to have been conducted upon the basis of a taxation as between solicitor and client where the costs are to be paid by the client, because the terms of the settlement of the action were that the plaintiff was to receive £500 damages clear, and all the costs for which she was liable to her solicitor were to be paid by the defendant.' The taxing master in his answer thereto (so far as material) said: 'It is well settled that there are various forms of taxation as between solicitor and client. No. 1. Where the costs are payable by the client to his solicitor or where the costs are payable out of a fund belonging entirely to the party. No. 2. Where the costs are payable out of a general or common fund. No. 3. Where the costs are payable out of a fund which belongs to other parties and in which the party has no interest or where the costs are payable by one party to another. The taxation in the case of No. 3, which is the one that applies to this action, is the strictest and in effect gives little more than a taxation as between party and party, except that any necessary letters to and attendances on the client are allowed.' These last words, which, it is to be observed, are derived from the taxing master's answers to objections and not from any judgment of any member of the court, are the linchpin of the case which I am now trying, and it is also to be observed that they purport, not to set out a norm or standard of taxation, but to state in summary form the result of a taxation on what the taxing master calls a No. 3 basis. I desire to emphasise that. I cannot believe that the taxing master in that case was ignorant of r. 27 (29), or failed to realise that that was the sub-rule which supplied the norm or standard for taxations as between solicitor and client. I think he was merely stating what in his experience was the general effect of a taxation so conducted. It is noted that he used the words 'in effect', and he does not say 'gives no more than'. He says 'gives little more than'. BUCKLEY, L.J., adopts the classification into three classes indicated by the taxing master."

ROXBURGH, J., then reads the passage ([1915] 1 K.B. 295) that I have already referred to in Giles v. Randall (11), and continues (ibid.):

"That reinforces my conclusion that the taxing master knew perfectly well that it was that sub-rule which supplied the norm or standard for taxation, and that the paragraph to which I have referred was not intended by him to be substituted for the norm or standard, but was intended to state a broad summary of the results as he had experienced them. BUCKLEY, L.J., proceeds to discuss the sub-rule and then he says ([1915] 1 K.B. 296): 'The latter part [of the sub-rule] says that, except in one particular case, certain costs which were formerly to be disallowed are still to be disallowed. The excepted case is that of taxation of costs as between a solicitor and his own client. This part of the sub-rule in effect provides that as between solicitor and own client those costs may be allowed, but that in all other cases they shall not. The other cases include taxation as between solicitor and client as distinguished from taxation as between solicitor and own client. Accordingly upon such a taxation as this the costs described in the latter part of sub-r. 29 are not to be allowed. The taxing master in this case has proceeded upon that footing. He says that "the taxation in the case of No. 3, which is the one that applies to this action, is the strictest and in effect gives little more than a taxation as between party and party, except that any necessary letters to and attendances on the client are allowed." That is not very well expressed. "Necessary letters to and attendances on the client" are allowed as between party and party; the letters and attendances there referred to must be letters and attendances beyond those that would be allowed as between party and party. The taxing master has taxed this bill of costs on the footing that the latter part of sub-r. 29 applies. For the reasons I have given I think that he was right. Except upon a taxation as between solicitor and own client such costs as there mentioned are not to be allowed. That is the only question of principle argued before us'.

A PICKFORD, L.J., agreed. He regretted that he felt bound to affirm the decision, and said that logically costs as between solicitor and client could mean only one thing, viz., such costs as were properly chargeable between a solicitor and his client and were properly payable by the client to his solicitor, but he agreed that the sub-rule did apply to a solicitor and client taxation. He made no reference to the paragraph in the taxing master's answers to which I have referred. That case, in my judgment, decided one thing quite clearly, i.e., that the latter part of the sub-rule applies to a solicitor and client taxation with the inevitable corollary that a solicitor and client taxation cannot be assimilated to, or cannot be made identical with, a solicitor and own client taxation. In my judgment, it decided nothing else. Counsel for the defendant suggested that, as BUCKLEY, L.J., referred to the particular paragraph in the taxing master's answer and criticised it in one respect only, I ought to infer that he impliedly approved it in all other respects. First, I do not think that it was ever intended to be a pronouncement of a norm or standard. Secondly, I do not think that BUCKLEY, L.J., did approve it in all other respects, because it is not really consistent with what he himself has said. He said that in the former case, i.e., the solicitor and client taxation, the taxation is substantially a party and party taxation on a more generous scale. That must be so, because the whole of sub-r. (29) applies equally to both a party and party taxation and to a solicitor and client taxation. Therefore, the characteristics of the items which can properly be allowed must be the same in both classes of taxation. The only scope for difference is that the allowances should be on a more generous scale in one class of taxation than in the other. There is, in my judgment, no possible ground for thinking that BUCKLEY, L.J., thought that the only things that could be treated more generously were certain letters and attendances to the exclusion, for example, of counsel's fees."

D He then deals with the items of counsel's fees, and he says (ibid., 245):

F "For my part, I do not think that BUCKLEY, L.J., by his reference to this particular passage and his criticism of it in one respect only, intended to imply that it was to be read as a limitation on the generality of his own phrase, which is 'that a solicitor and client taxation is substantially a party and party taxation on a more generous basis.' If, contrary to my view, BUCKLEY, L.J., did intend to make that implication, it was plainly obiter dictum. He himself says that the only point of principle decided in the case was whether or not the sub-rule applied to a solicitor and client taxation. This point had no relevance to the decision of that point of principle and PICKFORD, L.J., does not refer to the taxing master's words at all. Therefore, I am not prepared to accept the view that those words have been put forward by anybody, by the taxing master in that case or by the court, as a norm or standard for a solicitor and client taxation. G H In my judgment, the duty of a taxing master is to approach both classes of taxation, both party and party and solicitor and client taxation, with his mind on the sub-rule, which is his proper norm or standard, but, at the same time, he is to make more generous allowances in taxing as between solicitor and client because, though the sub-rule prevents him from fully achieving the intention clearly expressed by the direction in the order, i.e., to allow all that a solicitor can properly claim against a client, it is his duty to carry out that intention so far as permissible."

I respectfully adopt that passage in the judgment of ROXBURGH, J., because, in my view, it is equally applicable to a taxation under para. 4 of sched. III to the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949. The only distinction between that case and a taxation under the Legal Aid and Advice Act is that ROXBURGH, J., was dealing with case No. 3 in Giles v. Randall (11), whereas the taxation under sched. III would be a taxation under case No. 2 in Giles v. Randall (11), that is, where costs are payable out of a common fund. For convenience, I adopt the classification which was made in Giles v. Randall (11) and approved by the Court of Appeal. I assume that the taxing master, in dealing with case No. 2, would make more generous allowance than he would in dealing with a case under No. 3. I do not profess to know the precise difference between them. I assume that it is well-known to the taxing master and that it would be on a more generous footing, whereas, of course, compared with No. 1, which is on an indemnity basis, a taxation on the basis of case No. 2 would obviously be less generous.

ROXBURGH, J., went on (ibid., 245):

"In his reply, counsel for the plaintiff referred me to a passage in Frankenburg v. Famous Lasky Film Service, Ltd. (12), in the Court of Appeal, which appears to me to embody the same principle. LORD HANWORTH, M.R., said ([1931] 1 Ch. 436): '... the difference between party and party and solicitor and client costs is undoubtedly this, that the solicitor and client costs are intended to embrace a more generous allowance for the actual costs which have been incurred by the plaintiff.' Counsel asks me to go further and to hold that in the present case the order should be construed as though it had directed a solicitor and own client taxation, or, in other words, an indemnity. He says that because Andrews v. Barnes (1) was the case on which I relied as giving me jurisdiction to make the order which I made. It is undeniably true that FRY, L.J., delivering the judgment of the court in Andrews v. Barnes (1), refers to indemnity. He says (39 Ch.D. 140): '... various circumstances have been stated as influencing the discretion of the court—in some cases to vindicate the honour and justice of the court, and in Palmer v. Walesby (16) on the ground of the right of the applicant to indemnity, the reason assigned by KAY, J., for awarding them in the present case.' I cannot accept that submission. In my judgment, this order is not to be construed differently from any other order for solicitor and client costs merely because I thought I found my jurisdiction to make it in Andrews v. Barnes (1)."

I, again, respectfully agree with what ROXBURGH, J., says there. He continues (ibid.):

"Counsel for the plaintiff further says that Goodwin v. Storrar (10) is an authority for the proposition that an order for solicitor and client costs ought now to be construed as though it were an order for solicitor and own client costs. There is no doubt that Goodwin v. Storrar (10) has not previously been taken into account in carrying out taxations as between solicitor and client in the Chancery Division. It is a decision of DENNING, J. The plaintiffs were personal representatives of a man and his wife who were killed as a result of an explosion at a munition works, and they brought an action against the defendant claiming damages under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and a sum under the Fatal Accidents Act for the benefit of the two children of the deceased. The action was settled on the terms that £250 was to be paid in respect of each of the deceased under the Law Reform (Miscellaneous Provisions) Act, 1934, and £1,750 under the Fatal Accidents Act. The settlement was embodied in a consent order approved by the court, which contained the following provision as to costs . . . On taxation, the taxing master taxed the costs on the basis that under Ord. 22, r. 14 (11), the plaintiffs' solicitors were entitled to be paid such costs as they would be properly entitled to receive from their own clients. The defendant applied for a review."

ROXBURGH, J., then cites the passage which I have already read from the judgment of DENNING, J. ([1947] 1 All E.R. 204), and goes on (ibid., 246):

"Order 22, r. 14, has no application to the action with which I am concerned, but Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), has and still stands. Giles v. Randall (11) decided that that sub-rule applies to my order, for, indeed, there is no ground of distinction known to me, other than that with which I have already dealt, between the order in Giles v. Randall (11) and the present order. Accordingly, my order cannot be construed as directing a solicitor and own client taxation because so to construe it would be to hold that the sub-rule did not apply to it. But I find in DENNING, J's., decision support for what I have myself already said about the duty of a taxing master in a solicitor and client taxation."

Those are the authorities to which I have been referred. As I have already said, I have no doubt that when the draftsman came to draft para. 4 (1) of sched. III he must have been well aware of R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), and of the decisions of the court that that was the governing regulation which applied to every taxation, not only as between party and party, but also as between solicitor and client, and that the latter part of that sub-rule applied to taxations as between solicitor and client with the one exception where the taxation was as between solicitor and own client. The draftsman must also have been well aware of the classification of the three different methods of taxation as between solicitor and client which had been discussed in Giles v. Randall (11) and there recognised and adopted by the Court of Appeal. I have no doubt that with that knowledge Parliament deliberately selected class 2 of the methods of taxation referred to in Giles v. Randall (11) as being the appropriate method of taxation of a bill of costs in a case where a litigant had been assisted under the Act of 1949. The question, therefore, which I have to decide, is the principle which the learned registrar ought to adopt in taxing a solicitor's bill of costs, having regard to R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29), and to sched. III of the Act and bearing in mind the various authorities which I have already cited.

In my view, the principle which the taxing master ought to adopt is as follows:

(i) Under the order for taxation it is the duty of the taxing master on a taxation as between party and party to adopt as his normal standard the direction in R.S.C., Ord. 65, r. 27 (29). (ii) At the same time he should make more generous allowances than he would on a taxation as between party and party. In making more generous allowances the taxing master, in my judgment, is permitted, not only to allow items which can be properly included on a party and party taxation at a higher figure than that at which they would be allowed on a party and party taxation, but also to allow additional items which would not be allowed on a taxation as between party and party. The taxing master has, of course, a very wide discretion. (iii) The order in my judgment cannot be construed as an order for taxation as between solicitor and own client. I have adopted the language of ROXBURGH, J., in Reed v. Gray (15). As I have already pointed out, it seems to me that the only difference between the two cases is that he was dealing with a taxation on a No. 3 basis whereas I have to deal with a taxation on a No. 2 basis.

I come now to the facts of this particular case. The solicitors for the petitioner carried in a bill of costs in which their total for items of costs was £35 17s. 10d. The amount taxed off by the learned registrar was £6 5s. 8d. leaving a balance of £29 12s. 2d., to which had to be added the fifty per cent. authorised increase, which amounted to £14 16s. 1d., making a total of £44 8s. 3d., to which had to be added the disbursements £17 13s. 6d. making a total of £62 1s. 9d. which with the taxing fee of £1 12s. totalled £63 13s. 9d. The learned registrar had disallowed a considerable number of items and had made reductions in others. Accordingly, objections numbering twenty to the taxation by the learned registrar were carried in. The grounds of objections were:

"The grounds for the objections to the disallowance of these items are that: (i) They were properly incurred in connection with the conduct of these proceedings (ii) That the costs are to be taxed on a solicitor and client basis where the costs are payable out of a common fund. Mr. ERIC SACHS, Q.C., in his book on Legal Aid defines the basis of taxation at pp. 136 and 137 as follows: The solicitor and client basis referred to in sched. III of the Legal Aid and Advice Act, 1949, is a little less stern than the party and party basis the total allowed being normally about fifteen per cent. higher where costs are taxed on the footing that they are to be paid out of a common fund. This results in part through additional items being allowed and in part through discretionary items being allowed at a higher figure."

There was an additional objection carried in to the last item which was

"Petitioner's fee for attendance in court and expenses. The disallowance of this item is objected to on the grounds that the petitioner is entitled to charge his expenses for attending court."

Counsel was not able to cite any authority for the passage in Mr. SACHS' book that the result of the taxation was normally about fifteen per cent. higher where costs are taxed on the footing that they are to be paid out of the common fund. I myself am not aware of the precise way in which the different modes of taxation are worked out and I prefer to express no opinion about it. I read this objection to mean this, that the solicitor is arguing that a taxation as between solicitor and client when costs come out of a common fund is entitled to embrace a more generous allowance than on a taxation as between party and party, and that generosity can extend, not only to increasing the amounts of items, but also to allowing additional items beyond those which would be allowed on a taxation as between party and party. If so, leaving out for the moment the precise percentage of increase, it seems to me to embody the true principle which I have been endeavouring to state.

The learned registrar made some observations. He says:

"My answer is applicable to all objections. This is a solicitor and client bill and not a solicitor and own client bill. I can well understand the difficulty in which solicitors who undertake legal aid cases find themselves. They really, perhaps not unreasonably, desire an indemnity as to costs, however incurred. My own view is that the legislature would have said so had they so intended. I understand that the solicitor is not allowed to recover any sum from the client and in some ways this seems a logical outcome of the proposal for legal aid. But it opens the door to the abuse of a privilege not so much by the solicitor as by the client. I should be very grateful for a ruling."

I agree with the learned registrar that this is a taxation as between solicitor and client out of a common fund and not a taxation as between solicitor and own client. However, the learned registrar disallowed or reduced these twenty items and it seems to me clear that he cannot have accepted the objection which was put forward on behalf of the petitioner to which I have already referred, namely, that there ought to be a more generous allowance than on a taxation as between party and party. I think the proper inference I ought to draw is that the learned registrar declined to accept that basis of taxation, and it seems to me to follow that he must have adopted a standard of taxation which was less generous than that which the petitioner's solicitors were inviting him to adopt. If so, it seems to me that he failed to apply the right principle and, as his answer applied to all the objections, it, therefore, vitiates all the items disallowed which are affected by these objections.

I have to consider now the detailed items in the bill. I am going to refer to them by the numbers in the objections. The first two items raised were negotiations between the petitioner's solicitors and the respondent's solicitors in regard to interim custody and access to the child of the marriage and for maintenance for the child. A small charge was made in the bill for both those items and they have both been disallowed by the learned registrar. In my view, negotiations

- A between solicitors with reference to the interim custody of or access to the child or the maintenance of the child pending the hearing of the suit fall within the class which would be allowable on a party and party taxation and, of course, would be allowable on a solicitor and client taxation, and, if my view is correct, a more generous allowance should be made than would be made in a party and party taxation. I think the registrar was clearly wrong in disallowing those
- B items. I can deal with items 3, 4, 6, 7, 9, 10, 11, 13, 14, 16, 17, together. They all really refer to letters from the petitioner's solicitor to the respondent's solicitors enclosing a weekly sum of 10s. on account of maintenance of the child. Those items seem to me to fall within the category of permitted items as to which the learned registrar should exercise his discretion. In an ordinary case where a solicitor is merely acting as a post office for the purpose of sending
- C a letter enclosing 10s. I should myself find it very difficult to see any valid ground on which such items could be justified, but there might be special cases where it could be properly held desirable or necessary that direct communication should not be made by one spouse to another and in such cases the items might possibly be justified. These are, therefore, matters which, in my view, the learned registrar could allow in the exercise of his discretion if he thought it right to do so in the
- D circumstances of this particular case.

There are one or two other items to which I ought to refer. Item 5 was a charge for writing to the petitioner informing him of the refusal to reduce his legal aid contributions. Apparently an effort was made to persuade either the National Assistance Board or the area legal aid committee to reduce the contributions which had been fixed at the time when the certificate was granted to the E petitioner. As counsel for the Queen's Proctor pointed out, there is no power to do that unless under the rules there has been an alteration in the circumstances and that did not seem to be suggested here. Unless there were an alteration in the circumstances, or events had happened which would entitle the petitioner under the rules to apply for a variation of the amount of the contributions which had been fixed, that item would seem to be an item which could not be justified.

- F Objection No. 8 is: "Writing petitioner reporting case set down for trial". That, again, appears to me to be an item which falls within the category of a permitted item, but one in which the learned registrar ought to exercise his discretion in every case. It is to be observed that later on in the bill there are charges for "Attending clerk of the rules and fixing case for hearing" and then giving notice to the petitioner. No doubt, the learned registrar would take that into
- G account and consider whether in view of that item the other item was an item which he, in the exercise of his discretion, thought he ought or ought not to allow. Item 12 is: "Writing respondent's solicitors, informing them that the date to be inserted in the summons for maintenance when the payments were to be increased was Jan. 4, 1952. Enclosing 10s. P.O. on account of maintenance of the child". There, again, that seems to be an item which falls within the category
- H of permitted items and one on which the learned registrar should exercise his discretion. Item No. 15 was: "Writing petitioner informing him of result of hearing of maintenance application and as to payment of costs". It seems to me that that clearly falls within the category of permitted items.

Item 19 was instructions for brief which was reduced by the learned registrar from ten guineas to seven guineas. It is the practice of the court never to review a case where the only question is quantum and that practice applies to this Division as well as to all the other Divisions of the court. Counsel for the petitioner contended before me that the fee which was actually allowed was really the fee which was applicable on a party and party taxation and that on a solicitor and client taxation a more generous figure ought to have been allowed. If the basis on which the learned registrar proceeded was that, then I should think he was clearly wrong and that this matter could and should go back to him for re-consideration. I have, however, no material on which I can attempt to decide whether seven guineas is the usual charge for a party and party taxation. However, on this matter, I follow ROXBURGH, J., in the case of Reed v. Gray (15) to which I have already referred where he deals with the somewhat similar problems in that case. An objection was put before him that all the questions which he had to decide were questions of quantum and the learned judge said ([1952] 1 All E.R. 248):

"I do not agree. The question is not the quantum, but from what point of view does one approach the ascertainment of the quantum? If one approaches it from a wrong point of view, the quantum must necessarily be vitiated."

As I have already said, I think the learned registrar did approach these items from the wrong point of view, and, therefore, this item, together with the others, should go back to him for re-consideration in the light of the judgment which I have delivered. The last objection was No. 20: "Petitioner's fee for attendance in court and expenses". In my view, that is a permissible item. I was referred by counsel for the Queen's Proctor to Harbin v. Gordon (17) which concerned the allowance for the plaintiff's travelling and hotel expenses. BUCKLEY, L.J., said ([1914] 2 K.B. 586):

"The plaintiff, as a party litigant, was not entitled to any allowance, but as a witness he was entitled to an allowance like any other witness, and none the less because he was also a party litigant. If he had not been a party litigant, but an ordinary witness, the taxing master would have been entitled to require evidence that the amount had been paid before he included it in his allocatur for recovery from the defendant. The whole question is whether, when he is a party litigant, the taxing master is not also entitled to be satisfied that the amount has been paid or that the plaintiff knows that it is going to be recovered for him from the defendant. In my opinion he is so entitled."

In my view, that is the true basis on which this point should be settled, and as in this case, and, indeed, in every petition for divorce, the petitioner is a necessary witness (unless the leave of the court has been obtained to give his evidence by affidavit), it is, in my view, normally permissible and the learned registrar in his discretion should grant a proper fee in respect of it.

I have now reviewed the whole of the items, and, accordingly, I direct that the bill of costs be referred back to the learned registrar for him to re-consider it in the light of my judgment. There is one small matter in regard to the petitioner's fee for attendance in court and expenses. I think the learned registrar might properly require, if he thought fit to do so, that there should be some voucher produced to him at the time of taxation to show that this amount has been paid to the petitioner.

Order accordingly.
